PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES

OF

THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,

AT THE THIRD SESSION OF THE ELEVENTH CONGRESS, BEGUN AT THE CITY OF WASHINGTON, MONDAY, DECEMBER 3, 1810.

MONDAY, December 3, 1810.

The third session of the eleventh Congress, conformably to the Constitution of Government of the United States, commenced this day; and the Senate assembled at the City of Washington.

PRESENT:

NICHOLAS GILMAN and CHARLES CUTTS, from New Hampshire.

CHAUNCEY GOODRICH and SAMUEL W. DANA, from Connecticut.

JONATHAN ROBINSON, from Vermont.

OBADIAH GERMAN, from New York.

MICHAEL LEIB, from Pennsylvania.

OUTERBRIDGE HORSEY, from Delaware.

SAMUEL SMITH, from Maryland.

WILLIAM B. GILES, from Virginia.

JOHN GAILLARD, from South Carolina.

WILLIAM H. CRAWFORD and CHARLES TAIT, from Georgia.

JOHN POPE, from Kentucky.

ALEXANDER CAMPBELL, from Ohio.

JOHN GAILLARD, President pro tempore, resumed the Chair.

The number of Senators present not being sufficient to constitute a quorum, the Senate adjourned.

TUESDAY, December 4.

JOHN LAMBERT, from the State of New Jersey, ELISHA MATHEWSON, from the State of Rhode Island, and PHILIP REED, from the State of Maryland, severally attended.

The credentials of CHARLES CUTTS, appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the State of New Hampshire, in place of Nahum Parker, Esq., resigned; also, of SAMUEL W. DANA, appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the State of Connecticut, in place of James Hillhouse, Esq., resigned, were severally read; and the oath required by law was, by the PRESIDENT, administered to them, respectively.

Ordered, That the Secretary acquaint the House of Representatives that a quorum of the Senate is assembled and ready to proceed to business.

Ordered, That Messrs. SMITH, of Maryland, and GILMAN, be a committee on the part of the Senate, together with such committee as may be appointed by the House of Representatives on their part, to wait on the President of the United States and notify him that a quorum of the two Houses is assembled and ready to receive any communications that he may be pleased to make to them.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that a quorum of the House of Representatives is assembled and ready to proceed to business. The House of Representatives have appointed a committee on their part, jointly, with such committee as may be appointed on the part of the Senate, to wait on the President of the United States and notify him that a quorum of the two Houses is assembled and ready to receive any communications that he may be pleased to make to them.

On motion, by Mr. SMITH, of Maryland,

Resolved, That each Senator be supplied, during the present session, with three such newspapers printed in any of the States as he may choose, provided that the same be furnished at the usual rate for the annual charge of such papers: and provided, also, that if any Senator shall choose to take any newspapers other than daily papers, he shall be supplied with as many such papers as shall not exceed the price of three daily papers.

On motion, by Mr. SMITH, of Maryland,

Resolved, That James Mathers, Sergeant-at-Arms and Doorkeeper to the Senate, be, and he is hereby, authorized to employ one assistant and two horses, for the purpose of performing such services as are usually required by the Doorkeeper to the Senate; and that the sum of twenty-eight dollars be allowed him weekly for that purpose, to commence with, and remain during the session, and for twenty days after.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That two Chaplains, of different denominations, be appointed to Congress during the present session, one by each House, who shall interchange weekly.

Mr. GILES presented the petition of Larkin

Smith, Collector of the District of Norfolk and Portsmouth, in Virginia, praying additional compensation, for reasons stated at large in his petition; which was read, and referred to a select committee to consider and report thereon; and Messrs. GILES, CRAWFORD, and LEIB, were appointed the committee.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, reported from the joint committee that they had waited on the President of the United States, and that the President informed the committee that he would make a communication to the two Houses tomorrow, at 12 o'clock.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, gave notice that, tomorrow, he should ask leave to bring in a bill to suspend the second section of the "Act supplementary to the act, entitled 'An act regulating foreign coins, and for other purposes.'"

WEDNESDAY, December 5.

TIMOTHY PICKERING, from the State of Massachusetts, and STEPHEN R. BRADLEY, from the State of Vermont, severally attended.

PRESIDENT'S ANNUAL MESSAGE.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

Fellow-citizens of the Senate and House of Representatives:

The embarrassments which have prevailed in our foreign relations, and so much employed the deliberations of Congress, make it a primary duty in meeting you to communicate whatever may have occurred in that branch of our national affairs.

The act of the last session of Congress concerning the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France, and their dependencies, having invited, in a new form, a termination of their edicts against our neutral commerce; copies of the act were immediately forwarded to our Ministers at London and Paris, with a view that its object might be within the early attention of the French and British Governments.

By the communication received through our Minister at Paris, it appeared that a knowledge of the act by the French Government was followed by a declaration that the Berlin and Milan decrees were revoked, and would cease to have effect on the first day of November ensuing. These being the only known edicts of France within the description of the act, and the revocation of them being such that they ceased at that date to violate our neutral commerce, the fact, as prescribed by law, was announced by a proclamation, bearing date the second day of November.

It would have well accorded with the conciliatory views indicated by this proceeding on the part of France, to have extended them to all the grounds of just complaint which now remain unadjusted with the United States. It was particularly anticipated that, as a further evidence of just dispositions towards them, restoration would have been immediately made of the property of our citizens, seized under a misapplication of the principle of reprisals, combined with a misconstruction of the law of the United States. This expectation has not been fulfilled.

From the British Government, no communication on the subject of the act has been received. To a communication, from our Minister at London, of a revocation, by the French Government, of its Berlin and Milan decrees, it was answered, that the British system would be relinquished as soon as the repeal of the French decrees should have actually taken effect, and the commerce of neutral nations have been restored to the condition in which it stood previously to the promulgation of those decrees. This pledge, although it does not necessarily import, does not exclude, the intention of relinquishing, along with the Orders in Council, the practice of those novel blockades, which have a like effect of interrupting our neutral commerce: and this further justice to the United States is the rather to be looked for, inasmuch as the blockades in question, being not more contrary to the established law of nations than inconsistent with the rules of blockade formally recognised by Great Britain herself, could have no alleged basis other than the plea of retaliation, alleged as the basis of the Orders in Council. Under the modification of the original orders of November, 1807, into the orders of April, 1809, there is, indeed, scarcely a nominal distinction between the orders and the blockades. One of those illegitimate blockades, bearing date in May, 1806, having been expressly avowed to be still unrescinded, and to be, in effect, comprehended in the Orders in Council, was too distinctly brought within the purview of the act of Congress not to be comprehended in the explanation of the requisites to a compliance with it. The British Government was accordingly apprized by our Minister near it, that such was the light in which the subject was to be regarded.

On the other important subjects depending between the United States and that Government, no progress has been made from which an early and satisfactory result can be relied on.

In this new posture of our relations with those Powers, the consideration of Congress will be properly turned to a removal of doubts which may occur in the exposition, and of difficulties in the execution, of the act above cited.

The commerce of the United States with the north of Europe, heretofore much vexed by licentious cruisers, particularly under the Danish flag, has latterly been visited with fresh and extensive depredations. The measures pursued in behalf of our injured citizens, not having obtained justice for them, a further and more formal interposition with the Danish Government is contemplated. The principles which have been maintained by that Government in relation to neutral commerce, and the friendly professions of His Danish Majesty towards the United States, are valuable pledges in favor of a successful issue.

Among the events growing out of the state of the Spanish monarchy, our attention was imperiously attracted to the change developing itself in that portion of West Florida which, though of right appertaining to the United States, had remained in the possession of Spain, awaiting the result of negotiations for its actual delivery to them. The Spanish authority was subverted, and a situation produced exposing the country to ulterior events which might essentially affect the rights and welfare of the Union. In such a conjuncture I did not delay the interposition required for the occupancy of the territory west of the river Perdido, to which the title of the United States extends, and to which the laws provided for the Territory of Orleans are applicable. With this view, the proclamation, of which a copy is laid before you, was confided to the Governor of that Territory, to be carried into effect. The legality and necessity of the course pursued, assure me of the favorable light in which it will present itself to the Legislature, and of the promptitude with which they will supply whatever provisions may be due to the essential rights and equitable interests of the people thus brought into the bosom of the American family.

Our amity with the Powers of Barbary, with the exception of a recent occurrence at Tunis, of which an explanation is just received, appears to have been uninterrupted, and to have become more firmly established.

With the Indian tribes, also, the peace and friendship of the United States are found to be so eligible that the general disposition to preserve both continues to gain strength.

I feel particular satisfaction in remarking that an interior view of our country presents us with grateful proofs of its substantial and increasing prosperity. To a thriving agriculture, and the improvements related to it, is added a highly interesting extension of useful manufactures, the combined product of professional occupations and of household industry. Such, indeed, is the experience of economy, as well as of policy, in these substitutes for supplies, heretofore obtained by foreign commerce, that, in a national view, the change is justly regarded as, of itself, more than a recompense for those privations and losses, resulting from foreign injustice, which furnished the general impulse required for its accomplishment. How far it may be expedient to guard the infancy of this improvement in the distribution of labor by regulations of the commercial tariff, is a subject which cannot fail to suggest itself to your patriotic reflections.

It will rest with the consideration of Congress, also, whether a provident, as well as fair encouragement, would not be given to our navigation by such regulations as would place it on a level of competition with foreign vessels, particularly in transporting the important and bulky productions of our own soil. The failure of equality and reciprocity in the existing regulations on this subject operates, in our ports, as a premium to foreign competitors; and the inconvenience must increase as these may be multiplied, under more favorable circumstances, by the more than counter-vailing encouragements now given them by the laws of their respective countries.

Whilst it is universally admitted that a well instructed people alone can be permanently a free people, and while it is evident that the means of diffusing and improving useful knowledge form so small a proportion of the expenditures for national purposes, I cannot presume it to be unseasonable to invite your attention to the advantages of superadding to the means of education, provided by the several States, a seminary of learning, instituted by the National Legislature, within the limits of their exclusive jurisdiction, the expense of which might be defrayed or reimbursed out of the vacant grounds which have accrued to the nation within those limits.

Such an institution, though local in its legal character, would be universal in its beneficial effects. By enlightening the opinions, by expanding the patriotism, and by assimilating the principles, the sentiments, and the manners, of those who might resort to this temple of science, to be redistributed, in due time, through every part of the community, sources of jealousy and prejudice would be diminished, the features of national character would be multiplied, and greater extent given to social harmony. But, above all, a well constituted seminary, in the centre of the nation, is recommended by the consideration that the additional instruction emanating from it would contribute not less to strengthen the foundations than to adorn the structure of our free and happy system of Government.

Among the commercial abuses still committed under the American flag, and leaving in force my former reference to that subject, it appears that American citizens are instrumental in carrying on a traffic in enslaved Africans, equally in violation of the laws of humanity, and in defiance of those of their own country. The same just and benevolent motives which produced the interdiction in force against this criminal conduct, will doubtless be felt by Congress in devising further means of suppressing the evil.

In the midst of uncertainties necessarily connected with the great interests of the United States, prudence requires a continuance of our defensive and precautionary arrangement. The Secretary of War and Secretary of the Navy will submit the statements and estimates which may aid Congress in their ensuing provisions for the land and naval forces. The statements of the latter will include a view of the transfers of appropriations in the naval expenditures, and the grounds on which they were made.

The fortifications for the defence of our maritime frontier have been prosecuted according to the plan laid down in 1808. The works, with some exceptions, are completed, and furnished with ordnance. Those for the security of the city of New York, though far advanced towards completion, will require a further time and appropriation. This is the case with a few others, either not completed, or in need of repairs.

The improvements, in quality and quantity, made in the manufacture of cannon and of small arms, both at the public armories and private factories, warrant additional confidence in the competency of these resources for supplying the public exigencies.

These preparations for arming the militia having thus far provided for one of the objects contemplated by the power vested in Congress with respect to that great bulwark of the public safety, it is for their consideration whether further provisions are not requisite for the other contemplated objects of organization and discipline. To give to this great mass of physical and moral force the efficiency which it merits and is capable of receiving, it is indispensable that they should be instructed and practised in the rules by which they are to be governed. Towards an accomplishment of this important work, I recommend for the consideration of Congress the expediency of instituting a system which shall, in the first instance, call into the field, at the public expense, and for a given time, certain portions of the commissioned and non-commissioned officers. The instruction and discipline thus acquired would gradually diffuse through the entire body of the militia that practical knowledge and promptitude for active service which are the great ends to be pursued. Experience has left no doubt, either of the necessity or of the efficacy of competent military skill in those portions of an army, in fitting it for the final duties which it may have to perform.

The corps of engineers, with the Military Academy, are entitled to the early attention of Congress. The buildings at the seat fixed by law for the present academy are so far in decay as not to afford the necessary accommodation. But a revision of the law is recommended principally with a view to a more enlarged cultivation and diffusion of the advantages of such institutions, by providing professorships for all the necessary branches of military instruction, and by the establishment of an additional academy at the Seat of Government or elsewhere. The means by which war, as well for defence as for offence, are now carried on, render these schools of the more scientific operations an indispensable part of every adequate system. Even among nations whose large standing armies and frequent wars afford every other opportunity of instruction, these establishments are found to be indispensable for the due attainment of the branches of military science which require a regular course of study and experiment. In a Government happily without the other opportunities, seminaries, where the elementary principles of the art of war can be taught without actual war, and without the expense of extensive and standing armies, have the precious advantage of uniting an essential preparation against external danger, with a scrupulous regard to internal safety. In no other way, probably, can a provision of equal efficacy for the public defence be made at so little expense, or more consistently with the public liberty.

The receipts into the Treasury during the year ending on the 30th of September last, (and amounting to more than eight millions and a half of dollars) have exceeded the current expenses of Government, including the interest on the public debt. For the purpose of reimbursing, at the end of the year, three millions seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars of the principal, a loan, as authorized by law, had been negotiated to that amount; but has since been reduced to two millions seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars; the reduction being permitted by the state of the Treasury, in which there will be a balance remaining at the end of the year, estimated at two millions of dollars. For the probable receipts of the next year, and other details, I refer to statements which will be transmitted from the Treasury, and which will enable you to judge what further provisions may be necessary for the ensuing years.

Reserving for future occasions, in the course of the session, whatever other communications may claim your attention, I close the present, by expressing my reliance, under the blessing of Divine Providence, on the judgment and patriotism which will guide your measures, at a period particularly calling for united councils, and inflexible exertions, for the welfare of our country, and by assuring you of the fidelity and alacrity with which my co-operation will be afforded.

JAMES MADISON.

WASHINGTON, December 5, 1810.

The Message and documents therein referred to were read, and five hundred copies thereof ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill to suspend the second section of the act, entitled "An act regulating foreign coins, and for other purposes;" and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

Mr. GILES presented the petition of the President, Directors, and Company, of the Farmers' Bank of Alexandria, praying a charter of incorporation, for reasons stated at large in the petition; which was read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

THURSDAY, December 6.

The number of Senators present not being sufficient to constitute a quorum, the Senate adjourned.

FRIDAY, December 7.

JOSEPH ANDERSON, from the State of Tennessee, attended.

The bill to suspend the second section of the act, entitled "An act regulating foreign coins, and for other purposes;" was read the second time, and referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon; and Messrs. SMITH, of Maryland, CRAWFORD, and DANA, were appointed the committee.

The Senate resumed the motion made on the 4th instant, for the appointment of Chaplains; and the further consideration thereof was postponed until Monday next.

On motion, by Mr. GILES,

Resolved, That so much of the Message of the President of the United States as concerns the relations between the United States and France and Great Britain, with the accompanying documents, be referred to a select committee to examine and report thereon to the Senate, and that the committee have leave to report by bill, bills, or otherwise.

Ordered, That Messrs. GILES, CRAWFORD, ANDERSON, GOODRICH, and POPE, be the committee.

The following motion was submitted by Mr. GILES:

Resolved, That so much of the Message of the President of the United States, as relates to the occupation of that part of West Florida which is included within the boundaries described by the treaty for the acquisition of Louisiana, with the accompanying documents, be referred to a select committee, with instructions to examine the same, and report thereon to the Senate; and that the committee have leave to report by bill, bills, or otherwise.

Ordered, That it lie until Monday next.

On motion, by Mr. SMITH, of Maryland,

Resolved, That so much of the Message of the President of the United States, as relates to the corps of engineers and Military Academy, be referred to a select committee, to report by bill, bills, or otherwise.

Ordered, That Messrs. SMITH of Maryland, GILMAN, BRADLEY, PICKERING, and REED, be the committee.

On motion, by Mr. GILES,

Resolved, That the petition of the President, Directors, and Company of the Farmers' Bank of Alexandria, praying a charter of incorporation, presented on the 5th instant, be referred to a select committee, to consist of five members, to consider and report thereon by bill or otherwise.

Ordered, That Messrs. GILES, LEIB, GOODRICH, CRAWFORD, and CUTTS, be the committee.

MONDAY, December 10.

Mr. LEIB presented the resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Pennsylvania, passed 18th March last, approving the measures pursued by the Administration of the United States, on our foreign relations; and the resolutions were read.

The Senate resumed the motion made the 4th instant, for the appointment of Chaplains; and on motion, by Mr. CRAWFORD, to amend the motion as follows:

"That a Chaplain shall be appointed to Congress during the present session, who shall perform divine service on the Sabbath day in the Representatives' Hall, and shall interchange weekly;"

It passed in the negative.

So it was Resolved, That two Chaplains, of different denominations, be appointed to Congress during the present session, one by each House, who shall interchange weekly.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion submitted the 7th instant; and,

Resolved, That so much of the Message of the President of the United States, as relates to the occupation of that part of West Florida, which is included within the boundaries described by the treaty for the acquisition of Louisiana, with the accompanying documents, be referred to a select committee, with instructions to examine the same and report thereon to the Senate; and that the committee have leave to report by bill, bills, or otherwise.

Ordered, That Messrs. GILES, POPE, CRAWFORD, ANDERSON, and BRADLEY, be the committee.

On motion, by Mr. CAMPBELL,

Resolved, That so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to commercial abuses committed under the American flag, in carrying on an illegal traffic in enslaved Africans, be referred to a committee, to examine and report thereon to the Senate; and that the committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Ordered, That Messrs. CAMPBELL, DANA, BRADLEY, CUTTS, and GILMAN, be the committee.

Mr. ANDERSON presented the petition of the President and Directors of the Bank of Potomac, praying a charter of incorporation, for reasons stated at large in the petition; which was read, and referred to a select committee, to consist of five members, to consider and report thereon by bill or otherwise; and Messrs. ANDERSON, GILMAN, TAIT, GOODRICH, and LEIB, were appointed the committee.

On motion, by Mr. GILMAN,

Resolved, That a committee be appointed agreeably to the 22d rule for conducting business in the Senate.

Ordered, That Messrs. CUTTS, HORSEY, and GILMAN, be the committee.

On motion, by Mr. LEIB,

Resolved, That a committee be appointed, agreeably to the 42d rule for conducting business in the Senate.

Ordered, That Messrs. LEIB, CAMPBELL, and DANA, be the committee.

TUESDAY, December 11.

RICHARD BRENT, from the State of Virginia, attended.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House concur in the resolution of the Senate of the 10th instant, for the appointment of Chaplains, and have appointed the Reverend JESSE LEE Chaplain on their part.

On motion, by Mr. LEIB,

Resolved, That so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to the organization and discipline of the militia, be referred to a committee, with leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Ordered, That Messrs. LEIB, REED, SMITH of Maryland, ANDERSON, and GILMAN, be the committee.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the committee to whom was referred the bill to suspend the second section of the act, entitled "An act regulating foreign coins, and for other purposes," reported it without amendment.

On the question, Shall this bill be engrossed and read a third time? it was determined in the affirmative.

WEDNESDAY, December 12.

The VICE PRESIDENT of the United States resumed the Chair.

JESSE FRANKLIN, from the State of North Carolina, also took his seat in the Senate.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate and House of

Representatives of the United States:

I lay before Congress, and recommend to their early attention, a report of the Secretary of State, from which it will be seen that a very considerable demand beyond the legal appropriations, has been incurred for the support of seamen distressed by seizures, in different parts of Europe, of the vessels to which they belonged.

JAMES MADISON.

DECEMBER 12, 1810.

The Message and report were read, and referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon; and Messrs. FRANKLIN, CRAWFORD, and GOODRICH, were appointed the committee.

The PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, prepared in obedience to the act, entitled "An act to establish the Treasury Department," which, together with the accompanying documents, were read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

Mr. CUTTS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported the bill to suspend the second section of the act, entitled "An act regulating foreign coins, and for other purposes," correctly engrossed; and the bill was read the third time, and on motion, by Mr. SMITH of Maryland, it was agreed, by unanimous consent, to strike out the word "for," incorrectly quoted from the original bill.

So it was Resolved, That this bill pass, and that the title thereof be "An act to suspend the second section of the act, entitled 'An act regulating foreign coins, and for other purposes.'"

Mr. BRENT presented the petition of the stockholders of the Bank of Washington, praying a charter of incorporation, for reasons stated at large in the petition. He also presented the me-memorials of sundry citizens of Washington county on the same subject; which were read, and referred to Messrs. ANDERSON, GILMAN, TAIT, GOODRICH, and LEIB, the committee to whom was referred, on the 11th instant, a petition of the President and Directors of the Bank of Potomac, to consider and report thereon by bill or otherwise.

On motion, by Mr. BRADLEY, the Senate proceeded to the election of a Chaplain on their part, in pursuance of the resolution of the two Houses; and, on counting of the ballots, it appeared that the Reverend WALTER D. ADDISON had a majority, and was accordingly elected.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act to authorize the transportation of certain documents free of postage," in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill last mentioned was read, and passed to the second reading.

THURSDAY, December 13.

HENRY CLAY, from the State of Kentucky, took his seat in the Senate.

The bill, entitled "An act to authorize the transportation of certain documents free of postage," was read the second and third time, by unanimous consent, and passed.

Mr. LEIB submitted the following motion:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of directing the Secretary of the Treasury to deposit, for collection, in other banks than that of the United States and its branches, the bonds given to the Government for duties; and that the committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

THE PRESIDENT communicated the report of the Secretary for the Department of Treasury, made in pursuance of the resolution of the Senate of the 25th of April, 1810; and also a report made in pursuance of the resolution of the Senate, of the 1st of May, 1810, on the subject of claims barred by the statute of limitations; together with an explanatory letter from the Register of the Treasury on the same subject; which were read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

FRIDAY, December 14.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion made yesterday on the subject; and

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of directing the Secretary of the Treasury to deposit for collection in other banks than that of the United States and its branches, the bonds given to the Government for duties; and that the committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Ordered, That Messrs. LEIB, CRAWFORD, and GOODRICH, be the committee.

Mr. GILES presented the memorial of the City Council of Washington, praying sundry amendments to their charter of incorporation; which was read, and referred to a select committee, to consist of five members, to consider and report thereon by bill or otherwise; and Messrs. DANA, TAIT, GAILLARD, HORSEY, and GILES, were appointed the committee.

THE MILITIA.

THE PRESIDENT communicated the report of the Secretary for the Department of War, made in obedience to the resolution of the Senate of April 7, 1810, directing him to prepare a system of regulations for improving the discipline of the militia of the United States; which was read, and referred to Messrs. LEIB, REED, SMITH of Maryland, ANDERSON, and GILMAN, the committee to whom was referred, on the 11th instant, so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to the organization and discipline of the militia, with leave to report by bill or otherwise.

The report is as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT, December 13, 1810.

SIR: In obedience to a resolution of the honorable the Senate, passed April 7, 1810, "directing the Secretary of War to prepare a system of regulations for improving the discipline of the militia of the United States, comprehending the infantry, cavalry, and artillery, and to report the same to the Senate at the next session of Congress," the following regulations for the infantry, cavalry, and artillery, are herewith respectfully presented.

In determining on the regulations which it may be most eligible to establish for the government of the infantry, several considerations present themselves: first, the organization of companies, battalions, and regiments, as ordained by existing laws; secondly, the proficiency already made, with the experience acquired under the present system. Were the militia to be organized at this time from the population of the United States, and regulations to be adopted for their government and discipline, without regard to their present organization and discipline, the system of organization and tactics of the French armies would claim a preference. But the adoption of this system would require an entire new organization of companies, battalions, and regiments; and it is at least doubtful whether the officers of the militia would bestow, gratuitously, the time and attention necessary for their own, and the instruction of the men under their command, in the new and additional duties thus devolving on them.

The regulations prepared by the late Baron de Steuben, and ordered for the government of the troops of the United States by the Continental Congress, March 29, 1779, are acknowledged to contain the necessary instructions and directions for the discipline and government of an army, and have been the general rule of practice observed by the militia as well as the Army of the United States. It has therefore been judged expedient to continue these regulations as a basis, and to add to them such amendments and alterations as have been suggested by experience, with some manœuvres which make a part of more modern tactics. Should this proposal be adopted, the ordinance of March, 1779, as altered and amended, will require to be reprinted.

For the government of the Cavalry.—The ordinance for the exercise and manœuvres of the light cavalry of the French armies having all the advantages and improvements derived from long experience and actual service, appears to be well calculated. In order that a judgment may be formed of its merits, a translation of the whole of that ordinance, together with a volume of plates, explanatory of the directions, is herewith transmitted. In case it shall be approved, a revision of the work, by a person conversant with military science, will be necessary, in which the terms will be rendered analogous to our language; the whole may be abbreviated, and such parts as are not applicable to light cavalry may be entirely omitted.

For the Artillery.—"A compendious exercise for garrison and field ordnance," selected from the most approved authorities, by officers of experience, is proposed, and herewith reported for consideration.

All which is respectfully submitted

PRESIDENT of the Senate, &c.

JAMES LLOYD, from the State of Massachusetts, took his seat in the Senate.

The PRESIDENT communicated the report of the Secretary of the Navy on moneys transferred, during the last recess of Congress, from certain appropriations for particular branches of expenditure in that department, and of the application of such moneys; also, his report showing the state and disposition, at this time, of the public vessels of war and gunboats; which were read for consideration.

TUESDAY, December 18.

JOHN CONDIT, from the State of New Jersey, and JOHN SMITH, from the State of New York, severally took their seats in the Senate.

Mr. LEIB presented the petition of William Davy and Son, and others, merchants and traders of Philadelphia, stating that they are owners of a large property beyond the Cape of Good Hope, and praying exemption from the provisions of the act, entitled "An act concerning the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France, and their dependencies, and for other purposes;" under which they are apprehensive the said property may be implicated; and the petition was read, and referred to Messrs. GILES, CRAWFORD, ANDERSON, GOODRICH, and POPE, the committee to whom was referred, on the 7th instant, so much of the Message of this President of the United States as concerns the relations between the United States and France and Great Britain, to consider and report thereon by bill or otherwise.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. LEIB presented the petition of the President and Directors of the Bank of the United States, praying a renewal of their charter, for reasons therein stated; and the petition was read, and referred to a select committee, to consist of five members, to consider and report thereon; and that the petition be printed for the use of the Senate.

Messrs. CRAWFORD, LEIB, LLOYD, POPE, and ANDERSON, were appointed the committee.

The memorial is as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, the memorial of the Stockholders of the Bank of the United States, respectfully sheweth:

That, by an act of Congress, passed on the 25th of February, 1791, the subscribers to the capital stock of the Bank of the United States, their successors and assigns, were incorporated for a term of years, which will expire on the 4th day of March next.

Aware of the evils which must result from the sudden termination of the operations of an institution, intimately and extensively connected with the commercial interests of the nation, with the public credit, and the fiscal concerns of the Government, your memorialists submitted to the tenth Congress, an application for the extension of their charter. The wisdom of Congress having, hitherto, declined a decision upon the subject, it becomes the duty of your memorialists again to submit to the legislative consideration, and to repeat their prayer, that the charter of incorporation under which they have hitherto existed, may be renewed.

Had your memorialists consulted merely their own convenience and security, under the uncertainty in which the success of their application has since that time remained, prudence would have required them gradually to call in their funds, as a measure of precaution, in case of a dissolution. But, considerations of public utility, which have always influenced the conduct of this institution, and a belief that the general interest required, and would, therefore, obtain a continuance of its incorporation, have postponed the adoption of a measure, in whatever manner effected, productive, as they apprehend, of great public as well as private distress.

The superior information of the Legislature renders it unnecessary for your memorialists to detail the general benefits of banking institutions. The experience and the practice of all nations, in modern times, sufficiently prove their utility to trade, their aid in the management of the national revenues, and their necessity in times of public emergency and general calamity. In no country have these benefits been more forcibly exemplified, or more fully experienced, than in the United States. The truth of this remark, is obvious in the amount of the productive capital of the country, above the quantity of the precious metals, in the rapid advancement of agriculture, manufactures, and commerce, the solidity of private as well as public credit, the ease with which the moneyed operations of the Government, of societies, and of individuals, to an immense amount are carried on; the accumulation of wealth, and the general prosperity of the nation. It is not intended to suggest, that the creation of banks has, of itself, produced these effects; the activity, the energy, and enterprise of the people, under the protection of a wise and able Government, have co-operated in their production; but, without the augmentation of the active capital of the country, and the other facilities to business produced by banking institutions, that activity, energy, and enterprise, would have but feebly operated. That the public opinion, the correct arbiter of the public interest, coincides with that of your memorialists, is evidenced by the institution and increase of banks in every State of the Union.

In producing these beneficial effects, your memorialists reflect with pleasure, that the Bank of the United States has contributed in an eminent degree. Its early institution, its extensive and combined operations, and the weight of its capital, at the same time that they afforded it the opportunity of being acquainted with the trading interests of the Union, gave it, also, the means of essentially advancing them, while its disposition to do so has always kept pace with its ability. Not restricted to any particular district, it has acted as the general guardian of commercial credit, and by preventing the balance of trade in the different States from producing a deficiency of money in any, has obviated the mischiefs which would have been thereby produced. It has fostered and protected the banking institutions of the States, and has aided them, when unexpectedly pressed; its disposition towards them is manifested in the quantum of its capital, of which they have generally had the use, not much less in amount than one tenth of the whole.

In its accommodations to individuals it has been liberal, but, at the same time, discreet, with a view as well to their safety as its own. By means of it, the merchant and the manufacturer have been enabled to push their operations to an extent far exceeding what would have been practicable without it; judicious and prudent enterprise has been encouraged, rash and prodigal adventure has been discountenanced, and a sufficient fund being provided, from which reasonable loans could be obtained, usury has been prevented, and usurious lenders repressed.

Its importance in the administration of the finances, and its utility in the operations connected with the public credit have been fully established.

It has afforded a place of deposit for the public moneys, without expense, and without hazard to the Government.

It has aided in the collection of the revenue, by introducing a punctuality in the payment of duties, otherwise unattainable, and by accommodating with loans those who had such payments to make; thereby assuming upon itself the risk, which otherwise had been borne by the Government.

It has, at all times, upon its own responsibility, and at its own expense, transmitted the public moneys from one part of the Union to another, so as to meet the exigencies of the Government, and, from the surplus revenue of one place, to supply the deficiency of another. By this means the Government has always been enabled, with convenience, to pay the interest on the public debt, and to meet its other demands, at such places as its engagements required; an operation which, without such an aid, would have been productive of trouble, hazard, and expense to the Government, and would still have been liable to disappointment.

It has, by its loans, enabled the Government to comply punctually with its engagements, when deficiencies or delays have occurred in the revenue, and has thus enabled it to maintain inviolate the public faith and credit, both at home and abroad. There have been periods when the nation found it necessary to borrow largely from this institution, and, at one time, had upon loan considerably more than three-fourth parts of its active capital.

It has, for the accommodation of the Government, established branches at places disadvantageous to its business, and from which no profit was expected to be derived.

Most of these operations have been attended with inconvenience, and with expense to the bank, but they have always been performed with alacrity and cheerfulness.

While your memorialists thus recount the aids they have afforded, they feel no disposition to forget the advantages they have received from the Government in return. The support which it has given to the bank, and the confidence which it has reposed in it, founded upon a knowledge of its management and condition; have conferred upon it a stability, a dignity, and a splendor, which have preserved its credit from suspicion, and have secured to it the confidence of Europe, as well as America.

Thus, mutually aiding and aided by the Government, has the Bank of the United States, for twenty years, continued its operations, and during that time, has obtained the general acknowledgment that its affairs have been conducted with honor and dignity, with impartiality and candor, with liberality and prudence.

To the original motives for the institution of this bank, the success of experiment is now added; and with the existing proofs of its uses and its services, every consideration of policy and of justice, urge its continuance. Independent of the positive evils its dissolution would produce to the community, the Government would at least be deprived of those advantages it has hitherto derived from its existence, unless they could be supplied from some other quarter, either by the banks established by the several States, or by a bank upon a foundation altogether new. As to the State banks, your memorialists are fully sensible of the benefits resulting from their establishment, and of their sufficiency for the purposes of their institution, the local accommodation of the places in which they exist. But their capitals are by no means adequate to the demands of the General Government, in a time of emergency; a time when the ordinary claims of their own State Governments, and of their own particular customers, would be increased and entitled to preference. Neither could the transmission of the public moneys, from one quarter of the Union to another, be effected with sufficient ease and dispatch, or to the requisite extent, by banks of limited capital, having no connexion with, nor direction over, each other.

Nor would it be prudent in the Government, to trust the deposit of its funds, to the extent to which they sometimes exist in a variety of institutions, united by no common bond, and in no degree responsible for each other; over whose conduct the General Government could have no control, into whose management and condition it could not legally inquire, and which those institutions, even if disposed, could not legally communicate. Independent of the hazard to which the public moneys might be subjected by mismanagement, a power would be placed in hands, which, from want of responsibility, and want of control, might be used to injurious purposes.

In addition, the dignity of the Government seems to require its fiscal operations to be conducted through the medium of an institution organized by itself, of whose ability to answer all the purposes of revenue and public credit, no doubt can exist; of whose situation and proceedings a competent knowledge can be had; over whose conduct a sufficient degree of control to prevent wilful misconduct should exist, and upon whose disposition to assist the Government in times of exigency, reliance may be confidently placed. Such an institution is the Bank of the United States, and such it will remain, if continued in its present form. The amount of its capital gives it sufficient power; its situation is periodically communicated to the Treasury Department: over its proceedings the Government possesses a powerful control, by the extent of its deposits: of its disposition to yield every legitimate assistance to the Government, it has given the strongest evidences, and to insure the continuance of this disposition, its interest and its duty combine.

If a National Bank be thus conducive to the interests of the community, and of importance to the Government, no obvious motive suggests itself to your memorialists against the continuance of the present bank. At any time, and especially at the present, when so large a portion of American property remains unproductive in Europe, so great a reduction in the amount of the active capital of the country as the dissolution of the bank would occasion, must be attended with great and general injury, from the depreciation in value of property, the stagnation of business, and the check to commercial enterprise, which would result from it. And in stopping the operations of such an engine, one of two consequences must be produced, either that in discharging the debts due to the bank, great sacrifices must be made, and every resource of the merchant drained, or, in the failure to pay them, an irreparable blow must be given to commercial credit and punctuality.

Nor is it easy to calculate the effects, which the destruction of the bank would produce in the loss it would occasion to the public revenue, to charitable institutions, widows, children, and others, interested in the stock; from the pressure to which the other banks must be inevitably subjected, from the want of confidence it would create in the stability of our institutions, and from the general derangement of credit.

Under these views and impressions, your memorialists solicit the renewal of their charter; and upon the wisdom and justice of the Legislature, and its regard for the rights and interests of its citizens, they rely for its concession.

Signed on behalf of the stockholders.

TERRITORY OF ORLEANS.

Mr. GILES, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 8th instant, so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to the occupation of that part of West Florida which is included within the boundaries described by the treaty for the acquisition of Louisiana, reported a bill declaring the laws now in force in the Territory of Orleans, to extend to and to have full force and effect to the river Perdido, pursuant to the treaty concluded at Paris on the 30th day of April, 1803, and for other purposes; and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

The following is the bill:

"That the Territory of Orleans, as described by an act, passed the twenty-sixth day of March, one thousand eight hundred and four, entitled 'An act erecting Louisiana into two Territories, and providing for the temporary government thereof,' shall be deemed, and is hereby declared, to extend to the river Perdido; and to include all that territory south of the Mississippi Territory, and eastward of the river Mississippi, to the said river Perdido, according to the provisions of the treaty concluded at Paris, between the United States and France, on the thirtieth day of April, one thousand eight hundred and three.

"Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That all the laws heretofore passed, and now in force in the Territory of Orleans, shall be deemed, and are hereby declared, to extend to and to have full force and effect in the territory described in the first section of this act.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That for the purpose of more conveniently ascertaining the titles and claims to land within the territory described in the first section of this act, the same shall be formed into one district of the Territory of Orleans; and the President is hereby authorized and required to nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint one register of land titles, who shall perform the duties, receive the same compensation for his services, and be subject, in all respects, to the same regulations and provisions, as are by law prescribed to the registers of the other districts of the Territory of Orleans.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the commissioners heretofore appointed, in virtue of the fifth section of the act, entitled 'An act for ascertaining and adjusting titles and claims to land within the Territory of Orleans, and the District of Louisiana,' shall meet within the aforesaid Territory, at such place as the President shall have directed therein for the residence of the register, on or before the — day of —, and they shall not adjourn to any other place, nor for a longer time than three days, until the — day of —, and until they shall have completed the business of their appointment: and it shall be their duty to decide, in a summary way, according to justice and equity, upon all claims filed with the register, conformably, in all respects, to the provisions now in force and observed in the Territory of Orleans; which decisions shall be laid before Congress in the same manner, as is now done in the other districts of the Territory of Orleans, and be subject to the determination of Congress thereupon."

WEDNESDAY, December 19.

CHRISTOPHER GRANT CHAMPLIN, from the State of Rhode Island, took his seat in the Senate.

The bill declaring the laws now in force in the Territory of Orleans, to extend to and to have full force and effect to the river Perdido, pursuant to the treaty concluded at Paris on the 30th day of April, 1803, and for other purposes, was read the second time.

Mr. DANA submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expedience of authorizing such surveys and examinations to be made respecting the lakes or waters, along the northern confines of the United States, as may conduce to the safety and convenience of communication thereon; and that the committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

THURSDAY, December 20.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion made yesterday on the subject; and

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expedience of authorizing such surveys and examinations to be made respecting the lakes or waters along the Northern confines of the United States, as may conduce to the safety and convenience of communication thereon; and that the committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Ordered, That Messrs. DANA, ROBINSON, CONDIT, BRADLEY, and FRANKLIN, be the committee.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act to fix the compensation of the additional Postmaster General," in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill last brought up for concurrence was read, and passed to the second reading.

Mr. GILES, from the committee to whom was referred, on the fourth instant, the petition of Larkin Smith, Collector of the district of Norfolk and Portsmouth, in Virginia, reported a bill for the relief of the collectors of the ports of Norfolk, Baltimore, and Philadelphia; and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill declaring the laws now in force in the Territory of Orleans, to extend to and to have full force and effect to the river Perdido, pursuant to the treaty concluded at Paris on the 30th day of April, 1803, and for other purposes, and on motion, it was agreed that the further consideration thereof be postponed until tomorrow.

On motion, by Mr. DANA,

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before this House a statement of the proceedings which have been had in execution of the act of the 10th of February, 1807, entitled "An act to provide for surveying the coasts of the United States."

On motion, by Mr. DANA,

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to lay before this House information of such measures as have been pursued for making a survey of the coast of the Territory of Orleans, in virtue of the authority committed to him by the thirteenth section of an act, approved the 21st of April, 1806.

FRIDAY, December 21.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, presented the petition of the President and Directors of the Union Bank of Georgetown, praying a charter of incorporation, for reasons stated at large in the petition; which was read, and on motion that it be referred to the committee to whom was referred, on the 11th instant, the petition of the President and Directors of the Bank of Potomac, it was determined in the negative; and,

Ordered, That it be referred to Messrs. SMITH, of Maryland, ANDERSON, and PICKERING, to consider and report thereon by bill or otherwise.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of George Armroyd and Co." in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill last brought up for concurrence was read, and passed to the second reading.

The bill, entitled "An act to fix the compensation of the additional Assistant Postmaster General," was read the second time, and referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon; and Messrs. BRADLEY, LEIB, and SMITH of Maryland, were appointed the committee.

The bill for the relief of the collectors of the ports of Norfolk, Baltimore, and Philadelphia, was read the second time.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill declaring the laws now in force in the Territory of Orleans, to extend to and to have full force and effect to the river Perdido, pursuant to the treaty concluded at Paris on the 30th day of April, 1803, and for other purposes; and on motion, by Mr. LLOYD, that the bill declaring the laws now in force in the Territory of Orleans, to extend to and to have full force and effect to the river Perdido, pursuant to the treaty concluded at Paris on the 30th day of April, 1803, and for other purposes, be referred to a committee, with instructions to report their opinion on the title of the United States to the territory in question, and the grounds on which that opinion may be founded, it was determined in the negative—yeas 5, nays 17, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Dana, Goodrich, Horsey, Lloyd, and Pickering.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Bradley, Campbell, Clay, Condit, Crawford, Cutts, Franklin, Gaillard, Gilman, Lambert, Leib, Mathewson, Pope, Smith of Maryland, Smith of New York, and Tait.

On motion, by Mr. HORSEY, that the further consideration of the bill be postponed until Friday next, it passed in the negative. And, on motion, by Mr. ANDERSON, it was agreed that the further consideration of the bill be postponed until Wednesday next.

On motion, by Mr. HORSEY, that the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before the Senate, all the documents, papers, or other evidences in his possession, relating to the title of the United States to the territory south of the Mississippi Territory, and eastward of the river Mississippi to the river Perdido, and to the boundaries of the said territory, it was determined in the negative—yeas 7, nays 13, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Dana, Goodrich, Horsey, Lambert, Lloyd, Mathewson, and Pickering.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Campbell, Clay, Condit, Crawford, Cutts, Franklin, Gaillard, Leib, Pope, Smith of Maryland, Smith of New York, and Tait.

MONDAY, December 24.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act to continue in force, for a further time, the first section of the act, entitled 'An act further to protect the commerce and seamen of the United States against the Barbary Powers:'" also, a bill, entitled "An act making an additional appropriation to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for the relief and protection of distressed American seamen during the year one thousand eight hundred and ten;" in which bills they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

SENATE.

The bills last brought up for concurrence were read, and passed to the second reading.

Mr. ANDERSON, from the committee on the subject, reported a bill to incorporate the Bank of Potomac. And the bill was read, and passed.

Mr. ANDERSON, from the same committee, also reported a bill to incorporate the Bank of Washington; which was read and passed to the second reading.

The bill, entitled "An act for the relief of George Armroyd and Company," was read the second time, and referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon; and Messrs. LEIB, BRADLEY, and LLOYD, were appointed the committee.

On motion, by Mr. SMITH of Maryland, the bill, entitled "An act making additional appropriation for the relief and protection of distressed American seamen during the year one thousand eight hundred and ten," was read the second time by unanimous consent; and referred to the committee to whom was referred, on the 12th instant, the Message of the President of the United States of that date, on the same subject, to consider and report thereon.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill for the relief of the collectors of the ports of Norfolk, Baltimore, and Philadelphia; and on motion, by Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, the further consideration of the bill was postponed until the first Monday in January next.

Mr. POPE gave notice, that to-morrow he should ask leave to bring in a bill authorizing a subscription on the part of the United States to the stock of the Ohio Canal Company.

PETITION OF IMPORTERS.

Mr. LEIB presented the petition of Samuel Carswell and others, merchants of the city of Philadelphia, stating that they are engaged in the importation of manufactured goods, and have ordered a supply for the coming season, which it is out of their power to countermand; and praying, if Congress shall deem it proper to enforce a non-intercourse with Great Britain, provision may be made by law authorizing the entry of goods imported from that country, to such date as will relieve them from the embarrassments apprehended and stated at large in the petition; which was read, and referred to the committee appointed on the 7th instant on so much of the Message of the President of the United States as concerns the relations between the United States and France and Great Britain, to consider and report thereon by bill or otherwise.

The petition is as follows:

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, in Congress assembled, the petition of the subscribers, merchants of the City of Philadelphia, respectfully sheweth:

That your petitioners, being merchants engaged in the importation of manufactured goods from other countries for the supply of this, would respectfully represent to Congress the peculiar embarrassments to which they will be liable, by the expected revival of the non-intercourse with Great Britain. For this purpose, they beg leave to state the situation of this branch of trade with some particularity.

Many of your petitioners have, according to the usual course of business, sent orders to Great Britain for goods as early as August, and from that time to the middle of October. These orders, when received, are given out to manufacturers to execute; and the goods, when received from them and packed up, are on account and at the risk of the American merchant.

At the time when the President's proclamation was issued, the only precautionary measures, which time would permit your petitioners to take, were to direct the goods they had ordered not to be shipped. The goods will therefore remain at the risk of your petitioners, who, in cases where the goods are paid for, are deprived of the use of their capital, and in other cases will soon be subjected to a heavy charge of interest.

Your petitioners would further represent, that, in consequence of the increase of capital in this country, a material change, the extent of which is not generally understood, has taken place in the business of importing goods. Formerly, goods were imported almost exclusively on credit. The American merchant was a debtor; and, in fact, traded on foreign capital, and chiefly on that of Great Britain. But, in consequence of the great increase of capital in this city, and probably in other parts of the Union, not only is the old debt liquidated, but the importer is enabled to make advances for a great part of his importation. And your petitioners state, with confidence, that about one-third of the goods imported from Great Britain are paid for in advance.

This course of business is not only beneficial to the merchant, but to the country at large, which thereby obtains its supplies on better terms, and the advantages arising from it have made it habitual. Almost all your petitioners have remitted, in part, and some of them in full, for goods which are ordered to come out the ensuing Spring; and if the non-intercourse should be revived, with respect to Great Britain, on the first of February next, the country will not only be deprived of a considerable capital, but your petitioners, individually, be great sufferers, by having their property placed out of their power for an indefinite length of time.

Some of your petitioners are placed in circumstances which may operate with still greater severity against them. They have ordered goods which will have been shipped so early, that it was not possible to countermand them after the issuing of the President's proclamation; and which goods, by detention at the shipping port, by long passages, or accidents at sea, may not arrive until after the first of February, and of course may be liable to seizure and condemnation.

Wherefore, your petitioners, confiding in the equity of their Government, and in its attention to the interests of all classes of citizens, respectfully pray your honorable body to take into consideration the peculiar hardship of their case; and, if Congress shall deem it proper to enforce a non-intercourse with Great Britain, that a law may be passed authorizing the entry of goods imported from that country, to such date as will relieve your petitioners from the embarrassments before mentioned.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. LEIB presented the memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of the city of Philadelphia, praying a renewal of the charter of the Bank of the United States, for reasons therein stated; and the memorial was read, and referred to the committee appointed on the 18th instant, to consider the petition of the President and Directors of the Bank of the United States on the same subject.

The memorial is as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, the memorial of the subscribers, members of the Chamber of Commerce of Philadelphia, respectfully represents:

That your memorialists regard, with interest and concern, the approach of that period at which the charter of the Bank of the United States will expire; and that, from an intimacy with the institution, and an immediate knowledge of its direction; from a view of the interests plainly interwoven with its existence, and an anticipation of the ruin which must follow its dissolution, they are induced, on this occasion, to address you.

Your memorialists, in presenting to your view such considerations as they deem to be urgent for a renewal of the charter of the Bank of the United States, design to confine themselves to such facts, circumstances, and impressions, as are immediately within their own experience and observation. They are sensible that it would be unnecessary to urge upon your consideration any inducement for the continuance of the bank, which may be drawn from its convenience and aptitude to the financial operations of the Government; nor do they deem it proper to obtrude upon your deliberations arguments in favor of the Constitutional existence of an institution which for twenty years has had the support of Legislative and Judicial sanction, and the express respect of our united Confederacy. They are aware that these points are of the first importance, and that they, with every other national consideration connected with the question of renewal, will command your pointed attention. Their views simply are, to present before you such facts, connected with the interest of the citizen, and the well-being of the community, as, in their conception, lay the foundation for practical reasoning in favor of a prolongation of the charter.

The Bank of the United States derives its existence from an act of Congress, passed in February, 1791—coeval with the organization of the Government, and its arrangement of the system of revenue and finance. It had its origin, not from individual solicitation, interest, or speculation, but directly from the Government itself, and avowedly for its purposes. By the striking declaration in its charter, that "a Bank of the United States shall be established," and the still more striking provisions which it contains, in relation to the payment of three-fourths of its capital in the public debt—to the inspection of its accounts and transactions by the officer at the head of the Treasury—to the receipt of its bills or notes in all payments to the United States—to its loans to the government of a particular State, or a foreign Prince—by a direct investment of interest on behalf of the nation, to the extent of one-fifth of its capital—and by a positive pledge of the faith of Government, for its exclusive existence under the laws of the United States,—were impressed upon it the most unquestionable features of national character and lasting continuance. From its origin, its form, and its principles, its duration has been confidently trusted to, in the purchase of its stock, in the establishment of similar institutions, and in the extension of commercial enterprise.

In the purchase of its stock, your memorialists regard, within the immediate sphere of their connexion and observation, an interest to the amount of one million of dollars in the citizens of Pennsylvania. This interest, extending to the proportion of one-tenth part of the capital of the bank, and, as is stated, to one-third part of the stock holden in the United States, has been principally invested at an advance upon the original subscription, which has been paid from faith in the management and confidence in the duration of the institution. This interest, in a large proportion also, it may truly be stated, is the property and dependence, invested upon a principle of security and confidence, of widows, orphans, and charitable associations. To stockholders of this description, the dissolution of the bank must inevitably produce a loss of income and interest to which they look for support, and of capital to an extent which no calculation can ascertain. And your memorialists cannot but think that a sacrifice of interest of such a description can never be required, and will never be made, but to answer national purposes the most important.

To the extent of nearly seven millions, your memorialists understand, the stock of the bank to be holden by foreigners, or persons not residing within the United States. That there has existed no objection, either of policy or propriety, on the part of the Government, to the holding of this stock by aliens, is evinced by the charter's containing no prohibition, and by the recent sale, directly to foreigners, of that portion of the stock holden by the United States. That this extensive interest has been invested from a firm reliance upon the continuance of the bank cannot be doubted. With what propriety and upon what foundation that reliance has been placed your memorialists do not undertake to decide, but content themselves with expressing their confidence that your wisdom and justice will scrupulously guard the faith of the Government from every imputation.

In the establishment of similar institutions under the sanction of the different State Governments, your memorialists conceive that there has been displayed a reliance upon the continuance of the Bank of the United States. In all parts of the Union, where this bank or its branches exist, other banking associations have been established, the interest and concerns of which are materially interwoven with the existence of the National Bank. In the city of Philadelphia, the capital of the banks, exclusive of that of the Bank of the United States, amounts to nearly six millions of dollars; in which the State of Pennsylvania has an interest to the amount of nearly two millions of dollars, and citizens of the State to almost the whole of the residue.

From the collection of the bonds for duties, at the Bank of the United States, it unavoidably results that there is in that bank a great and constant accumulation of the paper of the other banks. This cause, combined with its weight of capital and extensive deposits, has given to the Bank of the United States an obvious importance, in the connexion with other banks, which now renders its continuance almost indispensable to their safety; for, your memorialists are without fear of contradiction when they assert, that, if the Bank of the United States be dissolved, an effect extensively and deeply injurious will be felt by all other banking institutions within the range of its operations. In their apprehension, it is impossible that the Bank of the United States should exact payment from its debtors, and close its concerns, without its producing all the evils of prostrated credit and general delinquency. In these evils the other banks must largely share, and from them must most severely suffer.

DECEMBER, 1810.

Bank of the United States.

SENATE.

Your memorialists; on this point, submit to your consideration, that neither the individuals who have thus extensively embarked their interests in other institutions, nor the governments which have brought them into being, and made them the depositories of the public wealth, could have ever contemplated their exposure to this incidental injury, or perhaps destruction, by the dissolution of the National Bank; and, even if such an exposure might have been contemplated, the event could only be anticipated to proceed from the most pressing public exigency, or a sure calculation of the greatest public gain.

In the extension of commercial enterprise, your memorialists present to your view, further and stronger evidence of reliance upon the continuance, of the bank. The establishment of the bank may justly be regarded as the era which marks the rise of commercial credit, confidence, and enterprise. A recurrence to the state of our country, antecedently to this establishment, will show the truth of the remark, and leave no doubt upon the mind, as to the instrumentality of the bank in effecting the change. The formation of the bank called into circulation a mass of torpid wealth, opened large and liberal sources of accommodation to enterprise, and enforced, and insured, punctuality in commercial dealing; the effect was soon and sensibly felt by the commerce and agriculture of the country, and its salutary character has been shown, in the general diffusion of confidence and prosperity. No sooner was the bank established upon that sure foundation, on which faith in its permanence and direction caused it to rest, than its stock advanced in value, and attracted a large amount of foreign capital to the country; from the introduction of this foreign capital, which was invested at a high advance, proceeded these important results; that the citizen realized a gain in the advance paid by the foreigner, and the country was enabled to trade upon the foreign capital at an interest below its market value. Other institutions rose upon the liberated capital of the citizen, and a general system of accommodation gave a spring to enterprise; the merchant, mechanic, and manufacturer, whose probity and industry inspired confidence, was enabled to obtain the means of exertion, and to extend his transactions. The borrowers have calculated with confidence upon a continuance of the loan, so long as they are deemed safe for its repayment, and have not anticipated a demand which may find them unprepared, and cost them a sacrifice of either property or credit.

It is upon this foundation, that extensive commercial and manufacturing concerns have arisen in the country; and large investments have been made upon the faith of a general credit. To dissolve the Bank of the United States, is not only to check, but to destroy, this credit, inasmuch, as not only that bank, but all others at all connected with it, must compel the payment of their debts. In such an event, it cannot be supposed that the debtors could find adequate resources to enable them to meet their engagements; and an extensive delinquency would mark the loss of the banks, and the destruction of credit.

Your memorialists are aware that it may be urged, that the limitation in the charter of the Bank of the United States was a standing admonition to the various interests connected with that institution, that a period was appointed for its legal existence, which it could not reasonably be expected to pass. From the existence of this limitation, open and notorious to all, it is argued, that no injustice can arise from the refusal of Government to grant a continuance of privileges, beyond the time for which they were originally conferred; but your memorialists are confident that they speak the language of general opinion, when they state, that the limitation was designed as a check, by which the institution might be controlled, as a guard against the mischiefs of a defective administration, or as a point of time when it might come to an end, if it were required, by decisive reasons of public necessity; but that it never was designed, and never has been received, as the period of its dissolution, if its administration was marked by ability, integrity, and impartiality, and its existence productive of public good.

To the administration of the bank, your memorialists freely yield the testimony of their decided approbation; so far as the transactions of the bank have been open to their observation, its direction has displayed a liberal desire to subserve the great objects of the institution, by diffusing, with impartiality, its accommodations to the greatest extent, compatible with its fundamental interests. It is but justice to this direction, further to add, that during the current year, a crisis of the greatest interest to the bank, as your memorialists fully believe, its accommodations have not been contracted within the limits appointed by sound considerations of safety and propriety.

How far the convenience of the Government may be affected by the dissolution, or by a material alteration of the bank, your memorialists do not undertake to declare; they entertain, however, the strongest persuasion, that considerations, not only of great convenience, but of necessity, as regards the interest of individuals, and the prosperity of the community, urge the continuance of the bank. On this point your attention is earnestly solicited to the existing state of the country; its unavoidable reliance upon accommodations from the banks; the use, convenience, and importance of the Bank of the United States, in its present form, to the community, and the evils which impend from its destruction.

In a view of the state of the country, at the present moment, as connected with this subject, the following particulars, they trust, will receive your attention: The commerce of the United States, from a combination of causes, has been, for a period of no inconsiderable duration, subject to great embarrassments. During the current year, this embarrassment has been much increased, and the merchant is laboring under the pressure of a heavy sequestration of property abroad, and a failure of resources at home. Of the property which is sequestered, a large proportion had long lain unproductively on the merchants' hands, and was exported with the hope of being converted into the means by which his engagements might be met. Under such circumstances, the reliance of many is necessarily upon a temporary use of the capital found in the banks, to which they have confidently trusted, as a resource, whilst their credit shall continue, and until their property shall be relieved.

In the current year the exportation of specie from the United States has been to its accustomed extent, and the importation has been inconsiderable in amount. This circumstance has, of course, tended to increase the embarrassment of the merchant, inasmuch as it has necessarily contracted his accommodations. From these causes it has resulted, that the demand for money is uncommonly great, and the means for supplying that demand are unusually limited.

In this state of things, the mercantile part of the country sees before it, in the coming year, an extraordinary amount of debt to the United States, for duties, a large proportion of which, is payable upon goods that have hitherto been unproductive; and it anticipates the privation of that aid, which the bank has always been accustomed to give towards the payment of the Custom House bonds. In addition to this, with the expiration of the charter of the Bank of the United States, it sees a suspension of the circulation of fifteen millions of dollars, the stated amount of its ordinary accommodations. It sees an accumulation of the precious metals in the bank, to the amount of its capital; it sees seven millions of that capital withdrawn from the country; and it sees, that payment of duties can no longer be made to the Government in the notes of the National Bank, but that payment must be made in specie. With this prospect, and the additional certainty, that accommodation and confidence will be universally succeeded by exaction and distrust, your memorialists are persuaded, that it will be in vain for individuals, for the chartered institutions, or the Government itself, to expect the fulfilment of engagements, or to rely upon the performance of contracts.

To the minds of your memorialists, the Bank of the United States, in its present form, presents a striking character for its use, convenience, and importance to the community. In addition to the various points of view in which its value has been already considered, its uses are further to be regarded, in its affording a convenient and safe medium of circulation throughout the United States; and in the facilities which it grants, by means of its drafts, in the transposition of funds from one part of the country to another, with perfect security. In a national and individual point of view, its utility is also displayed, in having and exercising, by means of its peculiar connexion of several branches in one common interest, the power of guarding against the inconvenience and evil, which might result from the balance of trade between different parts of the Union, producing a local deficiency of the circulating medium. But, above all, your memorialists regard as inestimable, an institution which, in its ample resources, possesses the power, and in the independent and liberal spirit of its direction, manifests the will, effectually to aid both Government and the private citizen, in case of a sudden and serious emergency.

To predict, with certainty, the extent of the evils which must inevitably flow from a dissolution of the bank, is beyond the power of your memorialists. They conceive that, among these evils, however, may certainly be placed an extensive and aggravating loss, by all persons interested in the banking associations of the country, a destructive disregard of punctuality in the performance of contracts, both towards the Government and the citizen; a wide spreading bankruptcy, which will be felt by the commercial, manufacturing, and agricultural interests; a diffidence of the stability of Government, both at home and abroad, and a prostration of that confidence and credit, which have so happily and successfully administered to the enterprise and prosperity of the country.

From the view which your memorialists have taken of this subject, and the observations which they have submitted to your consideration, it is apparent, that their earnest prayer to you is, that a renewal of the charter of the Bank of the United States may be granted; and a confirmation thereby be given to public confidence, private tranquillity, general credit, and national prosperity.

CONDY RAGUET,

WEDNESDAY, December 26.

The Senate assembled; and on motion, adjourned to 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

THURSDAY, December 27.

JENKIN WHITESIDE, from the State of Tennessee, took his seat in the Senate.

Mr. LEIB, from the committee, appointed on the 7th instant, to consider the subject, reported a bill to incorporate the subscribers to the Farmers' Bank of Alexandria; and the bill was read and passed to the second reading.

The PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, prepared in obedience to the directions of the act, entitled "An act regulating the currency of foreign coins, in the United States," passed April 10, 1806; and the report was read and ordered to lie for consideration.

Mr. LEIB gave notice that to-morrow he should ask leave to bring in a bill for the establishment of a quartermaster's department.

The bill, entitled "An act to continue in force, for a further time, the first section of the act, entitled 'An act further to protect the commerce and seamen of the United States against the Barbary Powers,'" was read the second time.

The bill to incorporate the Bank of Washington was read the second time.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland, presented the memorial of Thomas Corcoran and others, citizens of Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, stating that they had commenced certain improvements in the channel of the river Potomac, near that town, but that they were impeded in their progress by a legal injunction, on suggestion that they might do injury to the bridge lately erected over the aforementioned river: And that the petitioners are constrained to lay their case before Congress, and to ask their interposition and relief. And the petition was read and referred to a select committee, to consist of five members, to consider and report thereon, by bill or otherwise; and Messrs. SMITH, of Maryland, FRANKLIN, CHAMPLIN, GAILLARD, and BRADLEY, were appointed the committee.

Mr. HORSEY gave notice that to-morrow he should ask leave to bring in a bill authorizing the sale and grant of a certain quantity of public land to the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal Company.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act to authorize the Secretary of War to ascertain and settle, by the appointment of Commissioners, the exterior line of the public land at West Point, with the adjoining proprietor;" in which bill they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill last brought up for concurrence was read and passed to the second reading.

Mr. ANDERSON presented the petition of David Porter, stating that he commanded the flotilla stationed at New Orleans, during the existence of the laws prohibiting intercourse with France, and that he there seized, and prosecuted at his own expense, to condemnation, three vessels, the proceeds of which were distributed under the revenue laws, but that his proportion thereof did not amount to the cost of prosecution. He therefore prays Congress to relinquish to him their proportion of the penalties and forfeitures which may have been incurred by said seizures, as a remuneration for his services; and the petition was read, and referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon, by bill or otherwise; and Messrs. ANDERSON, CAMPBELL, and CLAY, were appointed the committee.

Mr. POPE asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill authorizing a subscription on the part of the United States to the stock of the Ohio Canal Company; and the bill was read and passed to the second reading.

OCCUPATION OF WEST FLORIDA.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill declaring the laws now in force in the Territory of Orleans to extend to, and to have full force and effect, to the river Perdido, pursuant to the treaty concluded at Paris on the 30th of April, 1803; and for other purposes.

The question was on the bill's passage to a third reading.

Mr. POPE.—Mr. President, I regret that the honorable chairman of the committee who reported this bill is not here to give it that support which his talents, information, and the importance of the subject authorize us to expect. His absence has devolved on me, as a member of the committee, and a representative of that section of the Union more immediately interested in the subject before us, to explain to the Senate some of the grounds which induced them to make this report. The first important question which the proclamation of the President and this bill presents for consideration is, whether, or not, the United States have a good title to the territory in question. Before I examine the treaty of cession from France to the United States of 1803, the source of our claim, permit me to inquire what were the limits of Louisiana in that quarter to which this subject leads us before the treaty and cession of 1762-3, between France, Spain, and Great Britain? On this subject, however, I believe there is no contrariety of opinion. Before this period, Louisiana extended east of the river Mississippi to the river Perdido. France and Spain, by the Treaty of 1719, established this boundary between Florida, now called East Florida and Louisiana. The ancient limits of Louisiana have been so fully ascertained by the documents laid before Congress at different times, and the numerous discussions the subject has undergone, that I should only waste the time of the Senate in attempting to throw any new light on it. I shall only refer the Senate to one additional evidence that this river was the ancient eastern boundary of this province. Mr. Smollet, in his continuation of "Hume's History of England," states the answer of the British Government to the propositions made by France for peace early in the year 1761, from which it appears that France then claimed the river Perdido as their eastern limit, nor does this fact appear to have been contested by the British Minister. It appears that previous to the war which terminated in 1763, Louisiana comprehended nearly the whole country watered by the Mississippi and its branches. I find it stated in a pamphlet published in New York, that France, by a secret cession, contemporaneous with the treaty called the Family Compact of 1761, transferred this country to Spain, to induce her to become her ally in the war against Great Britain; and although I can find no evidence to support this statement, yet the events of that war, previous to that period, renders it at least probable. It will be remembered that the arms of Great Britain had triumphed over those of France both by sea and land. France had lost Canada, and a great number of ships of war. Spain was not then a party in the war, and, to induce her to become so, it seems probable that France, under the pressure of adverse fortune, ceded to her this province. But, as this statement does not correspond with the documents on our tables, nor the views of others who have examined this subject, we are compelled to take it for granted, that the cession of West Louisiana, with the island of New Orleans, to Spain, and of East Louisiana, since called West Florida, to Great Britain, were made at the same time, in the year 1762. It is, however, well known that France made the cession to Great Britain at the instance, and for the benefit of Spain, to enable her, with the cession of Florida, now called East Florida, to obtain a restitution of Cuba. The whole of Louisiana, not conquered by Great Britain, may, with propriety, be said to have been given up, or ceded to Spain. Let us now examine that part of the treaty of cession between the United States and France of 1803, which relates to this question. By that treaty, we acquired Louisiana as fully, and in the same manner as it had been acquired by France from Spain, in virtue of the Treaty of St. Ildefonso of the 1st of October, 1800. By this treaty, Spain retroceded Louisiana to France "with the same extent it then had in the hands of Spain, and that it had when France possessed it, and such as it should be after the treaties subsequently entered into between Spain and other States." That this extract from that treaty is correct, cannot be doubted, as it has never been denied by Spain. The word "retrocede" in this treaty has, I believe, occasioned more doubt with regard to the meaning of this cession than any expression contained in it, but cannot, when the subject is properly examined, have the effect contended for. It is said that as France ceded to Spain, in 1762, Louisiana west of the Mississippi, including the island of New Orleans, the word "retrocede" must limit the cession to what had been previously ceded by France to Spain; but if it be true that Louisiana east and west of the Mississippi was ceded to Spain in the year 1761, although East Louisiana was afterwards ceded by France, with the consent of Spain to Great Britain, the word "retrocede" might, with propriety, be used with reference to the original grant to Spain in 1761, or if, what will not be denied, the cession of East Louisiana to Great Britain by France, was at the instance, and for the benefit of Spain, Spain, in 1800, after she had acquired East Louisiana, alias West Florida, so called by Great Britain after 1763, could well say to France, I re-grant to you what you ceded to me, and on my account, or, at least, so much as I can re-grant consistently with the treaties I have since made; and this seems to be the plain and evident meaning of the instrument. If the parties had meant to confine the retrocession to the limits of the cession, made by France to Spain, of Louisiana west of the Mississippi, including the island of New Orleans, they would have used the same description. They would certainly have stopped after saying the extent it then had in the hands of Spain. But, to prevent mistake or misconception, they add, "that it had when France possessed it," and, what is still more conclusive of the meaning of the parties, they go on to say, "and such as it should be after the treaties subsequently entered into between Spain and other States." As Spain had never entered into any treaty with regard to the western boundary of Louisiana, and as the only treaties to which the parties could have alluded was that of 1793 with Great Britain, and of 1795 with the United States, both relative to limits on the east side of the Mississippi, it is perfectly clear that the contracting parties meant to comprehend whatever of Louisiana, on the east side of the Mississippi, Spain had a title to. If the construction I contend for is not admitted, then the latter parts of the description will have no effect, contrary to a settled principle of law and common sense, that every part of an instrument shall have effect, if it can by any reasonable construction. To strengthen the construction for which I insist, it may not be amiss to consider the views of the French Government at the time this Treaty of St. Ildefonso was made. They no doubt acquired this province with an intention of holding it, and it was an object of national pride to regain as much as practicable of the colonies which had been lost under the old Government. Besides, they could not be ignorant of the importance of East Louisiana, now West Florida, to the security of New Orleans; and, as the practicability of obtaining it at that time from Spain cannot be doubted, the presumption is irresistible that the cession was intended to embrace it. I had intended to have ascertained at the Department of State the ground of objection with Spain to the surrender of that country to the United States, but have not made the inquiry. I do not, however, think it difficult to account for the conduct of Spain. My conjecture is, that France, after she had sold Louisiana to the United States and received the price stipulated, secretly advised Spain not to surrender it, having at that time formed the project which she is now attempting to execute, of acquiring the whole Spanish Empire. Her interest was, therefore, identified with that of Spain, and she was, no doubt, willing to unite with Spain in giving the most limited construction to the cession to the United States. I find that Congress, by an act passed on the 24th of February, 1804, have solemnly asserted our right to this territory and authorized the President to take possession of it, and to establish a port of entry, &c., on the Mobile, whenever he should deem it expedient. The time when, and circumstances under which this step should be taken, were submitted to the discretion of the Executive. I may be permitted to ask why, if we had no title to this territory, the President was urged to take possession by force, and censured for not doing it? If my recollection is accurate, all parties agreed we ought to have the country—they only differed as to the mode of acquiring it. The President, influenced by that policy which has hitherto guided the present Administration, of avoiding making this nation a party in the present European war, in the exercise of the discretionary power vested in him by that act, did not think proper to seize upon it by force, but to wait for the occurrence of events to throw it into our hands without a struggle.

The expediency of taking possession of this territory cannot, it appears to me, admit of a doubt. If the President had refused or hesitated to meet the wishes of the people of West Florida by extending to them the protection of the American Government, and they had sought security in the arms of a foreign Power, what should we have heard? He would have been charged with imbecility, and fear of incurring responsibility. He would have been denounced as unworthy of the station his country had assigned him. Let it be remembered that the Orleans country is our most vulnerable part—remote from our physical force—a climate more fatal to our people than the sword of a victorious enemy—and that an enemy in possession of West Florida can with great facility cut off New Orleans from the upper country. If the fortunate moment had not been seized, this province would have fallen into the hands of a foreign Power, or, if time had been given for intrigue to mature itself, another Burr plot would probably have risen from the ashes of the first, more formidable to the integrity of this empire. Burr, like Archimedes, fancied that if he had a place to stand upon—a place beyond the jurisdiction of the United States to rally his followers—he could overturn the Government. He has, it is true, fled from the frowns of an indignant country; but he was not alone. Let an opportunity be afforded, and a thousand Burrs would throw off the mask and point their arms against the Federal Union. On a subject of such interest, it would have been criminal in those appointed to watch over the national safety to have hesitated. I was surprised to hear this procedure pronounced a robbery, and making of war. Why should our sympathies be awakened in favor of Spain? What claim has the Spanish Government upon our moderation and forbearance? What has been her conduct? From the moment we became an independent nation she has been intriguing to separate the Western country from the Atlantic States. She has made, at different periods, and as late as the year 1797, in violation of her treaty of 1795 with this country, direct propositions to the Western people to secede from the Union, and to accomplish her object at least attempted the use of means the most corrupt. What has been her conduct since we acquired Louisiana? If I am correctly informed, our deserters and slaves who have taken refuge in Florida in many instances have not been surrendered, and enormous duties have been imposed on our vessels navigating the Mobile. Under all these provocations, sufficient to have drawn upon them from almost any other nation an open declaration of war, our Government, influenced by that pacific policy which has hitherto regulated its course towards foreign nations, exercised patience and forbearance. And since the late revolution in Spain, I believe it will not be pretended that this Government has manifested any disposition to throw our weight into the scale of France against the Spanish party. Our Government has taken no step in relation to West Florida until compelled by a regard to our own safety. The Executive in the proceeding under consideration has used language the most conciliatory, and on the face of his proclamation given a pledge that this Government will at any time enter into amicable negotiations on the subject of our claim to this territory, if it shall be disputed.

There are other at least plausible grounds upon which this bill as an original proposition might be supported entirely independent of the cession. Spain is indebted to us a large amount for spoiliations committed on our commerce; and as there is no Government at present towards which the ordinary proceeding can be pursued to obtain payment, could we not, on the principle of the attachment law, as an act of self-justice, seize on this territory to secure satisfaction?

As this measure has been emphatically called an act of robbery and war, it may not be amiss to consider the political state of the Spanish colonies in relation to the Spanish Government in the hands of the Junta, and the new dynasty about to be established by Bonaparte. It may be said, perhaps, that the late alienation of the Spanish Crown and the revolution in Spain have dissolved the tie which connects them with the mother country. On this point I will not detain the Senate. If the French arms shall be successful in Spain, of which I believe few entertain much doubt, and the Junta shall be driven from Old Spain to any of the colonies, their political character must cease, and they can no longer claim the exercise of any jurisdiction or sovereignty over the colonies. The colonies are not bound together by any political bond unconnected with the mother country; they are subject to the mother country, but, the moment she is conquered, they are at liberty to provide for themselves, unless, indeed, the Emperor of France or King Joseph can claim them. France, in an official exposé, and King Joseph, by proclamation, have declared their willingness that the colonies should become independent, provided they do not connect themselves with Great Britain. If France, therefore, shall, which is probable, conquer the mother country, we are fully authorized by her public declaration to the world to acquire, with the consent of the inhabitants, not only West but East Florida, Cuba, or any other province which we shall deem it expedient to connect with the United States. This bill may be justified, independent of title, by the law of self-preservation. Have we any assurance that the Spanish Government will maintain their neutrality in this territory if we should be involved in a war with either France or Great Britain? Can they, or will they, prevent the march of an enemy's forces through that territory into the United States? No, sir; we have every reason to expect the contrary. Considering how vulnerable we are from this territory, its present state, and the aspect of our foreign affairs, it appears to me that we are authorized to take possession of it as a measure of national security. It may be objected that taking the property of others by force tends to relax the morals of the people, by destroying that criterion of right and wrong, the observance of which is so necessary to the purity of our Republic; and I am ready to admit that we ought to proceed upon this principle of necessity and expediency with great caution, and never to act upon it but in extreme and evident cases. Had we a colony on the coast of England or France, similarly situated, we know they would not hesitate. When we reflect that our property is seized by almost every nation; that the laws and usages of nations are disregarded by nearly all Europe; that their conduct has been lately marked with a degree of perfidy and rapacity unexampled in the history of the civilized world; that they have in fact become States of Barbary; it appears to me that we ought not, as regards them, to be over nice or squeamish upon questions of this sort. Shall we sit here with our arms folded until the enemy is at our gates? If we waste our time in discussion and refining abstract questions of right and wrong, we shall lose our independence, and we shall deserve to lose it. I had hoped this bill would have passed without much debate; I know the people are tired of long speeches and documents. This fondness for lengthy discussions, has even drawn upon Congress the reproaches of the ladies; they begin to say—less talk, more action.

After Mr. POPE had concluded, cision on the first day of discussion. This was the first time the claim of the United States had been presented to the Senate in a shape to afford scope for discussion. He wished time for consideration, and moved to postpone the further consideration of the subject to Monday.

Motion lost—ayes 5. It was then moved to postpone it until to-morrow, and carried.

FRIDAY, December 28.

Mr. LEIB asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill for the establishment of a quartermaster's department; and the bill was read and passed to the second reading.

Mr. HORSEY asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill authorizing the sale and grant of a certain quantity of public land to the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal Company; and the bill was read and passed to the second reading.

Mr. SMITH, of New York, presented the memorial of David Phillips and others, brass founders of the city of New York, praying the removal of the duty on the importation of zinc or spelter, for reasons therein stated; and the memorial was read and ordered to lie for consideration.

The bill, entitled "An act to authorize the Secretary of War to ascertain and settle, by the appointment of Commissioners, the exterior line of the public land at West Point, with the adjoining proprietor," was read the second time.

The bill to incorporate the Bank of Potomac was read the second time.

Mr. BRENT presented the petition of the President and Directors of the Bank of Alexandria, praying the renewal of their charter of incorporation, for reasons stated at large in the petition, which was read, and referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon by bill or otherwise; and Messrs. BRENT, CHAMPLIN, and ROBISON, were appointed the committee.

Mr. DANA gave notice that on Monday he should ask leave to bring in a bill for the benefit of seamen of the United States.

OCCUPATION OF WEST FLORIDA.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill respecting the territory west of the Perdido.

Mr. HORSEY addressed the Senate as follows:

Mr. President: The bill under consideration contains two important provisions. The first in effect incorporates with the Territory of Orleans the province of West Florida east of the Mississippi, as far as the river Perdido; the second extends to that part of the province thus incorporated the laws now in force within the said Territory.

These provisions naturally involve two questions: first, whether the United States have a good title to that part of the province described in the bill; and secondly, whether it would be expedient for the Government of the United States to take possession of it by force.

Before I proceed to consider these questions, I beg leave, Mr. President, to advert to what may be considered a preliminary question. I refer to the authority of the President of the United States to issue his proclamation and the accompanying orders of the 27th of August last, directing the forcible occupation of that territory. I deem it material to consider this point, because, if the proclamation were unauthorized, then Congress are not committed by it, nor are they bound to give it their sanction.

If the President had any authority to issue this proclamation, that authority must have been derived either under the Constitution of the United States or under some act or acts of Congress. The President has no power which does not proceed from one or the other of these sources. The Constitution has given to Congress the exclusive power of making laws and declaring war—to the President the power of executing the laws of the Union. The powers of the one are legislative, of the other executive. The question then would be, whether the President in issuing this proclamation has not transcended the limits of his powers.

Sir, what is the nature and import of this proclamation? In my humble conception both legislation and war. War—because it directs the occupation of this territory by a military force. The regular troops of the United States are ordered to march, and if they should not be found adequate to the object, the Governors of the Orleans and Mississippi Territories are directed to call out the militia of their respective territories, to co-operate with the regular forces. But we shall be told, sir, that the President, in issuing this proclamation, has taken the precaution to direct that in case any particular place, however small, should remain in possession of a Spanish force, the commanding officer is not to proceed to employ force against it, but to make immediate report thereof to the Secretary of State. Suppose while your commanding officer is making this report, the Spanish force sallies out and makes an attack upon your army, or suppose a Spanish army, with Governor Folch at their head, should march from East Florida with the view of repelling the invasion of this territory; what are Governor Claiborne and his army to do? Ground their arms and surrender themselves prisoners of war; or are they, sir, to drop their muskets and take to their heels? These are the only alternatives presented—they must either surrender, run, or fight. And who will doubt which of these alternatives the gallantry of an American army would impel them to choose! Sir, a conflict would be inevitable.

But while the President has been so affectedly cautious with respect to a Spanish force, he has overlooked altogether the contingency of resistance on the part of the revolutionists. These patriots it would seem had called a convention and issued a declaration of independence, and now it appears have formed and established a regular Government, which is organized and in operation. If these proceedings are not all a sham, the territory in question is now in the possession of a people claiming to be sovereign and independent; and is it supposable that this people can behave so dastardly as to submit, without a struggle, to the incursion of a hostile army, whose avowed object is the conquest of the country and the subversion of its constitution and independence? And here permit me to remark, that the style and tenor of the letter from the Secretary of State of the 15th of November, 1810, to Governor Holmes, in answer to the letter of the President of the convention praying the recognition and protection of the United States, are not admirably calculated to give a welcome reception to the American Army. If then resistance should be offered on the part of the constitutionalists, what is your army to do? The orders contain no proviso in this particular, requiring that the fact should be reported to the Department of State; but their clear intent is, that force should be employed. Under such circumstances it is not to be expected that this measure of the Executive will result in war? Is it not to be expected, that either the Spaniards or the Conventionalists will attempt to repel this palpable infringement upon their rights and territory?

But, sir, this proclamation is not only war, but it is an act of legislation too. It annexes the territory in question to the Orleans Territory; it creates a governor; it enacts laws, and appropriates money. It gives the Governor of the Orleans Territory all the authorities and functions over this particular territory which he possesses by virtue of his office as governor, and makes an appropriation of a sum of money, not exceeding twenty thousand dollars. This proclamation is substantially the bill under discussion, except that it goes much further. The first section of the bill only contains an annexation of the territory in question to the Orleans Territory—this the proclamation has already done. The second section only extends the laws of that territory to the particular territory in question—and this too the proclamation has already done. The only material difference in fact existing between the proclamation and this bill is, that the proclamation contains the further and important provision for raising the troops and the money necessary for carrying it into execution. And here, sir, I will take the liberty to remark that I do not consider this bill the only one intended on this subject. This is a mere entering wedge—when this is passed, Congress are committed to pass another, providing the necessary military and pecuniary means to carry this act into execution; and indeed I should not be surprised, if, before the close of the session, a bill were introduced to take possession of East as well as West Florida.

If the President had no power under the Constitution to issue this proclamation, I think it equally clear he had none under any existing laws of Congress. The act of the 31st of October, 1803, authorizing the President of the United States to take possession of and occupy the territory ceded by France to the United States, by the treaty concluded at Paris on the 30th of April, 1803, I apprehend, expired on the 1st day of October, 1804; to which period it was limited by the first section of the act for erecting Louisiana into two Territories, and providing for the temporary government thereof; passed the 20th day of March, 1804.

This section enacts, that "the act passed the 31st day of October, entitled 'An act to enable the President of the United States to take possession of the territories ceded by France to the United States, by the treaty concluded at Paris, on the 30th day of April, 1803; and for the temporary government thereof,' shall continue in force until the 1st day of October, 1804, anything therein to the contrary notwithstanding; on which said 1st day of October, this act shall commence, and have full force, and shall continue in force for and during the term of one year, and to the end of the next session of Congress, which may happen thereafter." Let it be recollected that at the time this last mentioned act passed, the President had fulfilled his powers, under the act of the 31st of October, 1803, so far as it respected the taking possession of Louisiana. Possession had been actually and formally delivered, and the stock created and transferred to the French Government, according to the stipulations of the treaty. Besides, the very nature and design of the act of the 26th March, independent of the express limitation, superseded the act of the 31st of October.

But it is said, there are acts of Congress, which, though contemplating a present possession in a foreign authority, also contemplate an ultimate possession by the United States, under which the proclamation may be justified, even though the act of the 31st of October should have expired. The acts here referred to, I understand to be the act of the 24th of February, 1804, for laying and collecting duties within the territories ceded by France to the United States, the act abovementioned of the 26th of March, erecting Louisiana into two Territories, and the act of the 2d of March, 1805, authorizing the establishment of a Government in the Territory of Orleans, similar to the Government of the Mississippi Territory. The President himself admits, in his message at the opening of the session, that those laws contemplate a present possession in a foreign Power; but he further says, they contemplate an eventual possession by the United States. But, sir, let me ask what sort of possession? A possession by force? No, sir, not a single provision can be shown to justify such a construction. But a possession to be obtained by a friendly negotiation. I am warranted in this construction, not merely by the letter of those laws, by the lapse of time since their enactment, by the express official declaration of Mr. Madison himself, while Secretary of State. It is a notorious fact, that when the act of the 24th of February passed, the Marquis D'Yrujo, then the Minister of His Catholic Majesty in the United States, in a solemn form, protested against that law; and that Mr. Madison, by a letter dated on the 19th of March, assured the Marquis that the provisions relating to Louisiana "would not be extended beyond the acknowledged limits of the United States, until it shall be rendered expedient by friendly elucidation and adjustments with His Catholic Majesty."

Upon the whole, sir, I have not been able to discover the shadow of authority, on the ground of which the President issued this proclamation. He has recited none, amidst all his recitals, and none appears to me but his own mere will and pleasure.

The act I therefore cannot view in any other light than an unwarrantable assumption of power and a violation of the Constitution.

Considering then, sir, this act of the Executive as illegal and unauthorized, we are fully at liberty to enter into the discussion of the great questions of title and expediency; a task which I will proceed to discharge to the best of my ability.

The first I propose to examine is, the title of the United States to the territory in question. With respect to this, I perceive, it unfortunately happens that honorable gentlemen who support the bill do not precisely accord in sentiment. The gentleman from Vermont (Mr. BRADLEY) has frankly conceded that the United States acquired no title under the Treaty of St. Ildefonso. Another gentleman (Mr. SMITH, of Maryland,) has declared that the United States did derive a title under that treaty and disclaims the title set up by the honorable gentleman from Vermont. I shall not undertake to decide which of the two gentlemen is right, if either be, but shall contend, and humbly expect to prove, that both are wrong.

What is the nature of the title set up by the gentleman from Vermont? Not under the treaty, he has candidly owned, but he supposes a title to exist on the ground of certain quaint principles of the common law, relative to the doctrines of estoppel and occupancy. I am extremely happy, sir, to find that honorable gentleman introducing the common law as authority upon this floor, especially on so great an occasion. His doctrines certainly evince both research and ingenuity, and show that he, like many with whom he acts, has not absolutely lost his veneration for the black letter. What are his doctrines? Why in the first place, he says, admitting that Spain did not cede Florida to France by the Treaty of St. Ildefonso, and admitting that France had no title to Florida on the 30th of April, 1803, when she ceded Louisiana to the United States, yet, as France has since acquired a title to the crown of Spain and her colonies, and as the French Plenipotentiary, when the treaty of 30th of April, 1803, was executed, did state and induce the American Ministers to understand and believe that Florida was comprehended in the cession, why the title, though France had it not when the treaty was signed, yet having it subsequently, immediately attached in the United States, and France is estopped from saying anything to the contrary. This argument, sir, begs everything: 1st. That the declarations on the part of the French Minister were made; 2dly, that being made they would operate to pass the title contrary to the express letter of the treaty; and lastly, that France has acquired a good title to the crown of Spain and her colonies. I will yield to the gentleman his first proposition, and grant, as he seems to desire it, that these representations were made —and what do they prove? Not that the title passed, but that the French Minister was too deep for the American Plenipotentiaries, and, to use a jockey phrase, took them in. Sir, the only legal effect of such a fraud would be, to violate the treaty—to annul the contract. France, to be sure, would be bound upon principles of equity to refund the purchase money.

If then, sir, I am correct in stating, that no conversations or verbal declarations, however fraudulent, would operate to control or vary the plain letter and intent of the treaty, as appearing on the face of it, then upon the gentleman's own acknowledgments no title to Florida could have passed to the United States under the treaty of 1803. For the gentleman has unequivocally admitted that Florida was not ceded by Spain to France by the treaty of St. Ildefonso, and France, it is admitted on all sides, by the treaty of 1803, only ceded to the United States Louisiana, as fully, and in the same manner she acquired it from Spain by the Treaty of St. Ildefonso; nor, sir, can I admit that France has acquired a legitimate title to the crown and colonies of Spain, which must also appear before the gentleman can avail himself of his argument. What, Mr. President, is the nature of this title? Was it obtained bona fide for a fair and full consideration? No, sir, but by the most abominable perfidy, corruption, and duress, of which the pages of history furnish an example. Was not the royal family deceived by artifice from Madrid to Bayonne? Was not the old Monarch compelled to resign his crown to Ferdinand the Seventh, and was not that Prince a prisoner of Bonaparte; and, while in this condition, and, for aught we know, the bayonet at his breast, or the cup to his lips, constrained to resign his crown to the Emperor of France? Sir, what sort of title is this? Upon the eternal principles of justice, upon the principles of the common law and common sense, an instrument thus obtained is not obligatory on the party executing it.

But have the people of Spain acquiesced? No, sir; the instant publicity was given to the transaction they became indignant, and with one voice rose, resolved to resist this usurpation. To this hour they have not submitted.

But the gentleman has said that Spain is no longer able to hold Florida; that foreign emissaries will take it if the United States do not; and that it may be lawfully taken by the United States on the ground of the law of occupancy.

That title may be acquired by occupancy is not to be doubted. It is the mode by which title to property was originally acquired; but to obtain a title in this way the country must be vacant, uninhabited and not claimed by another proprietor. But in this instance is the territory vacant—or uninhabited—or abandoned by its proprietors? No, sir. The territory is either in the possession of Spain and claimed by her, or of the revolutionists, and if either be in possession, by the law of occupancy, you have no right to disturb them. Clearly then, sir, upon the principles and admissions of the honorable gentleman from Vermont, the United States have no title to Florida.

And now, sir, with the indulgence of the Senate, I will proceed to consider as briefly as possible the nature of this title as derived under the Treaty of St. Ildefonso. Here, it will be granted, I meet the question fairly. This, I presume, is the title relied upon, as well by the Executive as the majority of the supporters of this bill.

In order fully to understand this subject, it is necessary to inquire into the principal cause of the war of 1756. The eastern boundary of Louisiana, I believe, was the chief cause of that war. The French were in the possession of the Mississippi, and claimed as part of Louisiana not only the country to the west of that river, but east as far as the Alleghany mountains. France, having this claim, and being in possession of Canada, conceived the project of uniting Louisiana with Canada. To accomplish her purpose she established a line of posts from the Lakes to the Ohio, and commenced encroachments upon the then British colonies. These encroachments she was pressing so far that Great Britain perceived it would be necessary to repel them. This brought on the war of '56, which, after a bloody conflict of seven years, terminated disastrously to France and her allies, and resulted in the establishment of the Mississippi, the Iberville, and the lakes Maurepas and Pontchartrain, as the boundary of Louisiana, giving to Great Britain all the territory on the east of that boundary, except the island and town of New Orleans, and to France all upon the west, including the island and town of New Orleans.

A more particular examination of the results of this war is important. By it France lost Canada and most of her West India islands. Spain, the ally of France, lost Cuba. By the preliminary articles of peace between Great Britain, France, and Spain, signed at Fontainebleau, and dated the 3d November, 1762, France renounced all pretensions to Nova Scotia, and ceded and guaranteed to his Britannic Majesty in full right, Canada, with all its dependencies. The 6th article stipulates, "In order to re-establish peace on the most solid and lasting foundations and to remove every subject of dispute, with regard to the limits of the British and French territories on the continent of North America: it is agreed that for the future the confines between the dominions of His Britannic Majesty and those of his most Christian Majesty, (French King,) in that part of the world, shall be irrevocably fixed by a line drawn along the middle of the river Mississippi from its source, as far as the river Iberville, and from thence by a line drawn along the middle of this river, and of the lakes Maurepas and Pontchartrain to the sea; and to this purpose, the most Christian King cedes in full right, and guarantees to His Britannic Majesty, the river and port of Mobile, (now West Florida,) and every thing that he possesses, or ought to have possessed on the left (east) side of the river Mississippi, except the town of New Orleans, and the island on which it is situated, which shall remain to 'France." By the 18th article, Great Britain restores to Spain all that she had conquered in the island of Cuba, with the fortress of Havana. In consequence of which His Catholic Majesty (King of Spain) by the 19th article "cedes and guaranties in full right, to His Britannic Majesty, all that Spain possesses on the continent of North America, to the east or the southeast of the Mississippi, including Florida, with Fort St. Augustine and the bay of Pensacola," (now consisting of East and a part of West Florida.) By the definitive treaty of peace and friendship between the Kings of Great Britain, France, and Spain, concluded at Paris on the 10th day of February, 1763, the preliminary articles were adopted, ratified, and confirmed. By another treaty bearing date the 3d day of November 1762, the same day and year the preliminary articles are dated, as appears by the letter to M. L'Abbadie, which I will presently refer to, France cedes Louisiana to Spain, together with the town and island of New Orleans. This last mentioned treaty has never been published, but the letter of the King of France to M. L'Abbadie recites the purport as well as date of it. This letter purports to be an order signed by the King of France, dated at Versailles, the 21st April, 1764, and directed to M. L'Abbadie, director general, and commandant for His Majesty in Louisiana. This letter was published at New Orleans in October, 1764; and circulated amongst the French inhabitants there. It recites:

"By a special act, done at Fontainebleau, November 3, 1762, of my own will and mere motion, having ceded to my very dear and best beloved cousin the King of Spain, and to his successors, in full property, purely and simply, and without any exceptions, the whole country known by the name of Louisiana, together with New Orleans, and the island in which the said city is situated; and by another act done at the Escorial, November 13, in the same year, His Catholic Majesty having accepted the cession of the said country of Louisiana, and the city and island of New Orleans, agreeably to the copies of the said acts, which you will find hereunto annexed; I write you this letter to inform, you, that my intention is, that on the receipt of these presents, whether they come to your hands by the officers of His Catholic Majesty or directly by such French vessels as may be charged with the same, you are to deliver up to the governor, or officer appointed for that purpose by the King of Spain, the said country and colony of Louisiana, and the posts thereon depending, likewise the city and island of New Orleans, in such state and condition as they shall be found to be in on the day of the said cession, willing that in all time to come they shall belong to His Catholic Majesty, to be governed and administered by his governors and officers, and as possessed by him in full property, without any exceptions."

From this document, and the treaties referred to, it appears that in the month of October, 1764, when the whole of Louisiana, with the island and town of New Orleans, was delivered to Spain, that Great Britain was in the peaceable possession of all the country on the east of the Mississippi. That with respect to Florida particularly, Great Britain was in possession, and nobody dreamed at that time, that Florida either East or West, was any part of Louisiana. Had it been so considered, under the orders of the French King, to deliver the whole of the province to Spain, undoubtedly Florida would have been delivered.

Immediately after the cession of '62-3, Great Britain took possession of all the country on the east of the Mississippi, except only the town and island of New Orleans, and, in the year 1763 or 4, erected Old Florida, Pensacola, the river and port of Mobile, &c., into two distinct provinces, under the name of East and West Florida, names which they have borne ever since. In 1783, at the close of our Revolutionary war, Great Britain ceded to Spain East and West Florida, which, from that period to the present time, have been held by Spain under these names, as separate provinces from Louisiana. In the year 1800, when Spain was in possession of East and West Florida and Louisiana, as three several and distinct provinces, the famous Treaty of St. Ildefonso was concluded, whereby Spain "retrocedes to France the colony or province of Louisiana, with the same extent that it now has in the hands of Spain, and that it had when France possessed it; and such as it should be after the treaties subsequently entered into between Spain and other States." This treaty likewise has not been published, but the part just referred to is cited in the treaty between the United States and France of the 30th of April, 1803, whereby France cedes to the United States Louisiana, as fully and in the same manner as she acquired it of Spain by the Treaty of St. Ildefonso. Spain delivered possession in pursuance of the Treaty of St. Ildefonso to France, and France, in pursuance of the treaty of 1803, delivered possession to the United States, both Powers receiving the country on the west of the Mississippi, with the island and city of New Orleans, like Spain originally received it from France, as the whole of Louisiana.

I have now, I believe, sir, given a full and I trust fair and correct statement of the evidences and facts relative to the question of title. A few remarks will close what I have to say on this head. The letter from the King of France to M. L'Abbadie, is a very important document. It shows that the King of France, under whom we claim, and by whose admissions we are bound, so long ago as 1764, treated and considered the country on the west of the Mississippi as the whole of Louisiana. That, so considering it, he ceded and delivered it to Spain, together with the island and town of New Orleans, from which latter words it may be inferred that even the island and town of New Orleans were then not considered a part of Louisiana. In 1800, when Spain ceded back the colony of Louisiana to France, that country was only known on the west of the Mississippi. The war of '56, and the treaties of '62-3, had fixed the line and obliterated forever the name of Louisiana on the east of that river.

The Treaty of St. Ildefonso, of 1800, is a mere treaty of retrocession. The translation purports to be a treaty of cession, it is true, but acknowledged on all sides to be erroneous. The original treaty was in the French language, and it is by that we are to be governed. The expression in the original is "Sa Majesté Catholique promet et s'engage, de son cote, à retroceder à la République Française," &c. A retroceder signifying to retrocede, to restore, or to use a term familiar in the State I have the honor to represent, re-convey the colony of Louisiana to France, as it was when France conveyed it to Spain. The honorable gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. POPE,) pressed by this argument, could only get round it by alleging that the original treaty between France and Spain was dated in 1761, prior to the settlement of the line and the cessions to Great Britain. But, unfortunately, he could not produce one tittle of authentic evidence to establish his position, a position absolutely negated by the official letter to M. L'Abbadie. But that gentleman has further told us, that from the words "with the same extent it now has in the hands of Spain, and that it had when France possessed it, and such as it should be after the treaties subsequently entered into between other States," an intention may be raised to include Florida. I fully subscribe to the gentleman's rule, that we must give such a construction to the treaty, and particularly to the passage just referred to, as will give effect, if possible, to all the parts; and this I apprehend may be done without having recourse to the forced construction contended for. In the first place, the two first members of the passage may be reconciled and have effect by considering them as a twofold description of the same territory. From abundant caution it is not uncommon to give various descriptions of the same object. Sometimes the name is simply used, sometimes it is described by metes and bounds, and sometimes by the names of the adjacent countries. Sometimes a twofold, and sometimes a threefold description is given. And upon a critical examination, I think it will be found that this is the only true construction the instrument will bear. If you give it the construction the gentleman contends for, to wit: that the second member of the passage is an extension of the description given by the first, then the second includes the first, and of consequence the first would be nugatory and superfluous; which would be doing violence to the gentleman's own rule of construction. But if the gentleman will insist on giving to the second member an enlarged or extended sense, it may be done by applying it to the western boundaries of Louisiana. It is said that when France ceded Louisiana to Spain, in '62, the country extended on the west to the river Sabine, and that Spain, prior to the treaty of 1808, detached from Louisiana the territory south of the waters emptying into the Red river, and erected it into a new province under the name of the "Province of Texas." Sir, the operations on the Sabine are memorable. It is well known how mysteriously they were suspended by an arrangement in 1806, by which it was agreed that the Spaniards should not cross the Sabine, and that the Americans should not extend their settlements as far as that river. And for this purpose, to prevent collisions, until the difference should be settled, instructions were given that no surveys should be made west of a meridian passing by Nachitoches.

If the gentleman is not satisfied by travelling to the west, by going to the east he may find an application—the town and island of New Orleans, which, though named in the cession to Spain, are not named in the treaty of retrocession to France.

As to the third member of the passage, it is a formal provision introduced into most treaties, and would be understood if not expressed. Of course the cession would be subject to prior treaties with other States. In 1795, Spain concluded a treaty with the United States, whereby she agrees that the navigation of the Mississippi, in its whole breadth from its source to the ocean, shall be free to the citizens of the United States, and that they shall have the right to deposit their merchandise and effects in the port of New Orleans, free of duty for three years, and after that period, if the privilege is not extended at the port of New Orleans, she is to assign to the United States, on another part of the banks of the Mississippi, an equivalent establishment. To these provisions the clause in question I apprehend refers.

The holding or possession of Louisiana is correspondent with the construction I have given the treaty. When possession was originally delivered by France to Spain, Florida was not delivered or considered any part of the cession. When Louisiana, under the Treaty of St. Ildefonso was restored to France, Florida was not delivered. When Louisiana, under the treaty of 1803, was delivered to the United States, Florida was not comprehended. Indeed the Government of the United States then treated the country on the west of the Mississippi, including the town and island of New Orleans, as the whole of Louisiana, by receiving it and paying the purchase money, which by the terms of the treaty they were not bound to do, and which by the act of Congress creating the Louisiana stock they were not authorized to do, till after full and entire possession had been delivered.

Mr. President, is it conceivable that after the boundary in question had been established, by the most solemn compact of nations, and consecrated by a long and bloody war, and, too, by a lapse of near forty years—is it conceivable that the territory in question, excluded by that boundary, and raised into a distinct province under a distinct name—a name it ever bore after the establishment of the boundary—is it, I say, sir, conceivable, if the parties meant to have included this province in the Treaty of St. Ildefonso, that it should not have been specifically named?

I have now, sir, closed my remarks on the question of title, and will proceed to consider very briefly the only remaining question—that of expediency.

It would be well for gentlemen to consider whether this measure is not a departure from the just and pacific policy heretofore professed on the part of the United States. Sir, our policy has been to avoid war. To this policy we have sacrificed many of our national rights, and property to a vast amount—pocketed indignities and suffered the nation's character to sink. We were particularly squeamish in relation to St. Domingo, a colony of France, when in a state of rebellion. We at that time carried on, and had done for a long time before, an important commerce with that island, when suddenly we were called upon by the French Minister, in the name of his master, in a style too not the most decorous and humble, to relinquish that commerce. And what did you do, sir? Compare the two cases. Here is a Spanish colony in a state of rebellion. And what do you do? Refuse to them provisions and supplies, as in the case of St. Domingo? No, sir. Do we merely aid and assist the revolutionists? No, sir; but we are about to invade the colony and take it to ourselves. Sir, your conduct would have been consistent, if, instead of passing a non-intercourse with St. Domingo, you had detached a squadron for the conquest of that island. France at that time had insulted and injured us more than Spain has done, and France then was equally as incapable of affording protection to that island as Spain now is to her colony of West Florida.

Sir, what has been your conduct heretofore towards Spain? When she denied to you the right of navigating the Mississippi, which may be considered one of the natural rights of this country—a right, too, consecrated by treaty, did you go to war? When she denied to you the right of deposit at New Orleans, in violation of a recent treaty, did you go to war? When she subjected you to a duty or tribute, as some would call it, on the Mobile, did you go to war? Nay, sir, when she committed spoiliations on your commerce, and suffered them to be committed within her jurisdiction by another Power, did you go to war? No, sir. And why? Spain was then the ally of France. What has Spain recently done to provoke this act of aggression upon her territory? What new offence has she given the United States? Is it her determination to resist the usurpation of France, or is it, that she has lately sent a Minister to express her friendly disposition, to treat with you for both the Floridas, and pay what she owes us for spoiliations?

Do you calculate that France will conquer Spain? This, in my humble opinion, she will not do. France is not now contending with an armed soldiery, but she fights an armed people; a people struggling for their liberty, their religion, and their laws, and resolved not to survive them. With such a cause and such a resolution, neither France nor the combined Powers of the earth can subdue them. Mr President, what are to be the consequences of this measure, a measure adopted at a time particularly calculated to excite the resentment of Spain and her allies; at a time when that people is pressed on all sides by their enemy, when their strength is prostrate, when they bleed at every pore and are almost in the act of fainting? What, I say sir, are we to expect but their indignation and retaliation? Let it not be forgotten that the lex talionis is the modern rule, and that the day of retribution may come. Spain has a fleet, and being the ally of England, can send them to sea. Your East India merchants may pay for Florida. Your vessels in the ports of Spain and in the ports of her colonies may be seized and confiscated, and with more cause than the late seizures and confiscations of Europe. Sir, I consider this bill all important, and pregnant with awful consequences. Let it therefore be well considered before it passes.

In point of time, I think we are particularly unfortunate. Recollect the important crisis of this country in relation to the belligerents of Europe. France, it is said, has revoked her edicts, and now it remains for Great Britain to say whether she will repeal hers. Let it be remembered, that Great Britain is now the ally of Spain, and, for aught we know, may have guaranteed her colonies. Would it not at least have been prudent, as was done on a former occasion in relation to another Power, to have inquired what part she would take? If she is to act the part of an ally, offensive and defensive, or of an ally at all, can it be expected that she will revoke her Orders in Council, or even remain indifferent? It is a singular circumstance, that the proclamation reviving the non-intercourse with Great Britain and the one for taking possession of Florida were upon the anvil at the same time. There is only five days difference in their dates, and the Florida proclamation is the first. Sir, to me, they look a good deal like twin brothers.

One moment more will close my remarks. The honorable gentleman from Kentucky has told us that Europe is now in a state of barbarism, and has emphatically asked, are we to sit here and cavil about questions of right? What, sir, if Europe has become barbarous, is that a reason why America should become so too? Why we should depart from the great system of conduct which has been the pride, the safety, and boast of our country—of faith—of justice—of peace? Is this a reason, sir, why we should violate our treaty with Spain—not one of those barbarous Powers, but one of the victims of those Powers? Is this a reason why we should commit an act of injustice and violence towards a people who have proffered you their friendship? Is this a reason why we should embroil the nation in war?

I beg pardon, sir, for having detained you so long. The subject is important, and, if I have not been mistaken in my views of it, I have shown the proclamation unauthorized; that we have not a good title to Florida; and that if we had a claim, it would not accord with the equitable and pacific policy of the United States to assert it at this time by force.

MR. CLAY.—Mr President, it would have gratified me if some other gentleman had undertaken to reply to the ingenious argument which you have just heard. But not perceiving any one disposed to do so, a sense of duty obliges me, though very unwilling, to claim your indulgence while I offer my sentiments on this subject, so interesting to the Union at large, but particularly to the western section of it. Allow me, sir, to express my admiration at the more than Aristidean justice, which, in a question of territorial title between the United States and a foreign nation, induces certain gentlemen to espouse the pretensions of the foreign nation. Doubtless, in any future negotiations, she will have too much magnanimity to avail herself of these spontaneous concessions in her favor, made on the floor of the Senate of the United States.

It was to have been expected, that in a question like the present, gentlemen, even on the same side, would have different views, and although arriving at a common conclusion, would do so by various arguments. And hence the honorable gentleman from Vermont entertains doubts with regard to our title against Spain, while he feels entirely satisfied of it against France. Believing, as I do, that our title against both Powers is indisputable, under the Treaty of St. Ildefonso between Spain and France, and the treaty between the French Republic and the United States, I shall not inquire into the treachery by which the King of Spain is alleged to have lost his crown; nor shall I stop to discuss the question involved in the overthrow of the Spanish monarchy, and how far the power of Spain ought to be considered as merged in that of France. I shall leave the honorable gentleman from Delaware to mourn over the fortunes of the fallen Charles. I have no commiseration for princes. My sympathies are reserved for the great mass of mankind, and I own that the people of Spain have them most sincerely.

I will adopt the course suggested by the nature of the subject, and pursued by other gentlemen, of examining into our title to the country lying between the Mississippi and the Rio Perdido (which, to avoid circumlocution, I will call West Florida, although it is not the whole of it)—and the propriety of the recent measures taken for the occupation of it. Our title depends, first, upon the limits of the province or colony of Louisiana, and secondly, upon a just exposition of the treaties before mentioned.

On this occasion it is only necessary to fix the Eastern boundary. In order to ascertain this, it is proper to take a cursory view of the settlement of the country; the basis of European title to colonies in America being prior discovery or prior occupancy. In 1682, La Salle migrated from Canada, then owned by France, descended the Mississippi and named the country, which it waters, Louisiana. About 1698, D'Iberville discovered by sea the mouth of the Mississippi, established a colony at the Isle Dauphine or Massacre, which lies at the mouth of the bay of Mobile, and one at the mouth of the river Mobile, and was appointed, by France, governor of the country. In the year 1717, the famous West India Company sent inhabitants to the Isle Dauphine, and found some of those who had been settled there under the auspices of D'Iberville. About the same period Baloxi, near the Pascagoula, was settled. In 1719, the city of New Orleans was laid off, and the seat of the Government of Louisiana was established there. In 1736, the French erected a fort on Tombigbee. These facts prove that France had the actual possession of the country as far east as the Mobile at least. But the great instrument which ascertains, beyond all doubt, that the country in question is comprehended within the limits of Louisiana, is one of the most authentic and solemn character which the archives of the nation can furnish. I mean the patent granted in 1712, by Louis XIV. to Crozat. [Here Mr. C. read such parts of the patent as were applicable to the subject.*] Ac-

"LOUIS, BY THE GRACE OF GOD, &c.

"The care we have always had to procure the welfare and advantage of our subjects, having induced us, &c. to seek for all possible opportunities of enlarging and extending the trade of our American colonies, we did in the year 1683 give our orders to undertake a discovery of the countries and lands which are situated in the northern part of America, between New France and New Mexico; and the Sieur de la Salle, to whom we committed that enterprise, having had success enough to confirm a belief that a communication might be settled from New France to the Gulf of Mexico by means of large rivers; this obliged us, immediately after the peace of Ryswick, to give orders for establishing a colony there and maintaining a garrison, which has kept and preserved the possession we had taken in the very year, 1683, of the lands, coasts and islands which are situated in the Gulf of Mexico, between Carolina on the east and Old New Mexico on the west. But a new war having broke out shortly after, there was no possibility, till now, of reaping from that colony the advantages that might have been expected from thence, &c. And whereas, upon the information we have received concerning the disposition and situation of the said countries, known at present by the name of the Province of Louisiana, we are of opinion, that there may be established therein a considerable commerce, &c., we have resolved to grant the commerce of the country of Louisiana to the Sieur Anthony Crozat, &c. For these reasons, &c., we by these presents, signed by our hand, have appointed and do appoint the said Sieur Crozat to carry on a trade in all the lands possessed by us, and bounded by New Mexico and by the lands of the English of Carolina, all the establishments, ports, havens, rivers, and principally the port and haven of the Isle Dauphine, heretofore called Massacre; the river of St. Louis, heretofore called Mississippi, from the edge of the sea as far as the Illinois, together with the river St. Philip, heretofore called the Missouri, and of St. Jerome, heretofore called Ouabache, with all the countries, territories, and lakes within land, and the rivers which fall directly or indirectly into that part of the river St. Louis.

"The articles. 1. Our pleasure is, that all the aforesaid lands, countries, streams, rivers, and islands, be and remain comprised under the name of the Government of Louisiana, which shall be dependant upon the General Government of New France, to which it is subordinate; and further, that all the lands which we possess from the Illinois be united, &c. to the General Government of New France, and become part thereof, &c."

cording to this document, in describing the province or colony of Louisiana, it is declared to be bounded by Carolina on the east and Old and New Mexico on the west. Under this high record evidence, it might be insisted that we have a fair claim to East as well as West Florida, against France at least, unless she has by some convention or other obligatory act, restricted the eastern limit of the province. It has, indeed, been asserted that by a treaty between France and Spain, concluded in the year 1719, the Perdido was expressly stipulated to be the boundary between their respective provinces of Florida on the east and Louisiana on the west; but as I have been unable to find any such treaty, I am induced to doubt its existence.

About the same period, to wit, towards the seventeenth century, when France settled the isle Dauphine and the Mobile, Spain erected a fort at Pensacola. But Spain never pushed her actual settlements or conquests further west than the bay of Pensacola, whilst those of the French were bounded on the east by the Mobile. Between those two points, a space of about thirteen or fourteen leagues, neither nation had the exclusive possession. The Rio Perdido, forming the bay of the same name, discharges itself into the Gulf of Mexico between the Mobile and Pensacola, and, being a natural and the most notorious object between them, presented itself as a suitable boundary between the possessions of the two nations. It accordingly appears very early to have been adopted as the boundary, by tacit if not express consent. The ancient charts and historians, therefore, of the country so represent it. Dupratz, one of the most accurate historians in point of fact and detail of the time, whose work was published as early as 1758, describes the coast as being bounded on the east by the Rio Perdido. In truth, sir, no European nation whatever, except France, ever occupied any portion of West Florida, prior to her cession of it to England in 1762. The gentlemen on the other side do not indeed strongly controvert, if they do not expressly admit, that Louisiana, as held by France anterior to her cession of it in 1762, reached to the Perdido. The only observation made by the gentleman from Delaware to the contrary, to wit, that the island of New Orleans being particularly mentioned could not for that reason constitute a part of Louisiana, is susceptible of a very satisfactory answer. That island was excepted out of the grant to England, and was the only part of the province east of the river that was so excepted. It formed in itself one of the most prominent and important objects of the cession to Spain originally, and was transferred to her with the portion of the province west of the Mississippi. It might with equal propriety be urged that St. Augustine is not in East Florida, because St. Augustine is expressly mentioned by Spain in her cession of that province to England. From this view of the subject I think it results that the province of Louisiana comprised West Florida, previous to the year 1762.

What is done with it at this epoch? By a secret convention of the 3d of November of that year, France ceded the country lying west of the Mississippi, and the island of New Orleans to Spain; and by a contemporaneous act, the articles preliminary to the definitive Treaty of 1763, she transferred West Florida to England. Thus at the same instant of time she alienated the whole province.

Posterior to this grant, Great Britain, having also acquired from Spain her possessions east of the Mississippi, erected the country into two provinces, East and West Florida. In this state of things it continued until the peace of 1783, when Great Britain, in consequence of the events of the war, surrendered the country to Spain, who for the first time came into the actual possession of West Florida. Well, sir, how does she dispose of it? She reannexes it to the residue of Louisiana; extends the jurisdiction of that Government to it, and subjects the governors or commandants of the districts of Baton Rouge, Feliciana, Mobile, and Pensacola, to the authority of the Governor of Louisiana, residing at New Orleans; whereas the Governor of East Florida is placed wholly without his control, and is made amenable directly to the Governor of the Havana. And I have been credibly informed that all the concessions or grants of land, made in West Florida, under the authority of Spain, run in the name of the government of Louisiana. You cannot have forgotten that about the period when we took possession of New Orleans, under the Treaty of Cession from France, the whole country rung with the nefarious speculations which were alleged to be practising in that city, with the connivance, if not actual participation of the Spanish authorities, by the procurement of surreptitious grants of land, particularly in the district of Feliciana. West Florida, then, not only as France has held it, but as it was in the hands of Spain, made a part of the province of Louisiana, as much so as the jurisdiction or district of Baton Rouge constituted a part of West Florida.

What, then, is the true construction of the Treaties of St. Ildefonso and of April, 1803, from whence our title is derived? If an ambiguity exist in a grant, the interpretation most favorable to the grantee is to be preferred. It was the duty of the grantor to have expressed himself in plain and intelligible terms. This is the doctrine not of Coke only, (whose dicta I admit have nothing to do with the question,) but of the code of universal law. The doctrine is entitled to augmented force when a clause only of the instrument is exhibited, in which clause the ambiguity lurks, and the residue of the instrument is kept back by the grantor. The entire convention of 1762, by which France transferred Louisiana to Spain, is concealed, and the whole of the Treaty of St. Ildefonso, except a solitary clause. We are thus deprived of the aid which a full view of both of those instruments would afford. But we have no occasion to resort to any rules of construction, however reasonable in themselves, to establish our title. A competent knowledge of the facts, connected with the case, and a candid appeal to the treaties, are alone sufficient to manifest our right. The negotiators of the Treaty of 1803 having signed with the same ceremony two copies, one in the English and the other in the French language, it has been contended, that in the English version the term 'cede' has been erroneously used instead of 'retrocede,' which is the expression in the French copy. And it is argued that we are bound by the phraseology of the French copy, because, it is declared that the treaty was agreed to in that language. It would not be very unfair to inquire if this is not like the common case, in private life, where individuals enter into a contract, of which each party retains a copy, duly executed. In such case neither has the preference. We might as well say to France we will cling by the English copy, as she could insist upon an adherence to the French copy; and if she urged ignorance on the part of Mr. Marbois, her negotiator, of our language, we might, with equal propriety, plead ignorance on the part of our negotiators of her language. As this, however, is a disputable point, I do not avail myself of it; gentlemen shall have the full benefit of the expressions in the French copy. According to this, then, in reciting the Treaty of St. Ildefonso, it is declared by Spain in 1800, that she retrocedes to France the colony or province of Louisiana, with the same extent that it then had in the hands of Spain, and that it had when France possessed it, and such as it should be after the treaties subsequently entered into between Spain and other States. This latter member of the description has been sufficiently explained by my colleague.

It is said that since France in 1762 ceded to Spain only Louisiana west of the Mississippi, and the island of New Orleans, the retrocession comprehended no more—that the retrocession ex vi termini was commensurate with and limited by the direct cession from France to Spain. If this were true, then the description, such as Spain held it, that is in 1800, comprising West Florida, and such as France possessed it, that is in 1762, prior to the several cessions, comprising also West Florida, would be totally inoperative. But the definition of the term retrocession, contended for by the other side, is denied. It does not exclude the instrumentality of a third party. It means restoration or reconveyance of the thing originally ceded, and so the gentleman from Delaware acknowledged. I admit that the thing restored must have come to the restoring party from the party to whom it is retroceded, whether directly or indirectly is wholly immaterial. In its passage it may have come through a dozen hands. The retroceding party must claim under and in virtue of the right originally possessed by the party to whom the retrocession takes place. Allow me to put a case: You own an estate called Louisiana. You convey one moiety of it to the gentleman from Delaware, and the other to me; he conveys his moiety to me, and I thus become entitled to the whole. By a suitable instrument I reconvey or retrocede the estate called Louisiana to you as I now hold it, and as you held it; what passes to you? The whole estate or my moiety only? Let me indulge another supposition: that the gentleman from Delaware, after he received from you his moiety, had bestowed a new denomination upon it, and called it West Florida, would that circumstance vary the operation of my act of retrocession to you? The case supposed is in truth the real one between the United States and Spain. France in 1762 transfers Louisiana west of the Mississippi to Spain, and at the same time conveys the eastern portion of it, exclusive of New Orleans, to Great Britain. Twenty one years after, that is in 1783, Great Britain cedes her part to Spain, who thus becomes possessed of the entire province; one portion by direct cession from France, and the residue by indirect cession. Spain then held the whole of Louisiana under France, and in virtue of the title of France. The whole moved or passed from France to her. When, therefore, in this state of things, she says, in the Treaty of St. Ildefonso, that she retrocedes the province to France, can a doubt exist that she parts with, and gives back to France, the entire colony? To preclude the possibility of such a doubt, she adds, that she restores it, not in a mutilated condition, but in that precise condition in which France had, and she herself possessed it.

Having thus shown, as I conceive, a clear right in the United States to West Florida, I proceed to inquire if the proclamation of the President directing the occupation of property, which is thus fairly acquired by solemn treaty, be an unauthorized measure of war and of legislation, as has been contended.

The act of October, 1803, contains two sections, by one of which the President is authorized to occupy the territories ceded to us by France in the April preceding. The other empowers the President to establish a provisional government there. The first section is unlimited in its duration; the other is restricted to the expiration of the then session of Congress. The act, therefore, of March, 1804, declaring that the previous act of October should continue in force until the first of October, 1804, is applicable to the second and not the first section, and was intended to continue the provisional government of the President. By the act of the 24th of February, 1804, for laying duties on goods imported into the ceded territories, the President is empowered, whenever he deems it expedient, to erect the bay and river Mobile, &c., into a separate district, and to establish therein a port of entry and delivery. By this same act the Orleans Territory is laid off, and its boundaries are so defined as to comprehend West Florida. By other acts the President is authorized to remove by force, under certain circumstances, persons settling or taking possession of lands ceded to the United States.

These laws furnish a legislative construction of the treaty, correspondent with that given by the Executive, and they vest in this branch of the Government indisputably a power to take possession of the country, whenever it might be proper in his discretion. The President has not, therefore, violated the Constitution, and usurped the war-making power, but he would have violated that provision which requires him to see that the laws are faithfully executed, if he had longer forborne to act. It is urged that he has assumed powers belonging to Congress in undertaking to annex the portion of West Florida between the Mississippi and the Perdido to the Orleans Territory. But Congress, as has been shown, has already made this annexation the limits of the Orleans Territory, as prescribed by Congress, comprehending the country in question. The President, by his proclamation, has not made law, but has merely declared to the people of West Florida what the law is. This is the office of a proclamation, and it was highly proper that the people of that Territory should be thus notified. By the act of occupying the country, the Government de facto, whether of Spain, or the revolutionists, ceased to exist; and the laws of the Orleans Territory, applicable to the country, by operation and force of law, attached to it. But this was a state of things which the people might not know, and every dictate of justice and humanity required, therefore, should be proclaimed. I consider the bill before us merely in the light of a declaratory law.

Never could a more propitious moment present itself for the exercise of the discretionary power placed in the President of the United States, and, had he failed to embrace it, he would have been criminally inattentive to the dearest interests of this country. It cannot be too often repeated, that if Cuba on the one hand, and Florida on the other, are in the possession of a foreign maritime Power, the immense country belonging to the United States, watered by streams discharging themselves into the Gulf of Mexico—that is, one-third, nay more than two-thirds of the United States, comprehending Louisiana, is placed at the mercy of that Power. The possession of Florida is a guarantee absolutely necessary to the enjoyment of the navigation of those streams. The gentleman from Delaware anticipates the most direful consequences from the occupation of the country. He supposes a sally from a Spanish garrison upon the American forces, and asks what is to be done? We attempt a peaceful possession of the country, to which we are fairly entitled. If the wrongful occupants under the authority of Spain assail our troops, I trust they will retrieve the lost honor of the nation in the case of the Chesapeake. Suppose an attack upon any portion of the American Army within the acknowledged limits of the United States by a Spanish force? In such event there would exist but a single honorable and manly course. The gentleman conceives it ungenerous that we should at this moment, when Spain is encompassed and pressed on all sides by the immense power of her enemy, occupy West Florida. Shall we sit by, passive spectators, and witness the interesting transactions in that country—transactions which tend to jeopardize, in the most imminent degree, our rights, without interference? Are you prepared to see a foreign Power seize what belongs to us? I have heard in the most credible manner that, about the period when the President took his measures in relation to that country, the agents of a foreign Power were intriguing with the people there, to induce them to come under his dominion.

Whether this be the fact or not, it cannot be doubted, that if you neglect the present auspicious moment—if you reject the proffered boon, some other nation, profiting by your errors, will seize the occasion to get a fatal footing in your southern frontier. I have no hesitation in saying, that if a parent country will not or cannot maintain its authority in a colony adjacent to us, and there exists in it a state of misrule and disorder, menacing our peace, and if moreover such colony, by passing into the hands of any other Power, would become dangerous to the integrity of the Union, and manifestly tend to the subversion of our laws; we have a right, upon eternal principles of self-preservation, to lay hold of it. This principle alone, independent of any title, would warrant our occupation of West Florida. But it is not necessary to resort to it, our title being in my judgment incontestably good. We are told of the vengeance of resuscitated Spain. If Spain, under any modification of her Government, chose to make war upon us, for the act under consideration, the nation, I have no doubt, will be willing to meet the war. But the gentleman reminds us that Great Britain, the ally of Spain, may be obliged by her connexion with Spain to take part with her against us, and to consider this measure of the President as justifying an appeal to arms.

Sir, said Mr. CLAY, is the time never to arrive when we may manage our affairs without the fear of insulting His Britannic Majesty? Is the rod of British power to be forever suspended over our heads? Does Congress put on an embargo to shelter our rightful commerce against the piratical depredations committed upon it on the ocean? We are immediately warned of the indignation of offended England. Is a law of non-intercourse proposed? The whole navy of the haughty mistress of the seas is made to thunder in our ears. Does the President refuse to continue a correspondence with a Minister who violates the decorum belonging to his diplomatic character, by giving and deliberately repeating an affront to the whole nation? We are instantly menaced with the chastisement which English pride will not fail to inflict. Whether we assert our rights by sea or attempt their maintenance by land—whithersoever we turn ourselves, this phantom incessantly pursues us. Already has it had too much influence on the councils of the nation. It contributed to the repeal of the embargo—that dishonorable repeal, which has so much tarnished the character of our Government. Mr. President, I have before said on this floor, and now take occasion again to remark, that I most sincerely desire peace and amity with England; that I even prefer an adjustment of all differences with her before one with any other nation. But if she persist in a denial of justice to us, or if she avails herself of the occupation of West Florida to commence war upon us, I trust and hope that all hearts will unite in a bold and vigorous vindication of our rights. I do not, however, believe in the prediction that war will be the effect of the measure in question.

It is asked, why, some years ago, when the interruption of the right of deposit took place at New Orleans, the Government did not declare war against Spain, and how it has happened that there has been this long acquiescence in the Spanish possession of West Florida? The answer is obvious. It consists in the genius of the nation, which is prone to peace; in that desire to arrange, by friendly negotiation, our disputes with all nations, which has constantly influenced the present and preceding Administrations; and in the jealousy of armies, with which we have been inspired by the melancholy experience of free States. But a new state of things has arisen. Negotiation has become hopeless. The Power with whom it was to be conducted, if not annihilated, is in a situation that precludes it; and the subject-matter of it is in danger of being snatched forever from our power. Longer delay would be construed into a dereliction of our right, and amount to treachery to ourselves: May I ask, in my turn, why certain gentlemen, now so fearful of war, were so urgent for it with Spain when she withheld the right of deposit? and still later, when in 1805 or 6, this very subject of the actual limits of Louisiana was before Congress? I will not say, because I do not know that I am authorized to say, that the motive is to be found in the change of relation between Spain and other European Powers since those periods.

Does the honorable gentleman from Delaware really believe that he finds in St. Domingo a case parallel with that of West Florida? and that our Government having interdicted an illicit commerce with the former, ought not to have interposed in relation to the latter? It is scarcely necessary to consume your time by remarking that we had no pretensions to that island; that it did not menace our repose, nor did the safety of the United States require that they should occupy it. It became, therefore, our duty to attend to the just remonstrance of France against American citizens, supplying the rebels with the means of resisting her power.

I am not, sir, in favor of cherishing the passion of conquest. But I must be permitted to conclude by declaring my hope to see, ere long, the new United States (if you will allow me the expression) embracing not only the old thirteen States, but the entire country east of the Mississippi, including East Florida, and some of the territories to the north of us also.

When Mr. CLAY had concluded, the Senate adjourned.

SENATE.

MONDAY, December 31.

JOHN TAYLOR, appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the State of South Carolina, in place of Thomas Sumter, resigned, produced his credentials, which were read; and the oath prescribed by law having been administered to him, he took his seat in the Senate.

MR. FRANKLIN, from the committee to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act making an additional appropriation to supply the deficiency in the appropriation for the relief and protection of distressed American seamen during the year 1810," reported it without amendment.

MR. BRADLEY, from the committee to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act to fix the compensation of the additional Assistant Postmaster General," reported the bill with an amendment; which was read.

The bill authorizing a subscription on the part of the United States to the stock of the Ohio Canal Company was read the second time.

The bill to incorporate the subscribers to the Farmers' Bank of Alexandria was read the second time.

The bill for the establishment of a quartermaster's department was read the second time, referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon; and Messrs. LEIB, FRANKLIN, and PICKERING, were appointed the committee.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act providing for the final adjustment of claims to lands, and for the sale of the public lands in the Territories of Orleans and Louisiana;" in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

OCCUPATION OF WEST FLORIDA.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill extending the laws now in force in Orleans Territory to the Perdido, &c.

MR. PICKERING commenced a speech, in which he proceeded about an hour; when he read, as an evidence in support of his argument against the title of the United States to Louisiana or Florida between the Mississippi and Perdido, a letter from Charles Maurice Talleyrand, the French Minister for Foreign Affairs, dated 21st December, 1804, to General Armstrong, our Minister at Paris, on the subject of certain overtures which had been made by our Ministers in Spain for the aid of France in procuring a cession to the United States of one or both Floridas. The purport of Talleyrand's letter appeared to be a denial that the United States had acquired, by the treaty of 1803, any title to Louisiana east of the Mississippi, or some statement to that effect.

When Mr. P. had concluded the reading of this letter—

MR. SMITH, of Maryland, said he wished to inquire whether the paper, which the gentleman had just read, had ever been publicly communicated to the Senate.

MR. PICKERING said it had been communicated, not indeed as a public paper, but for what reason had it been communicated confidentially? Because, by a publication of it at the time, injury might have been done to our Ministers or our affairs abroad. There was, however, now no reason why the whole truth should not be known. They were about taking a step which was one of peace or war, and it was important that everything in relation to the subject should be disclosed.

MR. SMITH said that whenever papers were communicated to the Senate confidentially, before they could be read publicly in this body or any other, it was necessary that the permission of the Senate should be obtained; which no doubt if asked in this case would have been granted. But if this proceeding were permitted to pass unnoticed, any individual might have the power to do the greatest injury to the nation, as his humor might move him. He apprehended the proceeding was wrong; but gentlemen older in the Senate than he was could perhaps better decide.

On the suggestion of a member, the galleries were cleared. The Senate sat with closed doors for an hour. When they were again opened, on motion of MR. ANDERSON, the further consideration of the bill last mentioned was postponed.

MR. CLAY submitted the following resolution, which lies on the table of course:

Resolved, That the public perusal in the Senate of certain papers with open galleries by the gentleman from Massachusetts, (MR. PICKERING,) in his seat, without a special order of the Senate removing the injunction of secrecy, which papers had been confidentially communicated to the Senate by the President of the United States, was a palpable violation of the rules of this body.

The Senate then adjourned to Wednesday.

WEDNESDAY, January 2, 1811.

ANDREW GREGG, from the State of Pennsylvania, took his seat in the Senate.

The PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, made in conformity with the acts of March 26, 1804, and March 3, 1805, of rejected claims made by the Commissioners appointed for the purpose of examining the claims of persons claiming lands in the district of Kaskaskia; and the report was read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

On motion, by MR. LLOYD, it was agreed to suspend the order of the day for the purpose of considering the bill, entitled "An act making an additional appropriation to supply the deficiency in the appropriation for the relief and protection of distressed American seamen during the year 1810;" and the bill was read and considered as in Committee of the Whole, and passed to the third reading.

MR. DANA asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill for the benefit of seamen of the United States; which was read, and passed to the second reading.

The PRESIDENT communicated the report of the Secretary for the Department of War, made in obedience to the first section of the act "further to amend the several acts for the establishment of the Treasury, War, and Navy Departments," passed the 3d day of March, 1809; which was read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

The bill brought up from the House of Representatives for concurrence, entitled "An act providing for the final adjustment of claims to lands, and for the sale of the public lands in the Territories of Orleans and Louisiana," was read, and passed to the second reading.

The bill authorizing the sale and grant of a certain quantity of public land to the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal Company, was read the second time.

QUESTION OF ORDER.

Mr. CLAY called up the motion made the 31st of December, on the subject of order; and, on his motion, it was agreed that the original motion be amended as follows:

Resolved, That Timothy Pickering, a Senator from the State of Massachusetts, having, on this day, whilst the Senate was in session with open doors, read from his place certain documents confidentially communicated by the President of the United States to the Senate, the injunction of secrecy not having been removed, has, in so doing, committed a palpable violation of the rules of this body.

Mr. CLAY said he wished it was consistent with his duty to forbear pressing it; but from the best consideration he could give the subject, he was obliged to ask a decision on it. With respect to the act having been a violation of the rule, there could be but one opinion. The rule seemed to have been made for the precise occasion. If the Senate did not express their disapprobation, it would be inferred from their silence that they had given their approbation, of the gentleman's conduct; and any individual would hereafter, if inclined, follow his example without hesitation. Again—if the President could not have some degree of security that the documents confidentially communicated to Congress, and on the preserving which in confidence perhaps the safety of the nation depended, would not be disclosed; must not all reliance on the Senate be lost? These considerations induced him to press a decision.

Mr. LLOYD said he had been in hopes that the resolution would have been withdrawn, as it was admitted that the facts disclosed were of no great consequence, as indeed they had been already circulated in the newspapers, and their disclosure could prove of no detriment to the public service. However much gentlemen wished to show their respect for the rules of the Senate, he had hoped that the resolution would have been withdrawn; and that the Senate would not have passed a censure of this sort on so slight an offence as this, if it be an offence at all. He therefore moved to postpone the resolution.

The motion to postpone was lost—yeas 9.

Mr. DANA apprehended the true question in this case to be, what course it became the Senate of the United States to adopt.

The resolution, then, in the first place, proposing to establish an important precedent as to the propriety of proceeding, should be strictly accurate; and if they were to give a rule, which was to be to members a monitor of their duty, and to the House a guardian of its honor and dignity, the whole case should be accurately stated.

My objection to the resolution (said Mr. D.) is, that it does not present the circumstances which led to the result, as they occurred, and which ought to be taken into account in giving it a fair estimate. I ask the question, whether it be possible for the members of the Senate, consistently with any principle of justice, fairness, and public decorum, to pass this resolution? On this ground I submit myself with confidence to the Senate; not that I object to its phraseology merely, but that the conduct of the gentleman from Massachusetts, compared with that of others, whether strictly regular or not, was not more exceptionable than theirs. What we have acquiesced in when done by others, should be tolerated in him.

When the bill relative to jurisdiction eastward of the Mississippi to the Perdido was first under discussion, sir, if I do not mistake, more than a week since, a gentleman from Vermont, one of the committee that reported the bill, went into a consideration of what had passed when the Louisiana convention was before the Senate for ratification, and into a statement of the correspondence of the Ministers of the United States, which was officially communicated by the President of the United States to the Senate, and undertook to state what he recollected to have been stated by them as to the representations of the French Minister. I did understand an honorable member of the committee to state this as one of the reasons why the bill should be passed; and this too without any question whatever. Afterwards, the gentleman from Massachusetts rose to state what was his apprehension; and said that he did not understand our Ministers to have stated that the French Government so represented the thing, and referred to a letter, the effect of which, he told the Senate, was such at the time it was received, as to have produced a perfect silence in the Senate on the subject of the claim of the United States. This all took place about a week since, and the question was really a question respecting fact. Although no member could entertain the opinion that it was the intention of any gentleman to represent the facts inaccurately, yet, that facts might be stated with precision, the very document referred to by the gentleman was read, without anything bearing the resemblance of surprise, and without anything like an intention to take advantage of the House. If I understood the letter, it was one calculated very powerfully to attract the attention of the House. It had been partly read and commented on; and after having thus read the remarks of Messrs Monroe and Livingston on the treaty respecting Louisiana, the gentleman next came to the letter of Mr. Talleyrand, and prefaced it by an account of an application by our Ministers to the French Government for their aid with the Court of Spain on this subject. After some observations of this kind, the gentleman took up the volume of correspondence, gave the date of the paper and its address, and, after having done so, made a comment which must have called the attention of gentlemen of the Senate, who had not, at least, within a few years past, heard the gentleman from Massachusetts express an opinion more favorable to the French Government. After which he read the letter—and an inquiry was then made, whether it was confidential or not.

Now, I ask, sir, is it the stating of the specific words of a communication, or stating the sense and import of it, which constitutes a violation of any injunction of secrecy. I ask the question, not because gentlemen can doubt much on the subject—the substance is undoubtedly all that is material. What was the date of the letter is not of as much consequence as to whom it was addressed, from whom it came, and what it contained. If I do not mistake, sir, there was some other allusion to the subject; the discussion had gone on without being checked, till, unfortunately it seems for the Senate of the United States, the gentleman from Massachusetts, instead of trusting to memory, and exposing himself and the Senate to error, undertook to state what were the very words.

If it be proper, sir, for the Senate to tolerate debate on a fact, which fact depends on diplomatic communications, it is proper to ascertain the fact which was alluded to. Gentlemen may state the question as strongly as they please—it is not whether the proceeding was strictly regular or irregular—but I contend that, if the gentleman from Massachusetts has offended, he was not the first. Some of the other members set the example. It was acquiesced in by the whole Senate; I will not say from ignorance, certainly not from inattention. I refer it to the Senate, therefore, as the matter has gone on without any intention to gain advantage or design to take any one by surprise, but with a view to attain accuracy, whether it can become this body to pronounce censure on the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Gentlemen, sir, may say whatever they choose about the importance of the power of the President to lock our lips in eternal silence; but I do not acknowledge the authority of any mortal to bind us to such secrecy without our assent. All the President can properly do is to refer to us as men of discernment, as men worthy of the public confidence, as men of honorable principles, capable of judging on public concerns, to judge of the propriety of acting confidentially on any subject. Shall the Senate of the United States, sir, adopt a rule to authorize the President to say, that we are unworthy to judge whether a matter ought to be kept secret or not? The Senate is a body of men selected in a manner to hold them forth as worthy of confidence; and I had really thought that such a body of men might be trusted, without the passage of such a resolution, to show a proper respect to the Executive Magistrate.

No one gentleman, however sensitive he might be as to what would tarnish the lustre of the Senatorial character, thought the proceeding improper in discussing the substance of those documents called confidential. About the expiration of a week thereafter, when resort is had to the accuracy of written communication instead of the uncertainty of recollection, then the offence commences. It consisted not in disclosing the matter itself but in testing its accuracy. Ought that to be deemed an offence, which was merely telling the truth, guarding against inaccuracy, providing against the uncertainty of recollection?

Perhaps, sir, our general rules of proceeding are not sufficiently exact. Instead of deciding on this resolution, perhaps we ought to refer it to a committee for examining our rules and amending them if requisite. Right or wrong, we have all participated in the course of proceeding by general acquiescence. I have countenanced the thing in this manner, and were I now to accuse the gentleman from Massachusetts, I should act as a man who himself practises with impunity that for which he would punish another.

I am not, sir, for a moment to suspect that any particular disrespect to the gentleman from Massachusetts has given rise to this motion; but I submit for consideration, whether it would not be more consistent with that justice which we ourselves would have established to mete to the gentleman from Massachusetts as we should wish it to be meted unto us. If other gentlemen can say that they have, on this occasion, been completely blameless; if you yourself, Mr. President, could say so, not having arrested the gentleman's progress in reading these documents; let those who are without fault, and none other, give this resolution their support.

But if, in this case, there has been a general acquiescence in the practice of referring to diplomatic transactions, which have been past for years; if, from a Senatorial courtesy, or the exercise of a liberal indulgence towards each other in the course of debate, an unanimous consent has been fairly understood for introducing the evidence of diplomatic correspondence in the public discussion of the particular bill before the Senate; or, if in this respect we have not maintained the strict regularity which we might think proper in the abstract in preparing a body of rules for such fallible beings as ourselves; will the recollection of our own proceedings permit us to adopt such a resolution as is now proposed? If by our conduct, in relation to the particular bill, we have without a single exception consented to the course followed by the gentleman from Massachusetts, how does it become us to adjudge him? On reflection, if it be thought that we all have been not sufficiently attentive to rule during the discussion of a bill peculiarly interesting, let us admit the infirmity of our common nature, and dismiss the resolution, as we know within ourselves, and feel, that to err is human.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said that the Senate must doubtless have been much gratified at the lecture it had received from so young a member; at being told by the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. DANA) that it was a common custom to disclose messages of a secret nature, and therefore justifiable. Mr. S. said he meant to take no part in this discussion, but he felt himself called upon to say that nothing fell from him that had the most distant allusion to the documents read, (by Mr. PICKERING.) He would say further, that those documents had not been within his recollection, and therefore the gentleman from Connecticut must go further for his proofs than to him. Allusion had also been made by the gentleman in order to substantiate his argument, to the gentleman from Vermont. In this allusion, also, in the opinion of Mr. S., the gentleman was inaccurate.

But the Senate had been told that their rule was very improper. Even that was not now a question for consideration. So long as the rule existed, it ought to be adhered to. The gentleman had boasted of his independence, and declared, whatever the President might say, he would exercise his judgment whether he would reveal it or not.

Mr. DANA explained. Did I, said he, as an individual, say that I would communicate confidential matters without the leave of the Senate? I certainly was misapprehended. I say that this body is the judge of what is proper to be kept in confidence. It was not for me to say what has been the usage before; but, as a witness of what had passed under my own eye, whatever be the diversity of years between myself and others, however young I am in the Senate, I had a right at least to apply the eternal principles of justice, and to say, let him that is without sin throw the first stone.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, continued. I know very well, sir, said he, that I am myself so unfortunate, in the warmth of debate, as to be misapprehended by others; but, surely, the gentleman could not have been misapprehended in this case. There was no occasion for him to say that the Senate could take off the injunction of secrecy. Every member was convinced of that.

Mr. DANA said, in explanation, that the mover of the resolution had gone into some argument on the general question; and when the gentleman thought proper to do so, it seemed but a decent respect to allude to his argument.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, resumed. There can be no doubt whatever, sir, that there are certain things of a confidential nature which are extremely advantageous to us in making up our opinions; and that the President, when he communicates such things, acts with a strong reliance on the honor of those to whom he communicates, and with a strong impression that no man will feel at liberty to divulge any part of it. If we depart from our usual line of conduct in this respect, it cannot be expected that the President will hereafter place so much reliance on us as to give us confidential communications on any subject. We have, indeed, latterly received no confidential communications; not that it ever happened in this House before that anything of a confidential nature was made public. My chief object in rising, however, was to state that when I spoke on the subject on a former occasion, I said I would not give my consent to call on the Executive for papers to substantiate a title which we have already substantiated by law.

Mr. DANA said, that as to the gentleman's allusion to the confidential papers, he had not expressed himself with decision. The gentleman's remarks, however, had left a faint trace of that kind on his mind.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said it was a very unfortunate trace. He had been already sufficiently slandered in the newspapers of the country; and the gentleman's idea going into the public prints, his name would be traduced in the Federal prints from one end of the continent to the other, from the gentleman's faint trace.

Mr. BRENT said, from the remarks which had been made by the gentleman from Connecticut, it was indispensably necessary that this resolution should be adopted. If it was a common practice to divulge secret proceedings, it was necessary to put a stop to a course so disgraceful and ruinous to the country. The gentleman had wished that he who was innocent of it should cast the first stone.

Mr. DANA said, he only alluded to the transaction which was now the subject of debate.

Mr. BRENT observed, he had then misapprehended the gentleman.

Mr. POPE said, that not having had it in his power to attend the Senate since Friday, and some observations having been made, calculated to produce an impression that he had alluded to the confidential documents, he thought it due to himself to state that he did not before know of the existence of such documents, as they had been communicated long before he had a seat here.

Mr. FRANKLIN said there could be no doubt that the conduct of the gentleman from Massachusetts was in violation of the rule of the Senate. Let it be recollected, said he, that in the commencement of the session, two resolutions were offered to the Senate calling upon the President of the United States for information as to the claim of the United States to the territory in question. They were thought improper, and the Senate refused to call for the information. What has been the course of this business? After the Senate had expressed this opinion, a gentleman rises and reads precisely the documents which the Senate had refused to call for, and compels us, notwithstanding our own decision, to hear those papers read. I should be sorry to believe that the gentleman did it intentionally; but as respects the rule laid down for the government of the Senate, it is a palpable violation of it. All things in the nature of treaties, &c., come to us confidentially, and so remain until the injunction of secrecy is taken off. If a gentleman sees proper to rise and read those communications, does he not incur the responsibility attached to the violation of those rules, and may he not do infinite mischief? When instructions were sent forward to acquire, by purchase, so much territory as should secure to us the right of deposit at New Orleans, to the surprise of every one, the whole country was acquired. We purchased this Territory, and have gone on to legislate on the purchase. We have set up a claim and established it; but, upon the representation of the Spanish Government, have forborne until now to occupy the Territory. This state of things was kept in view by the President. The people of Florida having denied the authority of Spain, and set up a claim of their own, the United States say, they will now enforce their claim, subject to a future negotiation with Spain, if she should be in a situation to renew her claim. While this is pending, an Executive record of six years standing is read; and it is impossible that even the President of the Senate could say that the gentleman was reading papers confidentially communicated. No man, from memory, could have stopped the gentleman in the commencement of the reading. The Senate, after laying down rules for its government, ought to see that they were observed.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said that having been interrupted by the gentleman from Connecticut, he had forgotten one thing he intended to notice. He now rose to apologize for what the gentleman had termed negligence. The gentleman stated, said Mr. S., that the member from Massachusetts had read one document, and declared his intention to read another; and yet that the sensitive feelings of no gentleman had induced him to check him. When the reading of the papers was first began, sir, I doubted whether they were or were not confidential papers. After the letter of Mr. Talleyrand was read through, I thought they were confidential papers, but I was not certain. I applied to the Secretary of the Senate to know whether they were or were not. On being informed of the fact, I immediately, as I deemed it proper, stated it to the Senate.

Mr. CLAY wished to be allowed to trespass on the attention of the Senate one moment in reply to some remarks not before noticed. If indeed there had been such repeated violations of the rule, and even within one week, that the gentleman was to lose the responsibility of it in consequence of its frequency, it seemed the more necessary to revert to the original rules and give to them the force which they had lost. If any gentleman feels at liberty to disclose at will Executive communications, it is necessary to give some pledge that we will henceforward pay more regard to them. The gentleman from Connecticut, if I mistake not, has told us, sir, that the secrecy imposed by communications in confidence depends on the individual honor of each member.—[Mr. DANA said, he had said it depended on the honor of the members as composing this body.] Mr. C. continued. I did not mean to impute to the gentleman an opinion that each member was at liberty to disclose matters communicated confidentially, but I did understand him that the honor of the individual members was a sufficient pledge that they will not disclose that which is communicated in confidence. It is not simply on that bond, forcible as it ought to be, that the President ought to have entire reliance that his communications will not be divulged; but, in my mind, on a solemn compact between the President and Senate, which ought to be inviolable. The following is the rule in relation to this subject: "All confidential communications made by the President of the United States to the Senate, shall, by the members thereof, be kept inviolably secret; and all the treaties which may hereafter be laid before the Senate shall also be kept secret until the Senate shall by their resolution take off the injunction of secrecy." Relying with confidence on the honor of the body and the rule before me which promises secrecy, could the President anticipate the unpleasant event of a disclosure of confidential papers, not only contrary to his wish, but to the will of the Senate, and to our rules? Will the gentleman from Connecticut contend that a casual incidental reference, in the course of a detail of circumstances, to communications of this kind, is to be compared to the deliberate act of taking a file of papers, unfolding them, reading paper after paper, and commenting on its language? Surely there is all possible difference between the character of the two acts. I certainly, sir, do not recollect all the circumstances detailed by the gentleman from Vermont. He went into a particular detail of circumstances attending the acquisition of Louisiana, and possibly, though I do not recollect it, he might have glanced incidentally at these papers. When these communications were made I was not a member, and till the day before yesterday did not know that they were communicated confidentially. Every view requires of us, in justice to the character of the Senate, to afford a pledge that confidential communications hereafter made shall not be indiscreetly disclosed.

Mr. ANDERSON said he should have said nothing on this subject but for the ground taken by the honorable gentleman from Connecticut, as a justification of the conduct of the gentleman from Massachusetts. I did not (said Mr. A.) understand any gentleman to say anything in debate relating, as I conceived, to confidential communications; but the honorable gentleman from Connecticut has taken that as a ground of defence. The gentleman seems desirous that we should suffer the resolution to be withdrawn, and pass a censure on the Senate for having suffered it to go on, because the presumption is, not having been sooner called to order, that the gentleman was not out of order. But will it be supposed for a moment that the gentleman was not out of order? It has been well observed that on this subject two resolutions had been offered to the House and disagreed to by large majorities. Although I was a member of the Senate when the documents were communicated, and for many years since, I could not at once recollect when or how they were communicated. The gentleman did not say they were confidential. When he was asked, are they confidential—without looking at the endorsement or anything, he answered that they were confidential. Is there any comparison between this deliberate perusal and vague allusions to them? Certainly not. I hope the resolution will pass.

Mr. TAYLOR said he was already fully sensible of the disadvantages under which a new member labors in a legislative body; but if he had totally forgotten them, he should have been reminded of them to-day. But if the situation have its disadvantages it has also its advantages. I was not (said Mr. T.) a witness of the previous aberrations from order, and, therefore, this simple question is before me: Was the gentleman from Massachusetts guilty of a breach of order, and is he, therefore, amenable to the Senate? And I should not now rise but that the course of debate particularly introduced by the gentleman from Connecticut appears to have led the Senate from the issue in fact which was tendered by the gentleman from Massachusetts himself. The justification of the gentleman is still almost vibrating in the ears of the Senate—it has gone abroad—I have seen it already in print. He did not justify the perusal on the ground that the subject had been touched upon by other gentlemen of the Senate, but because it was a great question—a question of war or peace; and he took the ground, I presume, of a right to judge, in his individual capacity, of the propriety of divulging or not divulging this matter, the disclosure of which is forbidden by the rules of the Senate. That appeared to me to be the issue tendered by the gentleman himself. The rule having been read to me, and the gentleman having justified his departure from it on the ground of the importance of the subject, I have nothing to do but decide whether we shall at once, by suffering the transaction to pass unnoticed, do away all that confidence which ought to subsist between the different branches of the Government. I cannot under these circumstances but give the resolution my decided affirmative.

Mr. PICKERING.—Mr. President, when I came to the Senate this morning, I did not know that any gentleman would speak either for the purpose of postponing a decision on the question now under consideration, or of explaining it; or take any ground for my vindication. All that has been said with these views was without my previous knowledge. The gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. DANA) has taken the ground on which I meant to rest my defence; and his observations may, therefore, be thought to supersede any of my own. But, not thinking of such support, I had endeavored to recollect what passed on the first day the West Florida bill was under discussion, and which gave occasion to the production of the papers, the reading of which is now the subject of censure. To repeat what I recollect may not be useless.

The gentleman from Vermont on my left, (Mr. BRADLEY,) on taking up the bill, and advocating the title of the United States to West Florida (which is assumed as the basis of the bill) referred to the papers relating to the negotiation for the purchase of Louisiana; and asserted that the French Ministers had then stated to those of the United States, (Messrs. Livingston and Monroe,) and induced them to believe, that Louisiana comprehended West Florida. To this I answered, that I was satisfied the gentleman was mistaken; that I had some recollection of those papers; and that they would show the idea of West Florida being comprised in the purchase of Louisiana, to have been an after-thought of our Ministers, some time subsequent to the conclusion of the treaty. I also repeated, from my recollection, an observation of our Ministers on the occasion—that, if West Florida was comprehended, the purchase would be the more valuable. I said also, that, prior to the purchase, Louisiana and West Florida were considered as distinct territories; and for the proof I referred to a letter from Mr. Talleyrand to General Armstrong, in consequence of his application for the favorable interposition of the French Government to induce Spain to cede to the United States both the Floridas; and I stated that the reasons contained in that letter appeared so convincing, on both sides of the Senate, that every mouth was shut, as to our title to West Florida.

In this manner those documents were originally referred to; and although they had been confidentially communicated, which no gentleman who was a member of the Senate in 1803 and 1805 could have forgotten, yet this plain and public reference to them passed without objection. In fact, as no negotiation was pending, as we had no Minister at any foreign Court, to be affected by the disclosure, there existed no reason for concealment; and I could not consider the papers any longer under the seal of secrecy, and that to have recourse to them to ascertain material facts, and whether the memory of the gentleman from Vermont or my own was correct, would be a "palpable" departure from the rules. I, therefore, openly referred to them. But, sir, on Monday last, when the bill was again taken up, and before I read the papers in question, I gave some details, to show how the negotiation relative to Louisiana had originated. I stated that the United States having the right to navigate the Mississippi, they, in 1795, acquired the right of deposit for our merchandise and effects at New Orleans, by our treaty with Spain; that at a subsequent period (in 1801 or 1802) this right of deposit was disputed, and the navigation obstructed. I remarked, that to recover our rights different projects were suggested; on one side it was proposed to resort to arms; on the other, to take a pacific course; that the latter being adopted, our Ministers were instructed to negotiate with France for the purchase of New Orleans and the Floridas, or for such part thereof as could be obtained: that the purchase of Louisiana had never been contemplated. And to show the error of the gentleman from Vermont, on the first discussion, I turned to a letter from our Ministers, dated the 7th of June, 1803, more than five weeks after the treaty had been concluded; and read a passage to prove what I suggested on the first day's discussion, that the idea of West Florida being comprised in the cession of Louisiana, originated with them, and not with the

SENATE.

Ministers of France. I next proceeded to read the letter of Mr. Talleyrand to General Armstrong, of the 21st of December, 1804, which produced the powerful effect already mentioned, when first read in the Senate six years ago.

Having proceeded thus deliberately; having particularly described each paper before I read it, I presumed every gentleman of the Senate who had been a member in 1803 and 1805, knew distinctly what the papers were; and perceiving no objection, I could only suppose that the Senate acquiesced, and in fact were desirous of hearing them read.

But, sir, it has been said by more than one gentleman, that two resolutions for the production of all the papers, of which I read a small part, had been offered and rejected. It is very true; and the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. SMITH) has, I believe, correctly stated why they were rejected. Not that the Senate were determined to shut their eyes against all evidence, but because they thought our title to West Florida to be clear, and they would not spend time in investigating it. It was not that these papers were to be locked up forever; but that members were so well satisfied of the title, they wanted no further information concerning it.

The gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. TAYLOR) has stated my having put myself on the issue of fact, and taken the ground of justification. It is very true, and that, on Monday, when some discussion took place, I offered, at the moment, what appeared to me a substantial reason why the documents should be read. I have now explained the grounds on which I proceeded, and really cannot but think they will prove a sufficient justification.

The gentleman from Maryland (Mr. SMITH) said, on Monday, that there would be no objection to the publication of the papers which I read; and that, if leave had been asked to read them, it would doubtless have been granted. Then, sir, no harm is done. What is the reason of the rule in question? Its object is to prevent the disclosure of any facts which the public interest requires to be kept secret. And what is the real state of the case under consideration? I have publicly read to the Senate some papers originally communicated confidentially, on a subject concerning which there is no negotiation depending in relation to any foreign Power, or any Minister abroad; and in which there is nothing any longer requiring secrecy. Surely, then, the reason for this rule of confidence has ceased; it did not apply to these papers. No State secret was disclosed, or meant to be disclosed. When a proposition was made to publish the whole of the documents, I myself remarked that there were some which it might be improper to publish. What does this prove? Certainly that I was not disposed to divulge what required confidence. And, so far as I went, I really conceived that I was proceeding with the approbation of the Senate.

As to the documents which I read, the reason of the rule is at an end. And, with gentlemen of the bar, the maxim is familiar, that when the reason of the law ceases, the law itself ceases. If there has been a violation of the rule, it is of the letter only: and to this another law maxim applies—he who sticks in the letter, sticks in the bark. I will quote one more maxim, from a higher authority: "The letter killeth, but the spirit giveth life."

With these observations I will close. They appear to me, and I did trust they would have appeared to the Senate, a complete vindication.

Mr. CHAMPLIN said he could not put his hand on his heart, and say that the transaction which was the subject of the resolution was strictly correct. But circumstances palliated the act. There certainly had been, in the previous debate, some allusion to papers not published. Being a new member, of course he knew very little about the confidential documents, but he certainly had heard allusions which he really did not understand, having reference to documents of which he had no knowledge. He did not recollect by what gentleman these were made. What had the gentleman from Massachusetts done? Had he taken the Senate by surprise? No. He declared that France had been of a different opinion from our Administration as to the boundary; that on application an answer had been given to them by Talleyrand, which, when read, had closed every mouth in the Senate on the subject of the title of the United States. Mr. C. said he had heard no objection to this allusion; nothing had been said about it. If it had been the intention of the honorable gentleman to have palmed this paper on the public, and to take the Senate by surprise, would he have stated what he did before he read it? He did it in the most deliberate manner, and called the attention of every member to it. Mr. C. said he was very glad the paper was read, and he hoped gentlemen would also permit it to be published, not only for the information of the Senate, but for the information of the people, because he considered this question as one of peace or war. He himself could not consent to vote on this bill till he was better informed; he was ignorant of many points. From the open manner in which the gentleman had introduced the letter, it became every or any one who had a knowledge of its being confidential, to call him to order. If I am called upon to express my opinion, I cannot, in conscience, say the gentleman was altogether correct; neither was it correct in gentlemen previously to allude to those papers. I think the gentleman had no right to decide for himself; it was for the Senate to decide whether it would be proper to disclose them. And yet, admitting this fact, I cannot consent to give my vote that the gentleman has been guilty of a palpable violation of the rule. What, sir, shall we, for this offence, declare that an honorable member of the Senate, who has grown grey in the public service, whom I venerate, has palpably offended against our rules? Mr. C. said he thought the gentleman's conduct had not been justified fully by himself; but there were strong palliating circumstances.

As to politics, if, on this occasion, they were drawn into view, he agreed with the gentleman, except in some points in relation to Great Britain, in which he did not agree with him. But difference of opinion from the gentleman would not induce him to give a vote to stigmatize him. To pass a censure on a man grown grey in the public service, as a palpable violator of the rules of the Senate, he could not agree. He must vote against the resolution, and he hoped that, from that vote, no inference would be drawn that he believed the conduct of the gentleman to have been entirely correct.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said, he had no doubt on his mind, that if the gentleman had asked the consent of the Senate to read those papers, it would have been given. The gentleman, however, had said, that when those papers were read, in 1805, they had shut the mouth of every member as to the claim of the United States. For my own part, sir, said Mr. S., I can only state that the reading of those papers had not the least effect whatever on my opinion as to the title of the United States. I did then, and do now, believe, that the words of the treaty, by which alone we and they are bound, did give us a fair right to the country in question. Neither, sir, can I recollect any act at that time pending before Congress, which could have shown that the mouth of every member was shut as to this question.

Mr. ANDERSON said, the paper in question had not, at the time it was sent to the Senate, and he now declared it might not have, any bearing on the title of the United States. He recollected that this letter was addressed to our Minister at a time when they wished to extend the boundary of East Florida as far west as they could, in order to induce the United States to give a greater price for it than they would otherwise have done.

Mr. CRAWFORD said, he regretted extremely the occasion which had given rise to this discussion. It was, at all times, unpleasant to come into a state of collision with those with whom we are called upon to act, and, particularly so, when the resolution before the Senate charged a member not only with having violated a rule, but with having palpably violated it. The resolution assumed a fact, not denied, that certain confidential papers were publicly read without a removal of the injunction of secrecy. Mr. C. said he was not in his place when this unpleasant transaction took place, nor had he a distinct recollection of what had fallen from the gentleman from Vermont. He recollected, to be sure, some metaphysical ideas expressed by the gentleman, to which he did not assent. If the gentleman made any allusion to those papers, Mr. C. said he could not have detected it, as he had never before heard them; nor, probably, were there half a dozen of the present members of the Senate who had heard them. Mr. C. said, he could not, unless he were constrained, from the nature of the act itself, charge on the records any member with having deliberately violated such a rule as this. He must believe the gentleman did the act without reflection. Believing the gentleman from Massachusetts had not well examined the matter, and did not intend wilfully to violate the rule, he moved to erase from the resolution the word "palpable." Every one must agree that the gentleman's conduct was a violation of the rule.

Mr. CLAY acceded to the motion.

The amendment was agreed to, nem. dis.

Mr. LLOYD said he had considered the word "palpable" as meaning an intentional violation of the rule. As it was admitted now that the disclosure had been attended with no injury; as the gentleman had named the paper he was about to read, and no one had objected to the reading it; and as the resolution would go to imply a censure on the older members of the Senate, as they must have been forgetful of one of the most important national transactions; or have been willing to avail themselves of the honest zeal of a man who had spent his life in the public service to entrap him, and put a censure on the journals of the Senate which should blast his character abroad. He, therefore, moved to insert before the word "violation" the word "unintentional."

Mr. CLAY expressed his surprise at this motion. If it were persisted in, he should feel himself bound to move to strike out of the word the syllable un. If he was compelled to vote at all upon the subject, he would say that the gentleman's conduct had been intentional. But when all were willing to soften the censure; when a gentleman on the same side had admitted that the gentleman's conduct was inexcusable, and the gentleman himself did not say that his act was unintentional, would it not be improper in the House to say that it was? If the thing be persisted in, if the gentleman urges us to decide a fact to which I was willing to have given the go-by, I must feel myself bound to pronounce it an intentional violation.

Mr. ANDERSON said he had been perfectly willing to erase the word palpable; but, if this motion were persisted in, he must call for the yeas and yeas on it; and the gentleman would find the effect of the motion very different from what he intended.

Mr. FRANKLIN repelled, as unfounded in fact, the insinuation of a design in the old Senators to entrap the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. LLOYD withdrew his motion, in consequence of the wishes of his friends near him. It was possible, he said, that, with his very bad memory, he might forget transactions of a week past. But he would not take back the declaration, either that gentlemen had forgotten the documents or were guilty of a breach of duty in not stopping the gentleman from giving them to the world. The proposition before the Senate was not a naked one, but stated two facts; one, that the rule was violated, and the other that it had been so violated as to deserve one of the most serious censures. Unless gentlemen could make up their minds to say that it was an intentional violation, they could not vote for the resolution.

JANUARY, 1811.

Question of Order.

SENATE.

Mr. GOODRICH said, that the grounds on which gentlemen supported the resolution were as he apprehended too limited and partial; they seemed to suppose that our attention ought to be confined solely to the question, whether or not the transaction alluded to was an infraction of the Senate's rule. To give the subject the liberal and just view it merits, other and important considerations must be noticed. We must consider the nature and character of the transaction, its effects in relation to the Senate, and the public interests, and what is proper for us to do. On a candid examination of these questions, I am persuaded that it will be found that neither a respect for the order or honor of the Senate, nor any of the public interests, require the adoption of the resolution. It is not denied, it is admitted, that the transaction was an infraction of the letter of the rule. Does it thence conclusively follow that the resolution is necessary or proper? The occurrence is not uncommon for gentlemen in the zeal and ardor of discussion to trespass on the rules of order prescribed for their conduct. And it may be asked, whether this be the only instance in which documents of a confidential nature have been adverted to and commented on in public debate? On ordinary occasions, Mr. President, under your superintendence, order is preserved, without being over nice and critical on questions of this sort.

And this, sir, may be one reason, why the Senate is distinguished, as it eminently is, for the decorum of their proceedings. Admitting what, it is believed, no one is disposed to question, that there has been an infraction of the rule literally considered, are we, I ask, bound, as gentlemen insist, to notice it, and in this novel and unprecedented manner, by recording it in our journals? It will not escape the attention of gentlemen that a proposition may be true—but, being a mere abstract proposition, leads to no practical use; it may neither do good or harm. This resolution however is not altogether of that cast; it is not a mere abstract proposition in itself innocent and harmless; in many respects it is extremely exceptionable. It does not, as it ought, fully state the case. Those prominent circumstances which forcibly mark the quality, and go to decide the character of the transaction, are left out. They passed before us: we were witnesses of them, and since, in our present discussion, they have been brought fresh to our recollection by a minute and faithful recital of them. Can gentlemen say those circumstances are not essential to the forming a true and correct estimate of the transaction? And if so, how can we justify a vote in favor of the resolution, when there is left out of it facts important to the true and correct state of the whole case? The resolution implies censure. It is not merited. Taking everything into consideration, no one can suppose that the honorable gentleman whose conduct is impeached was actuated by improper views. I do not believe that he had any idea of violating the confidence enjoined by the Senate's rule; what may be said is, that there has been a want of that circumspectful attention to its injunctions that their peremptory nature required. He has offended in the letter. If he had other than honest and fair views, why did he read the documents in the open and public manner he had done, first naming each of them and commenting on their contents as he proceeded? And are not the previous circumstances so often mentioned, naturally leading to the proceeding, and the silence of the Senate on the occurrence while passing before us to be taken into account? The honorable gentleman from Georgia (Mr. CRAWFORD) with a candor which marks his conduct, says that he does not believe that there was a criminal intent to violate the rule. If I understood him he placed it on the grounds I am disposed to consider it; as proceeding from want of circumspection, indiscretion, and not from intention. Believing this, sir, I cannot consent to place on the records a resolution which goes unquestionably in its nature to censure the conduct of the honorable gentleman, and without any of the accompanying circumstances which mark the character of the whole transaction. While we seek to maintain inviolate the order and dignity of the body of which we are members, we ought not to overlook those considerations of respect and justice which are due to every individual member.

In respect to our proceedings on this resolution, so far as they relate to the Senate, and what best comports with our own honor, permit me to ask of gentlemen, whether we are not attaching to the act an importance in the public view greater than it really merits.

This resolution will give to the occurrence a consequence, which it could acquire only by our own act, and, instead of protecting, we shall sacrifice our honor. Will not our proceedings partake of an oppressive severity, rather than of the liberality, candor and justice, the case under all its circumstances demands? No public interest has been prejudiced, at home or abroad. Nothing has been revealed which it was necessary or important longer to keep secret.

There is due from each member of the Senate, to all the members, that candor and liberality which may give to our proceedings such a spirit of harmony and consistency, as, however we may differ on great questions, will leave us to discuss subjects here, with that attention and deliberation which serves the great interests of the country. But if, on unintentional violations of the rules of the House, and in their letter only, we bring forward and record on our journals particular propositions pointing to the fact itself, and conveying censure, instead of promoting we shall derogate from the order and harmony of our proceedings, and the dignity and honor of the Senate.

Believing, as I do, that whatever infraction of the rule has taken place has been merely in the letter, proceeding not from intention but from want of circumspection and discretion, that no public interest has been prejudiced by the transaction, and none will be promoted by the resolution, I cannot give to it my assent.

MR. PICKERING.—Mr. President, I am much obliged by the liberal sentiments expressed towards me by my friend at my right hand, (Mr. Goodrich,) but I do not feel willing to consider the act which is the subject of the resolution as an indiscretion. I know, sir, my own frailty; and am far from intimating that I am above the commission of an indiscretion: but I do feel that I have committed none in the present case.

There are two ways, sir, in which the assent of an individual or of a body of men may be given; by words—or by their silence. I have stated the object of my reading the papers adverted to, and the circumstances which accompanied the same; and not doubting that the gentlemen who, with me, were members of the Senate at the times when those papers were laid before us, know that they were confidentially communicated, and yet made no objection to the reading of them—I naturally inferred that the Senate assented to the act: Under these circumstances I cannot view it as an indiscretion.

The question on the resolution, as amended, by leaving out the word "palpable," was then decided in the affirmative—yeas 20, nays 7, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Brent, Campbell, Clay, Condit, Crawford, Cutts, Franklin, Gaillard, German, Gilman, Leib, Mathewson, Read, Robinson, Smith of Maryland, Smith of New York, Tait, Taylor, Whiteside.

NAYS—Messrs. Bradley, Champlin, Dana, Goodrich, Horsey, Lambert, and Lloyd.

THURSDAY, January 3.

Mr. CAMPBELL gave notice that to-morrow he should ask leave to bring in a bill to authorize the surveying and making of certain roads in the State of Ohio, as contemplated by the treaty of Brownstown, in the Territory of Michigan.

The bill, entitled "An act making an additional appropriation to supply the deficiency in the appropriation for the relief and protection of distressed American seamen during the year 1810," was read the third time; and, on motion, by Mr. LLOYD, it was agreed, by unanimous consent, to amend the bill, so as to make the appropriation "seventy-six thousand dollars."

Resolved, That this bill pass with an amendment.

On motion, by Mr. POPE, the bill authorizing a subscription on the part of the United States to the stock of the Ohio Canal Company was referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon; and Messrs. POPE, ANDERSON, and BRADLEY, were appointed the committee.

The bill, entitled "An act providing for the final adjustment of claims to lands, and for the sale of the public lands in the Territories of Orleans and Louisiana," was read the second time, and referred to a select committee, to consist of five members, to consider and report thereon; and Messrs. CAMPBELL, CRAWFORD, GREGG, BRADLEY, and DANA, were appointed the committee.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act to suspend the second section of the act, entitled 'An act regulating foreign coins, and for other purposes," with amendments, in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate. They have also passed a bill, entitled "An act providing for the removal of the Land Office established at Nashville, in the State of Tennessee, and Canton, in the State of Ohio, and to authorize the register and receiver of public moneys to superintend the public sales of land in the district east of Pearl river;" in which bill they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill last mentioned was read, and passed to the second reading.

The amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill, entitled "An act to suspend the second section of the act, entitled 'An act regulating foreign coins, and for other purposes,'" were read.

On motion, by Mr. BRADLEY, the further consideration thereof was postponed, and the amendments ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill, entitled "An act to fix the compensation of the additional Assistant Postmaster General," together with the amendment reported by the select committee; and, having agreed thereto, the President reported the bill to the House amended accordingly. On the question, Shall this bill be read the third time as amended? it was determined in the affirmative.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill, entitled "An act to continue in force for a further time the first section of the act, entitled 'An act further to protect the commerce and seamen of the United States against the Barbary Powers.'"

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill, entitled "An act to authorize the Secretary of War to ascertain and settle, by the appointment of commissioners, the exterior line of the public land at West Point with the adjoining proprietor;" and on motion, by Mr. SMITH, of New York, it was referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon; and Messrs. SMITH, of New York, BRADLEY, and DANA, were appointed the committee.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill declaring the laws now in force in the Territory of Orleans, to extend to, and to have full force and effect to, the river Perdido, pursuant to the treaty concluded at Paris, on the 30th day of April, 1803, and for other purposes; and on motion, by Mr. FRANKLIN, the galleries were cleared and the doors of the Senate Chamber closed.

A confidential Message was received from the President of the United States.

The doors of the Senate Chamber were opened; and on motion, by Mr. BRADLEY, the further consideration of the bill last mentioned was postponed until to-morrow.

king of certain roads in the State of Ohio, as contemplated in the treaty of Brownstown, in the Territory of Michigan; and the bill was read and passed to the second reading.

Mr. CUTTS, from the committee, reported the amendment to the bill, entitled "An act to fix the compensation of the additional Assistant Postmaster General," correctly engrossed; and the bill was read the third time as amended.

Resolved, That this bill pass with an amendment.

The PRESIDENT communicated a report of the Secretary of War on the sale of public arms to individual States, as authorized by the act of the second of April, 1808, entitled "An act to authorize the sale of public arms;" which was read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

Mr. LEIB presented the memorial of John Boren, W. John Duane, and R. C. Weightman, submitting a proposal for printing the laws of the United States, upon conditions therein stated; and the memorial was read, and referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon; and Messrs. LEIB, GOODRICH, and HORSEY, were appointed the committee.

Mr. LEIB submitted the following motion:

Resolved, That a committee of three members of the Senate be appointed, who, with three members of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by the said House, shall have the application of the money appropriated by the "Act making a further appropriation for support of a library," passed the 21st of February, 1806; and that the Secretary give information thereof to the House of Representatives.

The bill, entitled "An act to continue in force, for a further time, the first section of the act, entitled "An act further to protect the commerce and seamen of the United States against the Barbary Powers," was read the third time, and passed.

The bill, entitled "An act for the removal of the land office established at Nashville, in the State of Tennessee, and Canton, in the State of Ohio, and to authorize the register, and receiver of public moneys to superintend the public sales of land in the district east of Pearl river," was read the second time.

The bill for the benefit of seamen of the United States was read the second time, and on motion, by Mr. LLOYD, the further consideration thereof was postponed until Tuesday next.

On motion by Mr. HORSEY,

Resolved, That the bill authorizing the sale and grant of a certain quantity of public land to the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal Company be referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon.

Ordered, That Messrs. HORSEY, FRANKLIN, and CONDIR, be the committee.

MONDAY, January 7.

JAMES A. BAYARD, from the State of Delaware, took his seat in the Senate.

The PRESIDENT communicated the report of the Secretary of War on the expenditures of the moneys appropriated for the contingent expenses of the Military Establishment for the year 1810, in conformity to the fifth section of the act of third March, 1809, further to amend the several acts for the establishment of the Treasury, War, and Navy Departments; which was read for consideration.

The Senate resumed the motion made the 4th instant, on the subject; and

Resolved, That a committee of three members of the Senate be appointed, who, with three members of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by the said House, shall have the application of the moneys appropriated by the "Act making a further appropriation for the support of a library," passed the 21st of February, 1806; and that the Secretary give information thereof to the House of Representatives.

Ordered, That Messrs. LEIB, SMITH of Maryland, and CONDIR, be the committee on the part of the Senate.

The bill to authorize the surveying and making of certain roads in the State of Ohio, as contemplated by the treaty of Brownstown, in the Territory of Michigan, was read the second time, and referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon; and Messrs. CAMPBELL, BRADLEY, and GREGG, were appointed the committee.

Mr. DANA presented the petition of William Mills, a debtor in confinement at the suit of the United States in the jail at Haddam, in the State of Connecticut, praying the interposition of Congress on his behalf, for reasons therein mentioned; and the petition was read.

The bill to incorporate the Bank of Potomac, and the bill to incorporate the Bank of Washington; also, the bill to incorporate the subscribers to the Farmers' Bank of Alexandria, were severally postponed.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill, entitled "An act providing for the removal of the land office established at Nashville, in the State of Tennessee, and Canton, in the State of Ohio, and to authorize the register and receiver of public moneys to superintend the sales of public land in the district East of Pearl river;" and, on motion by Mr. CAMPBELL, the bill was referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon; and Messrs. CAMPBELL, FRANKLIN, and BAYARD, were appointed the committee.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House disagree to the amendment to the bill, entitled "An act to fix the compensation of the additional Assistant Postmaster General."

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendment disagreed to by the House of Representatives to the bill, entitled "An act to fix the compensation of the additional Assistant Postmaster General."

Resolved, That the Senate recede from their amendment to the said bill.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill, entitled "An act to suspend the second

JANUARY 7, 1811.

The Message and report were read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill for the relief of the collectors of the ports of Norfolk, Baltimore, and Philadelphia; and, on motion, by Mr. LEIB, the consideration thereof was further postponed.

On motion, by Mr. CLAY, the galleries were cleared, and the doors of the Senate Chamber closed.

TUESDAY, January 8.

THOMAS WORTHINGTON, appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the State of Ohio, in place of RETURN JONATHAN MEIGS, resigned, produced his credentials, which were read; and the oath prescribed by law having been administered to him, he took his seat in the Senate.

Mr. HORSEY, from the Committee to whom was referred the bill authorizing the sale and grant of a certain quantity of public land to the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal Company, reported it without amendment.

Mr. GREGG presented the petition of Isaac Wayne, son and executor of the late Major General Anthony Wayne, praying remission of certain sums found against the estate of his father on settlement of his account with the Treasury officers, for reasons therein stated; and the petition was read, and referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon by bill or otherwise.

Messrs. GREGG, PICKERING, and REED, were appointed the committee.

The PRESIDENT communicated a letter signed Adam Seybert, in behalf of the committee appointed by the House of Representatives to provide for the safe-keeping of the books in the library belonging to Congress, stating that they are in great danger of being ruined in consequence of leaks in the roof of the building, and asking permission to place them for a time in one of the committee rooms belonging to the Senate; and the letter was read.

Resolved, That the Senate comply with the request contained therein, and assign their largest committee room for the purpose.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland, from the committee appointed on the 9th December, on the subject, reported a bill making further provision for the corps of engineers; which was read, and passed to the second reading.

Mr. LLOYD presented the petition of Nathaniel F. Fosdick, late collector of the district of Portland and Falmouth, now in confinement, at the suit of the United States, in Portland, in the District of Maine, and praying the interposition of Congress on his behalf, for the reasons therein stated; and the petition was read and referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon by bill or otherwise; and Messrs. LLOYD, BRADLEY, and CUTTS, were appointed the committee.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. SMITH of New York, presented the memorial of the President and Directors of the Bank of New York, praying a renewal of the charter of the Bank of the United States, for reasons therein stated; and the memorial was read, and referred to the committee appointed on the 18th December, to consider the petition of the President and Directors of the Bank of the United States, on the same subject. The memorial is as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, the memorial of the President and Directors of the Bank of New York, respectfully sheweth:

That, viewing with solicitude the question now before your honorable Houses, for the renewal of the charter of the Bank of the United States, they feel it their duty to express, with all submission, their sentiments upon the subject.

They will not presume to enter into any general discussion of the utility of banking institutions, but will confine their observations to those points, which their situation, as directors of a bank, gives them, perhaps, peculiar advantages in judging of.

They view the institution of the Bank of the United States as highly useful to the State banks. From the extent of its capital, its numerous branches, and, above all, from the protection of the Government, it is enabled to facilitate remittances to every part of the United States, to equalize the balance of specie capital among the different cities, and, in cases of any sudden pressure upon the merchants, to step forward to their aid, in a degree which the State banks are unable to do. It is also able to assist any State institution, which, from peculiar circumstances, may require it.

The Bank of New York having been established prior to the incorporation of the Bank of the United States, the directors have witnessed, from the very commencement of the branch bank in this city, the influence of such an institution, as well as the conduct of those to whose management it has been intrusted during that whole period, and your memorialists declare, with confidence, that, in their opinion, that power has been uniformly exerted with prudence; as it respected the public; with great liberality as it respected other institutions.

At any period, great inconveniences must result from the sudden withdrawing a considerable portion of the active capital of a commercial country; but, in the opinion of your memorialists, such an event would be attended with peculiar distress, at the present time, when, from the aggressions of foreign Governments, such immense sums have been sequestered, and, in various ways, detained in Europe, and when the merchants, from the embarrassments of commerce in almost every quarter, are deprived of their usual resources. It is well known that there never has been a greater demand for money in the commercial cities than at the present time, although it appears that the Bank of the United States has not yet commenced that reduction of its loans, which must take place, in the case of the charter not being renewed. The demands already made upon the State banks have pressed them to their utmost limits, and, from these causes, they will be utterly unable to supply, in any considerable degree, that aid which has hitherto been afforded by the Bank of the United States. The consequences must be, very great and individual distress, and heavy losses, as well to the revenue as to all the moneyed institutions. The renewal of the charter of the Bank of the United States will render such reductions unnecessary, and by relieving the apprehensions now excited through almost every class of the community, restore that confidence so essential to the system of public credit, under which the United States have so much prospered.

Your memorialists, therefore, cannot but hope and solicit that the charter of the Bank of the United States may be renewed.

M. CLARKSON, President.

Attest: CHARLES WILKES, Cashier.

On motion, by Mr. CLAY, the galleries were cleared, and the doors of the Senate Chamber closed.

WEDNESDAY, January 9.

Mr. LLOYD presented the petition of Ebenezer Rollins, of Boston, in the State of Massachusetts, praying the interposition of Congress on his behalf in relation to debentures on a parcel of coffee by him exported, on board the ship Rebecca Coffin, to Gottenburg, withheld by the collector of the port of Boston, owing to informalities arising from causes beyond his control, as is stated in the petition; which was read, and referred to the committee to whom was referred, on the 24th of December, the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of George Armroyd and Co.," to consider and report thereon.

The PRESIDENT communicated the report of the Secretary of the Navy on the expenditures and application of the moneys drawn from the Treasury from the 1st of October, 1809, to the 30th of September, 1810, inclusive, made in obedience to the first section of the act passed the 3d of March, 1809, entitled, "An act further to amend the several acts for the establishment and regulation of the Treasury, War, and Navy Departments;" and the report was read for consideration.

On motion, by Mr. CLAY, the galleries were cleared, and the doors of the Senate Chamber closed.

THURSDAY, January 10.

The bill making further provision for the corps of engineers was read the second time.

On motion, by Mr. POPE, the galleries were cleared and the doors of the Senate Chamber closed; and after the consideration of the Executive and confidential business, the doors of the Senate Chamber were opened.

Mr. SMITH, of New York, presented the memorial of a number of citizens of the United States residing in the city of New York, signed, in their behalf, M. Clarkson, chairman, and praying an extension of the charter of the Bank of the United States, for reasons therein stated; and the memorial was read, and referred to the committee appointed on the 18th of December to consider the petition of the President and Directors of the Bank of the United States on the same subject.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the whole, the bill to incorporate the Bank of Washington; and the further consideration thereof was postponed until to-morrow.

GENERAL WAYNE.

Mr. GREGG, from the committee to whom was referred the petition of Isaac Wayne, son and executor of the late Major General Anthony Wayne, made report; which was read; and the report, together with the petition, ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate. The Committee report as follows:

That they have considered the said memorial, in which are stated the several items, charged in the public accounts against the deceased, and from which the memorialist prays the estate of the deceased may be relieved; and several other items for which he conceives the deceased entitled to credit. That the grounds on which this relief and allowance are prayed for, being distinctly stated in the memorial, the committee desire it may be considered as a part of their report; adding only that they have examined voluminous documents produced by the memorialist, which confirm those statements. The committee being, therefore, of opinion that he is justly entitled to the relief and allowance prayed for, they further beg leave to report a bill for that purpose.

WASHINGTON, January 7, 1811.

To the honorable the Senate, and the honorable the House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, humbly shews:

Isaac Wayne, son and executor of the late Major General Anthony Wayne, that his father, after a life distinguished by services rendered to the United States, died on the 15th day of December, 1796, at Fort Erie; that his letter-books and original entries, and most of his private papers, were, owing to the place and circumstances in which he died, wholly lost to his family, though every exertion has been made by his executor to recover them.

That soon after his death, your petitioner personally, and subsequently by letter, applied at the Department of War for a statement of his accounts; but, owing to the obscurity and uncertainty in which they were enveloped by the place and circumstances of his father's death, he was never able to obtain such a statement; and in the daily hope that time would put into his possession satisfactory vouchers, to enable him to substantiate his claim for that balance, which, he had reason to believe, was due to him from the United States, he postponed an ultimate settlement. But in that hope he has been disappointed; and the Comptroller of the Treasury, having called upon him, through the district attorney of the United States, for the payment of an apparent balance, on the books of the Treasury, he is necessitated, for the allowance of claims resulting from evidence in the possession of your petitioner, (for which, however, the vouchers required by law, or official rules, are insufficient,) to resort to the justice and equity of the Congress of the United States; in the extension of which, towards him, he relies with full confidence, after the particulars on which his claim is founded have been distinctly spread before them.

This your petitioner solicits liberty to do, in the present memorial, not only out of regard to the interest of the heirs of General Wayne, who have a deep stake in the result, but also from respect to an officer not more distinguished for his courage and capacity in the field than for his delicacy and precision for all the pecuniary concerns of his department.

The difficulties attending the settlement of his accounts arise from three items, charged by the officers of the Treasury, erroneously, in the opinion of your petitioner, and by the refusal to allow certain claims for compensation and advances, just and necessary in their nature, though not supported by legal vouchers; the want of which results from the nature of the service, or the circumstances attending the death of General Wayne.

The first item, to which your petitioner objects, is a charge of $629 11. This charge is founded on an order, drawn by General Wayne, in favor of Captain Zebulon Pike, a sub-legionary major pro tempore, which, according to the rules of the Department of War, cannot be allowed, there having been a sub-legionary major then existing. But your petitioner, to repel this charge, has this evidence: that Captain Isaac Guion, the regular sub-legionary major, was taken out of actual service by civil and military process; that the commander had an authority to supply the vacancy thus created; and that such appointment pro tempore took place, and was necessary, inasmuch as it was made in the month of May, 1794, when the army was about to march into the Indian country upon the great service of that year.

The second item of charge, to which your petitioner objects, amounts to $205 04, and is founded on an order in favor of Major Thomas Hughes. This charge has been debited to General Wayne, because it was for pay and emoluments allowed to Hughes after resignation, to which time only, according to the rules of the office, he was entitled to them. To this your petitioner is enabled to reply, that when Major Hughes resigned, he was in the Indian country, and that the allowance for pay and emoluments after that period was for the time necessary to enable him to reach the residence of his family; and that this allowance had always been made in like cases by the predecessors of General Wayne.

The third item is for meal, flour, liquor, and small parts of rations, drawn from the commissary general at Greenville, Miami, and Detroit, in August, September, and November, 1796, amounting to $1,781 45. Concerning this charge, your petitioner has only to observe that General Wayne was, during those months, at those posts, surrounded by crowds of starving and necessitous Indians, which it was the policy of the United States, and his duty, not to allow to suffer while in their garrisons. From the time, manner, and place of General Wayne's death; from the known fact that he never drew, at any time during his command, public rations for his private table; from the long period which has elapsed without any fault of his representatives; and from the other circumstances in his case, your petitioner confidently relies that the accounting officers will be directed to credit General Wayne's estate for the full amount of this item.

The first claim for allowance made by your petitioner, as representative of General Wayne, and which the officers of the Treasury do not deem themselves authorized to pass to his credit, is a charge for compensation, as sole commissioner, appointed for negotiating a treaty with the western Indians. It appears by an account current, filed in the office of the Department of War, on the 4th of June, 1796, that General Wayne charged the United States with five hundred and thirty-four days' services, in that negotiation, at eight dollars the day, being the statute allowance; and that, by a certificate annexed, he declared upon honor, in these words, "that the sum mentioned for my actual service as sole commissioner to treat with the Indian tribes northwest of the Ohio, (and which I believe are made agreeably to the uniform usage and practice, and supported by precedent upon similar occasions,) would not compensate me for the extra labor and expenses necessarily attending that arduous and interesting business." The objection made against this allowance is founded on an opinion given, as is supposed, by one of the Attorney Generals of the United States objecting to the allowance, because General Wayne had not "stated each day actually employed in pacific negotiation." To which the petitioner has only to reply that such a detailed statement was manifestly impossible. That General Wayne, during all that time, was employed in both the offices of Commander-in-chief, and of commissioner; that he has it in his power to show that, from the day of his receiving his commission, to the day of his completing the treaty, he was engaged in successive acts of negotiation; and that it could not be expected, in such a service, that he should make a daily entry, when he made use of the sword, and when he presented the olive branch.

Your petitioner has also further to state, that General Wayne, immediately after filing the above account and making the above certificate, was ordered upon services of a secret and critical nature, and that he never afterwards returned to his family, dying in the western wilderness, as has been stated. All which circumstances being taken into your wise and just consideration, will, your petitioner confidently hopes, induce your honorable body to authorize the proper accounting officer to pass that sum also to the credit of General Wayne.

Another claim, resulting from the evidence in the possession of your petitioner, but which is legally insufficient to justify the officers of the Treasury in allowing it, is for the amount of $1,500. The evidence on which this rests is a certificate of General Wayne, made on the 10th day of June, 1796, the day on which he left his family for the last time. It being precautionary in its nature, and for extra expenses on account of the Indians, at the treaty, while engaged as commissioner, your petitioner has no other voucher than that certificate, the known circumstances of that negotiation, and the express provisions of the act of Congress contemplating such an expenditure.

The last claim is for an allowance on account of moneys expended on the service in which he died, being for contingencies of secret service and the Indian department. It appears, by the certificate last mentioned, that, for these purposes, on the 8th day of June, 1796, General Wayne received from the Secretary of War $3,000, for which he was to account.

JANUARY, 1811.

Proceedings.

SENATE.

Your petitioner is prepared to prove, that, on the 10th of the same June, he proceeded to the execution of his orders, on a concern of a very delicate, confidential, and important nature; that he completed the objects of his mission; that, in the course of it, he must have expended considerable sums for the objects on account of which the advance was made; that the nature of the service made such advances inevitable; and that, on the death of General Wayne, not a single dollar of money of any description was found in his possession.

When all these circumstances are taken into consideration; when the peculiar accuracy of his character, and his high principles of honor, in relation to public moneys intrusted to him, are recollected; when it is known that he was seized in the midst of actual service, in full health, by a disorder which, "at once disqualified him from speaking concerning all temporal concerns;" and that the time and place of his death have precluded absolutely his representatives from obtaining his letter books, and most of his private papers; your petitioner has an entire reliance that your honorable body will not deem a claim of an allowance, equal to the whole amount of the last mentioned advance, inequitable or unreasonable.

Your petitioner could recur to other circumstances than those which are thus detailed in his petition. He could state that his father, after many years devoted to public service, without any charge of extravagance or dissipation in pecuniary concerns, left only to his children a real estate received from his ancestors. He could recur to the nature of those services, as eminent as they were useful; but to name them would be to intimate that they could be forgotten by his country. His son, your petitioner, can only express his perfect confidence that the wisdom and justice of the National Legislature will relieve the settlement of the account of so distinguished a citizen and soldier from merely formal embarrassments, and extend to it the principles of a liberal policy and extensive equity.

ISAAC WAYNE,

Legal representative of the late Major General Wayne.

CONFISCATION, IMPORTATIONS, &c.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate of the United States:

I transmit to the Senate a report from the Secretary of the Treasury, on the subject of their resolution of the 21st instant.

JAMES MADISON.

JANUARY 26, 1811.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Jan. 24, 1811.

SIR: On the subject of the resolution of the Senate, of the 21st instant, I have the honor to state:

That there are no documents in the Treasury, showing the amount of the property of citizens or subjects of Great Britain or France, which has been confiscated under the operation of the acts of March 1st, 1809, and 1st May, 1810, relative to the commercial intercourse between Great Britain and the said countries.

That the Secretary of the Treasury having been directed, by a resolution of the House of Representatives, to lay before the House, statements embracing amongst others, the object contemplated by the resolution of the Senate, a circular letter was written on the 22d instant to the several district attorneys for the purpose of obtaining the information required; and that the result, so far as it relates to property of British or French subjects, will be laid before you as soon as it shall have been received.

That it appears by the letter from the Register of the Treasury, a copy of which is herewith transmitted, that the account of importations required by the resolution of the Senate, cannot, so far as relates to the year 1810, be prepared during the present session of Congress.

And that the account for the three last quarters of the year 1809, will be immediately prepared in conformity with the resolution of the Senate.

I have the honor to be, with great respect,

Sir, your obedient servant,

ALBERT GALLATIN.

The PRESIDENT of the U. S.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Register's Office, Jan. 23, 1811.

SIR: I have the honor to submit the following remarks, showing how far the latter clause of the resolution of the Senate of the 21st instant can be complied with.

The importations from foreign countries to the 31st December, 1809, have been collected, and could in a short time be selected so as to meet the object of the resolution.

The accounts of the collectors for the year 1810, having been but partially received, a statement, such as is contemplated, could not be completed in time for the present session of Congress.

If the words in the resolution, "and specifying the countries to which the latter belonged," is meant to apply to the vessels in which the merchandise was imported, it may be complied with; but there is no possibility of ascertaining the countries to which the merchandise belongs, other than the place from whence imported.

Respectfully I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

JOSEPH NOURSE, Register.

The Hon. ALBERT GALLATIN.

The Message and report were read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

TUESDAY, January 29.

The bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of Government for the year one thousand eight hundred and eleven," was read the second time; and, referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon; and Messrs. FRANKLIN, CRAWFORD, and SMITH of Maryland, were appointed the committee.

The bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Navy of the United States for the year one thousand eight hundred and eleven," was read the second time and referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon; and Messrs. WORTHINGTON, BAYARD, and CHAMPLIN, were appointed the committee.

The bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Military Establishment of the United States for the year one thousand eight hundred and eleven," was read the second time; and referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon; and Messrs. SMITH, of Maryland, GREGG, and PICKERING, were appointed the committee.

The bill for the relief of Thomas Campbell was read the second time. On the question, Shall this bill be engrossed and read a third time? it was determined in the affirmative.

The bill, entitled "An act incorporating the Protestant Episcopal Church in the town of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia," was read the second time.

SENATE.

Orleans Territory—Mississippi Territory.

JANUARY, 1811.

The bill, entitled "An act to change the name of Lewis Grant to that of Lewis Grant Davidson," was read the second time.

Mr. BAYARD submitted the following motion:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before the Senate copies of any correspondence or communication (which in his opinion may be made public without prejudice to the public welfare) which have taken place between the Executive Government of the United States and the French or Spanish Governments, relative to the territory comprehended within the limits of Louisiana, as ceded by France to the United States by the treaty of April, 1803.

Mr. WORTHINGTON, from the committee appointed the 14th instant, on the subject, reported a bill making further provisions for the disposal of the sections of land heretofore reserved for the future disposition of Congress, and for other purposes;" which was read and passed to a second reading.

TERRITORY OF ORLEANS.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill, entitled "An act to enable the people of the Territory of Orleans to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, and for other purposes," together with the amendments reported by the select committee; and on motion, by Mr. BAYARD, to strike out the proviso, in the first amendment reported, as follows, to wit:

"Provided, nevertheless, that the Government of the United States hereby retains the power of altering, in any manner it may hereafter deem proper, the limits of all that portion of the said described Territory which lies east of the river Mississippi and the Island of New Orleans;"

And a motion was made by Mr. TARR to amend the proviso by inserting, after the word "that," the following words:

"The Government of the United States hereby retains to itself the power of attaching to the said State any part of the territory lying east of the Mississippi river, south of the Mississippi Territory, and west of the river Mobile:"

And it was determined in the negative—yeas 9, nays 22, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Clay, Crawford, Cutts, Gregg, Smith of New York, Tait, Taylor, and Turner.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Bradley, Campbell, Champlin, Condit, Dana, Franklin, Gaillard, Gorman, Gilman, Goodrich, Horsey, Lambert, Lloyd, Mathewson, Pickering, Pope, Reed, Robinson, Smith of Maryland, Whiteside, and Worthington.

And the proviso was struck out.

On motion, to agree to the report of the select committee on section 3d, line 1st, by inserting the word "white" before the words "male citizens of the United States:" it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 24, nays 8, follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Bayard, Bradley, Champlin, Clay, Condit, Dana, Franklin, Gaillard, Gilman, Goodrich, Gregg, Horsey, Lambert, Leib, Lloyd, Pickering, Reed, Smith of Maryland, Smith of New York, Tait, Taylor, and Worthington.

NAYS—Messrs. Campbell, Crawford, Cutts, Gorman, Mathewson, and Whiteside.

The PRESIDENT reported the bill to the House amended.

The following amendment was proposed by Mr. DANA:

Provided, That this act shall not be understood to admit such State into the Union as aforesaid, unless each of the original States shall consent to the same, or there shall be a Constitutional amendment empowering the Congress to admit into the Union new States formed beyond the boundaries of the United States, as known and understood at the time of establishing the Constitution for the United State."

And on his motion, it was agreed to take the question thereon by yeas and nays; and, on motion, by Mr. BAYARD, the further consideration of the bill was postponed until to-morrow.

MISSISSIPPI TERRITORY.

Mr. ANDERSON presented the memorial of the Legislative Council and House of Representatives of the Mississippi Territory, praying that the said Territory may be admitted as a State into the Union, upon the footing of the original States, and the memorial was read, and referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon by bill or otherwise; and Messrs. ANDERSON, BAYARD, and DANA, were appointed the committee.

The memorial is as follows:

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled: The memorial, unanimously adopted, of the Legislative Council and House of Representatives of Mississippi Territory, in General Assembly convened, respectfully states, That by the articles of agreement and cession between the United States and the State of Georgia, an act for the amicable settlement of limits with the State of Georgia, &c. and an act supplemental thereto, the Government of the Mississippi Territory was organized and established, and "all and singular the rights, privileges, and advantages, granted to the people of the United States, northwest of the river Ohio, by an ordinance of the 13th day of July, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-seven, were extended to the people of the Mississippi Territory: And by the said articles of agreement and cession, it is provided "That the Territory thus ceded shall form a State, and be admitted as such into the Union as soon as it shall contain sixty thousand free inhabitants, or at an earlier period, if Congress shall think it expedient."

Your memorialists state, that although they do not pretend to have the number required by the said articles of agreement and cession, and the ordinance, to entitle our Territory as a matter of right into the Union, upon the footing of one of the original States; yet, we hope that our numbers (as will appear by the census now taken under a law of the United States) are sufficiently respectable to induce your honorable body to admit the Mississippi Territory into the Union, as a matter of expediency.

Your memorialists conceive it unnecessary to detail the many reasons which might be adduced in support of their petition, but think it sufficient to say, that, as the people of this Territory are able to bear the expenses of a State government with convenience to themselves, and, at the same time will relieve the Government of the United States from the cares and expenses incident to the Territorial form of government; and that whatever views the form of government (under which they have, perhaps, not very patiently lived) for about twelve years, was formed, it is found, from experience, to be unfriendly to republicanism; and is such a one, as every American in heart is solicitous to be relieved from. We therefore, pray your honorable body to pass a law authorizing a convention to be called, for the purpose of forming a constitution and State government in the Mississippi Territory, to be admitted into the Union upon the footing of the original States.

Your memorialists, from a knowledge of your indulgence to the people of the Territories northwest of the river Ohio, when in a situation similar to their own, are sanguine in their expectations, that your honorable body will grant to them the prayer of their petition.

And they will ever pray, &c.

WEDNESDAY, January 30.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the committee appointed yesterday on the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Military Establishment of the United States for the year one thousand eight hundred and eleven," reported it without amendment.

Mr. CUTTS, from the committee, reported the bill for the relief of Thomas Campbell, correctly engrossed; and the bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LEIB presented a memorial, subscribed by a great number of the master mechanics and manufacturers of the city and county of Philadelphia, praying a renewal of the charter of the Bank of the United States, for reasons therein mentioned; and the memorial was read, and referred to the committee appointed the 18th of December, on the petition of the President and Directors of the Bank of the United States, on the same subject.

The Senate took into consideration the motion submitted yesterday, by Mr. BAYARD, and, on motion, by Mr. WORTHINGTON, to amend the resolution, by adding thereto the following words, "not heretofore laid before Congress;" it was determined in the negative. And on the question to agree to the resolution, it was determined in the negative—yeas 12, nays 17, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Bradley, Campbell, Champlin, Dana, Gilman, Goodrich, Horsey, Lloyd, Pickering, Reed, and Worthington.

NAYS—Messrs. Clay, Condit, Cutts, Franklin, Gaillard, German, Gregg, Lambert, Leib, Mathewson, Robinson, Smith of Maryland, Smith of New York, Tait, Taylor, Turner, and Whiteside.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill entitled "An act to change the name of Lewis Grant to that of Lewis Grant Davidson;" and Ordered, That it pass to a third reading.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill making compensation to John Eugene Leitzendorfer, for services rendered the United States in the war with Tripoli; and, on the question, Shall the bill be engrossed, and read the third time? it was determined in the affirmative.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill, entitled "An act providing for the final adjustment of claims to lands, and for the sale of the public lands in the Territories of Orleans and Louisiana," together with the amendments reported thereunto by the select committee; and, having agreed thereto, on motion, by Mr. CLAY, it was agreed that the further consideration thereof be postponed until to-morrow.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate and House of

Representatives of the United States:

I transmit to Congress copies of a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanied by copies of the "laws, treaties, and other documents, relative to the public lands," as collected and arranged pursuant to the act passed April 27, 1810.

JAMES MADISON.

JANUARY 30, 1811.

The Message and letter therein referred to were read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

TERRITORY OF ORLEANS.

The Senate took into consideration the amendment proposed yesterday, by Mr. DANA, to the bill, entitled "An act to enable the people of the Territory of Orleans to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union, on an equal footing with the original States, and for other purposes;" and, on motion, by Mr. CLAY, it was agreed to divide the question; and, on the question to agree to the first division of the amendment, to wit:

Provided, That this act shall not be understood to admit such State into the Union, as aforesaid, unless each of the States shall consent to the same.

It was determined in the negative,—yeas 10, nays 18, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bradley, Champlin, Dana, German, Gilman, Goodrich, Horsey, Lloyd, Pickering, and Reed.

NAYS—Messrs. Campbell, Clay, Condit, Franklin, Gaillard, Gregg, Lambert, Leib, Mathewson, Pope, Robinson, Smith of Maryland, Smith of New York, Tait, Taylor, Turner, Whiteside, and Worthington.

On the question to agree to the second division of the amendment, to wit:

On motion, by Mr. BRENT, it was agreed that the further consideration thereof be postponed, and be made the order of the day for Monday next.

Mr. CUTTS, from the committee, also reported the bill making compensation to John Eugene Leitzendorfer, for services rendered the United States in the war with Tripoli, correctly engrossed, and the bill was read the third time, and passed.

The bill, entitled "An act to change the name of Lewis Grant, to that of Lewis Grant Davidson," was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WORTHINGTON, from the committee to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Navy of the United States for the year 1811," reported it without amendment.

Mr. ANDERSON, from the committee appointed the 22d instant to consider the subject, reported a bill to enable the Georgetown Potomac Bridge Company to levy money for the object of its incorporation; which was read, and passed to the second reading.

On motion, by Mr. WORTHINGTON, Resolved, That the Message of the President of the United States of the 30th instant, transmitting to Congress copies of the "laws, treaties, and other documents, relative to the public lands," be referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon by bill or otherwise.

Ordered, That Messrs. WORTHINGTON, GREGG, and FRANKLIN, be the committee.

Mr. FRANKLIN, from the committee to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of Government for the year one thousand eight hundred and eleven," reported it without amendment.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act concerning the Bank of Alexandria," in which bill they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill last brought up for concurrence was read, and passed to the second reading.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill making further provision for the Corps of Engineers, together with the amendments reported thereto by the select committee; and, after progress, on motion, by Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, it was agreed that the further consideration thereof be postponed, and be made the order of the day for to-morrow.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate and House of

Representatives of the United States:

I lay before Congress a letter from the Chargé d'Affaires of the United States at Paris to the Secretary of State, and another from the same to the French Minister of Foreign Relations; also, two letters from the agent of the American Consul at Bordeaux to the Secretary of State.

JAMES MADISON.

JANUARY 31, 1811.

The Message and communications were read, and ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate.

The Senate resumed the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Military Establishment of the United States for the year one thousand eight hundred and eleven."

Ordered, That it pass to the third reading.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. LEIB presented a memorial signed by a great number of the citizens of Philadelphia, praying a renewal of the charter of the Bank of the United States, for reasons therein stated, and that they may be heard by counsel on the subject; and the memorial was read, and referred to the committee appointed the 18th of December, on the petition of the President and Directors of the Bank of the United States on the same subject.

The memorial is as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress of the United States, the memorial of the subscribers, citizens of Philadelphia, respectfully sheweth:

That it is with increasing solicitude, and the deepest concern, that your memorialists reiterate their petition to Congress for a renewal of the charter of the Bank of the United States. With the extreme of anxiety have they awaited the decision of this most important question, and with real distress do they witness the ascendancy of sentiments opposed to the continuance of the bank. Before a final determination shall, however, exclude all hope, they deem it their indispensable duty to lay before you a view of the distress which has already commenced, and of the wide spreading ruin which has been but faintly anticipated, but the certainty of which is now plain to every eye, and to accompany this view with their renewed and urgent entreaties, that this overwhelming mischief may yet be staid.

Your memorialists experience within themselves, and learn with calamitous certainty from abroad, that, from the uncertainty and suspense of the public mind, and an apprehension of the evils which must flow from a dissolution of the bank, confidence is visibly and substantially impaired, and credit almost suspended. From a neighboring and sister city, the most distressing intelligence assures them, that, as against the evils of this absence of confidence and suspension of credit, even extraordinary resources afford no security.

It has become too plain to admit of doubt, with the most incredulous, that confidence and credit are intimately and essentially connected with the continuance of the Bank of the United States, and that, if they are prostrated by the dissolution of that institution, the country must experience, to its lasting reproach, and, perhaps, its incurable injury, a general disregard of pecuniary engagements. Your memorialists, therefore, consider it as a fact no longer doubtful, or disputable, that, if the bank be dissolved at the expiration of its present charter, and, in truth, unless the public confidence be speedily restored, universal distress and incalculable loss must and will prevail.

Your memorialists do not conceive that they are pleading, particularly, the cause of the Bank of the United States, nor that of a few, or even many individuals, by commercial relation connected with the bank. They do not conceive that it is, merely, the cause of a few commercial towns and cities, or of a scanty portion of our population, but, that it is a cause and a question with which are connected, and in which are involved, interests of the highest import, extending through the whole community. The direct effect of an event impairing confidence and credit, unquestionably is, upon the merchant and trader; they, and their immediate connexions, are the first to suffer; but the evil must pervade the country. They, therefore, feel themselves justified, on such an occasion, and at such a crisis, in the most earnest and urgent terms again to address you.

From the pressing and peculiar exigencies of the time, brought about by the fear of a dissolution of the bank, and from a perfect persuasion of the near approach of all the evils which have been anticipated, your memorialists have deemed themselves bound to make this appeal to your wisdom, and to present it by a deputation of their fellow-citizens. This deputation, intimately acquainted with the situation, sentiments, and feelings of your memorialists, they respectfully request may be heard by counsel, on this momentous subject. Finally, it is the earnest and pressing prayer of your memorialists, that effectual means may be immediately adopted to restore public confidence, by a renewal of the charter of the Bank of the United States, for a term which shall assure its duration; or, if that be not granted, that the public suffering may be alleviated by a continuance of the institution for a period which will permit it gradually to close its concerns.

JOSEPH NORTH,

act to regulate and fix the compensation of clerks, and for other purposes;" which was read; and ordered to lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT also communicated the report of the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, stating that the measures which have been authorized by the Board subsequent to their report of the 3d of February, 1810, so far as the same have been completed, are fully detailed in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury to this Board, dated the first day of the present month, and in the statements therein referred to, which are herewith transmitted, and prayed to be received as part of this report; and the report was read, and ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate.

On motion, by Mr. WORTHINGTON, Resolved, That a committee be appointed to examine and report what alterations or amendments are necessary to the act, entitled "An act to regulate the laying out and making a road from Cumberland, in the State of Maryland, to the State of Ohio," with leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Ordered, That Messrs. WORTHINGTON, CUTTS, and FRANKLIN, be the committee.

On motion, by Mr. BRADLEY, Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire whether any and what alterations are necessary in relation to the act, entitled "An act fixing the compensation of public Ministers and of Consuls residing on the coast of Barbary, and for other purposes."

Ordered, That Messrs. BRADLEY, BRENT, and BAYARD, be the committee.

The Senate resumed the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Navy of the United States for the year one thousand eight hundred and eleven;" and Ordered, That it pass to a third reading.

Mr. GREGG presented the memorial of the clergy, resident in the city of Philadelphia, praying the ninth section of the act, entitled "An act regulating the Post Office Establishment," passed the 25th of April, 1810, may be so amended as to prohibit the delivery of letters on the first day of the week, commonly called the Lord's day, for reasons therein stated; and the memorial was read, and referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon by bill or otherwise; and Messrs. GREGG, BAYARD, and BRADLEY, were appointed the committee.

Mr. CAMPBELL presented the petition of Moses Byxbe, praying the privilege of entering a part of the tract of the two miles square situated at the Lower Rapids of Sandusky river, at the common and ordinary price of public lands, with the usual conditions of such entries, (and that it be exempted from sale at public auction,) for the purpose of erecting a mill thereon for the convenience of the settlement, as is stated at large in the petition.

Mr. CAMPBELL also presented the memorial of the Western Missionary Society on the same subject, and the petition and memorial were severally read, and referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon by bill or otherwise; and Messrs. CAMPBELL, ROBINSON, and FRANKLIN, were appointed the committee.

The bill, entitled "An act incorporating the Protestant Episcopal Church in the town of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia," was read the second time. On the question, Shall this bill be read a third time? it was determined in the negative.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate of the United States:

I transmit to the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, complying with their resolution of December 20, 1810. JAMES MADISON.

FEBRUARY 4, 1811.

The Message and report were read, and ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT also communicated a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, in pursuance of the resolution of the Senate of the 20th of December, 1810, respecting the survey of the coast of the Territory of Orleans, together with sundry documents relative thereto; and the report was read.

Ordered, That the report and documents be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. WORTHINGTON, from the committee to whom was referred the Message of the President of the United States of the 30th of January on the subject, reported a bill making a further distribution of such laws of the United States as respect the public lands.

Mr. BAYARD, from the committee appointed on the subject, reported the bill, entitled "An act concerning the Bank of Alexandria," without amendment.

Mr. SMITH, of New York, presented the memorial of the Columbia Insurance Company of the city of New York, praying a renewal of the charter of the Bank of the United States, for reasons therein stated. And the memorial was read, and referred to the committee on the petition of the President and Directors of the Bank of the United States, on the same subject.

The Senate resumed the bill making further provision for the disposal of the sections of land heretofore reserved for the future disposition of Congress; and

Mr. WORTHINGTON proposed an amendment thereto; which was read, and the consideration of the bill postponed until to-morrow.

On motion by Mr. FRANKLIN, one of the majority, it was agreed to reconsider the vote passed on the bill, entitled "An act incorporating the Protestant Episcopal Church of the town of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia;" and, on his motion, the bill was referred to a select committee; and Messrs. FRANKLIN, TAYLOR, and PICKERING, were appointed the committee further to consider and report thereon.

CORPS OF ENGINEERS, &amp;c.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill making further provision for the Corps of Engineers, together with the amendments reported thereto by the select committee.

Bank of the United States.

SENATE.

On motion, by Mr. GREGG, to amend the amendment reported by the select committee, which report goes to strike out the sixth section, and to retain the said sixth section amended, as follows:

"That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to remove the Military Academy from West Point, and to establish the same at Carlisle, in the State of Pennsylvania."

It was determined in the negative—yeas 16, nays 17, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Bayard, Brent, Campbell, Champlin, Clay, Franklin, Gaillard, Gregg, Lloyd, Pope, Tait, Taylor, Turner, Whiteside, and Worthington.

NAYS—Messrs. Bradley, Condit, Crawford, Cutts, Dana, German, Gilman, Goodrich, Horsey, Lambert, Leib, Mathewson, Pickering, Reed, Robinson, Smith of Maryland, and Smith of New York.

And on the question to agree to the report of the select committee which goes to strike out the sixth section of the original bill, and to substitute the amendment reported, amended as follows:

"SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the 27th section of the act, entitled 'An act fixing the Military Peace Establishment,' passed the 16th day of March, one thousand eight hundred and two, and that so much of the 26th section of the said act, as confines the selection of the commander of the Corps of Engineers to the said corps, be, and the same are hereby repealed:"

It was determined in the affirmative—yeas 19, nays 14, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Bayard, Bradley, Brent, Campbell, Champlin, Clay, Crawford, Franklin, Gaillard, Gregg, Horsey, Lloyd, Pope, Tait, Taylor, Turner, Whiteside, and Worthington.

NAYS—Messrs. Condit, Cutts, Dana, German, Gilman, Goodrich, Lambert, Leib, Mathewson, Pickering, Reed, Robinson, Smith of Maryland, and Smith of New York.

On motion, by Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, to strike out of the amendment last agreed to, from the word "enacted," in the first line, to the word "and," in the second instance, inclusive; it was determined in the negative—yeas 15, nays 18, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Condit, Cutts, Dana, German, Gilman, Goodrich, Lambert, Leib, Lloyd, Mathewson, Pickering, Reed, Robinson, Smith of Maryland, and Smith of New York.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Bayard, Brent, Campbell, Champlin, Clay, Crawford, Franklin, Gaillard, Gregg, Horsey, Pope, Tait, Taylor, Turner, Whiteside, and Worthington.

And the PRESIDENT reported the bill to the House as amended.

On motion, by Mr. BRADLEY, further to amend the original bill, section 5, line 4, by inserting, after the word "buildings," "at such place as shall be designated by the President of the United States, and"—it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 17, nays 15, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Bayard, Bradley, Brent, Champlin, Clay, Crawford, Cutts, Franklin, Gaillard, Horsey, Pope, Smith of New York, Tait, Taylor, Turner, and Worthington.

NAYS—Messrs. Campbell, Condit, Dana, German, Gilman, Goodrich, Gregg, Lambert, Leib, Lloyd, Mathewson, Pickering, Reed, Robinson, and Smith of Maryland.

On the question, Shall this bill be engrossed and read a third time as amended? it was determined in the affirmative.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. LEIB presented the petition of a number of the citizens of Pittsburg, praying that the charter of the Bank of the United States may not be renewed, for reasons therein stated; and the petition was read, and referred to the committee appointed the 18th of December on the petition of the President and Directors of the Bank of the United States on the same subject.

The memorial is as follows:

The memorial of the inhabitants of Pittsburg, Pennsylvania, against the renewal of the Charter of the United States' Bank, to the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress of the United States, respectfully sheweth.

That your memorialists are "the People of the United States," from whom emanates all the power which you possess; that we have appointed you to guard, not to alienate our rights; that our Constitution never authorized Congress to establish a bank, under the control of individuals, for their own benefit, or to alienate the power of the purse more than the power of the sword. The act of February, 1791, chartering the bank, might, with equal justice and safety, have given to a corporation the power of the Army, with its appointments.

We feel deeply humbled, that, under the full blaze of Revolutionary light, one-half of the delegated power of the nation was given to a company, independent of our suffrages; but we rejoice that its charter will be terminated with your present session, and that it cannot be revived, provided the Congress shall be, as it professes, attached to the eternal principles of our Revolution, and to the clear dictates of our Constitution.

After the Bank of the United States had enjoyed twenty years of prosperity, had divided, in that term, four millions over six per cent., and had held in bondage thousands of our citizens, who dared not to act according to their consciences, from fear of offending the British stockholders and Federal directors, we had hoped that they would have quietly closed their concerns, and waited for another turn of fortune, till other classes of citizens of, at least, equal merit, had each shared their four millions; but we have seen, with indignation, a studied delay in the collections of that bank, indicating a determination to gain a renewal under stress of weather; a studied pressure on individuals and on State banks, in order to gain auxiliaries; and a studied memorial, containing, in smooth language, the most daring insults on the dignity and independence of a free people.

The memorial makes no direct claim of right to renewal, but it recounts many works of righteousness, which we beg leave to examine. It opens a modest proposal for the surrender of our independence, by declaring that the bank had continued business for public good, and under an impression that the general interest would require a renewal of the charter! It next compliments your honors on a degree of superior information, which the stockholders are not in the habit of attributing. It then craves for the bank much of the credit really due to the actual labor and skill of your memorialists. While we have been traversing the ocean, or improving the earth, or advancing the arts, they have been dividing more than eight per cent. for all facilities, and, after this dividend, will have, on winding up, a balance in their favor, over the amount of capital, of $4,711,236.

Though the United States' Bank has derived its breath and daily support from the bounty and long-suffering of the Congress, yet the memorial opens an unexpected score of debits, against the Government and People, which nothing short of renewal can discharge; and if the debits be correct, the new score for twenty years will be far beyond our ability. The bank has accommodated individuals, State banks, the commercial, manufacturing, and agricultural interests, and the National Treasury. It has removed specie to places where it was wanted, and has divided only eight and one fourth per cent. for all these sacrifices to public good! It has furnished places of deposit for millions of the public money, and has suffered the inconvenience of lending, on this deposit, for their own benefit. It has patriotically lent to Government its paper, which drew no interest, and received in exchange Government paper, drawing an interest. It has even suffered the Government to receive its paper for all bonds and dues. "It has, for the accommodation of the Government, established branches at places disadvantageous to its business, and from which no profit was expected to be derived."

Permit your memorialists to pause, and, by a view of the capital and loans of the branches of the United States' Bank, to estimate the value of this last claim on the Government.

	Capital.	Loans.
Boston - - - -	$700,000	$998,859
New York - - - -	1,800,000	4,175,847

Washington - - - -	200,000	485,285
Norfolk - - - -	600,000	880,170
Charleston - - - -	600,000	1,409,916
Savannah - - - -	500,000	1,054,113
New Orleans - - - -	300,000	611,516
	<hr/> 5,300,000	<hr/> 10,965,256

Nearly eleven millions lent on a capital of five millions three hundred thousand! A serious disappointment to men who expected no profit. Republics are said to be ungrateful. We are certainly so on the present occasion.

The memorial next proceeds to associate the bank with the Government, claiming to be a necessary and indivisible part of it, showing the insufficiency of State banks to answer the dignified purposes of their institution; and, after repeating, for the tenth time, the awful calamities awaiting their dissolution, they commend the hard case of moneyed aristocracies and of rich widows and orphans, interested in their stock, to the wisdom and justice of the Legislature. They again hold up the awful terrors of "a general derangement of credit," and pray for a renewal of their charter.

Now, may it please the Congress, this bank memorial is for a grant, worth, to the stockholders, six millions, and to federalism and British influence sixty millions; and if the memorial contained the truth, there could have been no occasion of presenting it; but you, in your wisdom and superior intelligence, would have humbly petitioned David Lenox, president, and the directors and stockholders of the United States' Bank, to please to accept a renewal of their charter for eternity, or such shorter term as their honors should appoint.

But that memorial does not contain the whole truth. All its claims for services are more than balanced by enormous profits. Its threats of ruin to our establishments, in case of winding up, are balanced by the consideration, that, in their collections of fifteen millions, the stockholders will consult their own interest; they will not collect beyond the ability of their debtors; they will prefer the paper of State banks to private notes; and they will not press the State banks, so as to prevent their aiding the debtors of the United States' Bank. Whenever this bank shall withdraw from circulating medium its five millions in bills, it must pay for those five millions in specie, or the bills of State banks, in either of which cases the circulating medium will be restored. Whenever the deposits of more than four millions shall be withdrawn from its vaults, they will be either thrown into circulation, or placed in other banks. As to their being drawn from the country, let it be recollected that foreigners do not place their funds here, to remain inactive, merely because the United States' Bank is a safe place of deposit. But a portion of the deposit is by debtors of the bank, who will easily adopt a mode of transferring them in the ledger. As to the withdrawing of seven millions by foreigners, we cannot flatter ourselves with the prospect; but, if that should be the case, the Government can supply its place with paper, which will answer all the purposes of specie for all business, within our own country. We regard the repeated alarms in the memorial as not only groundless, but as a kind of threatening, ill suited to your dignity and our independence.

The bank memorial is a public declaration that the Government and People of the United States are held in duress by the memorialists, and that the continuance of our independence rests on their willingness to continue their bank operations. It contains an insulting history of favors to us, greater than their royal master ever urged upon the colonies. It declares that, in the management of the power of the purse, for twenty years, it has done everything for us, and has rendered itself necessary to our future existence. Its silent language is, "though we fail to conquer you by the sword, we hold you suspended by the purse strings. We demand your gratitude for such use of our funds as we have condescended to permit you to pay for; and now, if the power is to be withdrawn from us, all your establishments of commerce, finance, agriculture, and the arts, shall fall with us."

This language is not from a band of patriots, who undertook to aid the nation, in the first struggles of self-government, but of men, who, by subtlety and intercession, obtained a charter, and who have become masters of the head-waters of corruption, through the ill-placed bounty of the first Congress. Their delay to close their affairs, according to law, was not for public good, but in preparation for a sudden onset upon a short session of your honorable body. Hence their well-timed subscriptions to some Republican presses. Hence the silence of Federal presses, lest discussion should awake, in your constituents, the spirit of 1776. Hence the artificial depression of stock, not in market, and the petitions from interested companies and individuals crowding upon you. Hence the thronging of your avenues, and the artful sounding of every Senator and member. Hence the intimations, that a million and quarter should be placed in your Treasury, as a consideration for the ruin of your constituents; and hence the shameless assertion, that our President, who gained his elevation by his able opposition to the charter of the bank, and other ruinous measures, is now in favor of renewal.

The bank memorial, with its accompaniments, is an alarming commentary on the original charter. The actual depreciation of our silver and gold, by the United States' Bank, is not to be compared with the attempt to depreciate the sterling virtue and republican integrity of our people.

TUESDAY, February 5.

The bill making a further distribution of such laws of the United States as respect the public lands was read the second time.

Mr. CUTTS, from the committee, reported the bill making further provision for the Corps of Engineers correctly engrossed; and the bill was taken up; and,

On motion, by Mr. ANDERSON, recommitted to a select committee, to consist of five members, further to consider and report thereon; and Messrs. ANDERSON, CRAWFORD, GERMAN, SMITH, of Maryland, and BRENT, were appointed the committee.

Mr. ANDERSON, from the committee appointed the 24th January to consider the subject, reported a bill authorizing the sale and grant of a certain quantity of public land to the Havre de Grace Bridge Company; and the bill was read, and passed to a second reading.

The Senate resumed the bill, entitled "An act to enable the people of the Territory of Orleans to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, and for other purposes;" and, on motion, by Mr. BAYARD, it was agreed that the consideration thereof be further postponed and made the order of the day for to-morrow.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill, entitled "An act providing for the final adjustment of claims to lands, and for the sale of the public lands in the Territories of Orleans and Louisiana; and, having agreed to the amendments reported by the select committee, the President reported the bill to the House accordingly. On the question, Shall this bill be read the third time as amended? it was determined in the affirmative.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to enable the Georgetown Potomac Bridge Company to levy money for the object of its incorporation. On the question, Shall this bill be engrossed and read a third time? the votes being equal, the PRESIDENT determined the question in the affirmative.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill making further provisions for the disposal of the sections of land heretofore reserved for the future disposition of Congress, and for other purposes."

On motion, by Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, it was agreed that the consideration thereof be further postponed, and be made the order of the day for to-morrow.

The Senate resumed the bill, entitled "An act concerning the Bank of Alexandria."

Ordered, That it pass to a third reading.

The bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Navy of the United States for the year one thousand eight hundred and eleven, was read the third time, and passed.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. CRAWFORD reported a bill to amend and continue in force an act, entitled "An act to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States," passed on the 25th day of February, 1791; which passed to a second reading.

[The first section continues the act of 1791, until the 4th of March, 1831, subject to the following conditions:

Sec. 2. The bank to pay into the Treasury, on or before the 4th October, ——— dollars.

Sec. 4. Bank to pay the United States three per cent. on all sums above one million, which shall be deposited by the United States for more than one year.

Sec. 5. Capital may be increased by the United States 12,500 shares, not exceeding 2,500 in each year.

Sec. 6. United States to have the right to appoint directors in proportion to the amount of stock they may hold.

Sec. 7. Present President and Directors may serve until the 1st Monday in January, 1812.

Sec. 8. Citizens, bona fide stockholders, alone to vote for directors to attend meetings.

Sec. 9. Bank permitted to hold property under certain limitations.

Sec. 10. Not to issue notes to greater amount than the amount of capital stock paid in.

Sec. 11. The officer at the head of the Treasury Department shall have the right to inspect books, &c.

Sec. 12. Act to punish frauds on the bank continued in force.

Sec. 13. This act to be void if terms not accepted within three months.

Sec. 14. So much of act of 1791 repealed as pledges Congress to grant a charter to no other bank during the continuance of this corporation.]

Mr. CRAWFORD also communicated a letter from the Chairman of the Committee to the Secretary of the Treasury, together with the answer of the Secretary thereto on the subject of the Bank of the United States, as follows:

SENATE CHAMBER, Jan. 29, 1811.

SIR: The committee of the Senate to whom has been referred the memorial of the President and Directors of the Bank of the United States, praying for a renewal of their charter, have directed me to request you to state to the committee, whether, in your opinion, the renewal of the said charter will not greatly facilitate the collection of the revenue, and promote the public welfare. In complying with this request, it is expected that you will furnish the committee with the facts and reasoning upon which your opinion has been formed, together with such other information upon this subject as may be in your possession.

I am, sir, respectfully, your most obedient and very humble servant,

WM. H. CRAWFORD.

To the Hon. ALBERT GALLATIN.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,

January 30, 1811.

SIR: Having already, in a report to the Senate of 2d March, 1809, expressed my opinion in favor of a renewal of the charter of the Bank of the United States, an opinion which remains unchanged, I can only add a few explanatory remarks in answer to the inquiries of the committee as stated in your letter of yesterday.

The banking system is now firmly established, and, in its ramifications, extends to every part of the United States. Under that system, the assistance of banks appears to me necessary for the punctual collection of the revenue, and for the safe-keeping and transmission of public moneys. That the punctuality of payments is principally due to banks, is a fact generally acknowledged. It is, to a certain degree, enforced by the refusal of credit at the custom-house, so long as a former revenue bond actually due remains unpaid. But I think, nevertheless, that, in order to insure that precision in the collection, on which depends a corresponding discharge of the public engagements, it would, if no use was made of banks, be found necessary to abolish altogether the credit now given on the payment of duties; a measure which would affect the commercial capital, and fall heavily on the consumers. That the public moneys are safer by being weekly deposited in banks, instead of accumulating in the hands of collectors, is self-evident. And their transmission, whenever this may be wanted for the purpose of making payments in other places than those of collection, cannot, with any convenience, be effected on a large scale in an extensive country, except through the medium of banks, or of persons acting as bankers.

The question, therefore, is, whether a bank incorporated by the United States, or a number of banks incorporated by the several States, be most convenient for those purposes.

State banks may be used, and must, in case of a non-renewal of the charter, be used by the Treasury. Preparatory arrangements have already been made to that effect; and it is believed that the ordinary business will be transacted through their medium, with less convenience, and, in some respects, with perhaps less safety than at present, but without any insuperable difficulty. The difference with respect to safety results from the organization of the Bank of the United States, by which it is responsible for the money deposited in any of its branches, while each of the State banks which may be employed will be responsible only for the sums in its own hands. Thus the Bank of the United States is now answerable for the moneys collected at New Orleans, and deposited there in its branch, a security which will be lost under a different arrangement. Nor will the United States have any other control over the manner in which the business of the banks may be conducted, than what may result from the power of withdrawing the public deposits; and they will lose that which a charter or a dependence on the General Government for a charter now gives over the Bank of the United States. The facility of obtaining such accommodations as may at times be wanted, will, for the same reason, be lessened, and the national power will to that extent be impaired. It may be added that, even for the ordinary business of receiving and transmitting public moneys, the use of a State bank may be forbidden by the State, and that loans to the United States, are, by many of the charters, forbidden, without a special permission from the State.

As it is not perceived, on the other hand, that a single advantage will accrue to the public from the change, no reason presents itself, on the grounds of expediency, why an untried system should be substituted to one under which the Treasury business has so long been conducted with perfect security to the United States, and great convenience not only to the officers but also to all those who have had payments of a public nature to make or to receive.

It does not seem necessary to advert to the particular objections made against the present charter, as these may easily be obviated by proper alterations. What has been called a National Bank, or, in other words, a new Bank of the United States, instead of the existing one, may be obtained by such alterations. The capital may be extended and more equally distributed; new stockholders may be substituted to the foreigners, as had been suggested in the report of the 2d March, 1809; and any other modifications, which may be thought expedient, may be introduced, without interrupting the operations of the institution now in force, and without disturbing all the commercial concerns of the country.

If, indeed, the Bank of the United States could be removed without affecting either its numerous debtors, the other moneyed institutions, or the circulation of the country, the ordinary fiscal operations of Government would not be materially deranged, and might be carried on by means of another general bank, or of State banks. But the transition will be attended with much individual, and, probably, with no inconsiderable public injury. It is impossible that an institution which circulates thirteen millions of dollars, and to whom the merchants owe fourteen, should terminate its operations, particularly in the present unfavorable state of the American commerce, and after the great losses lately experienced abroad, without giving a serious shock to commercial, banking, and national credit. It is not intended to overrate the extent of an evil which there are no certain data to appreciate. And, without expatiating on the fatal and unavoidable effects on its dividends, without dwelling on the inconvenience of repaying, at this time, to Europe a capital of seven millions, and without adverting to other possible dangers of a more general nature, it appears sufficient to state that the same body of men who owe fourteen millions of dollars to the bank, owe also ten or twelve to the United States, on which the receipts into the Treasury for this year altogether depend; and that, exclusively of absolute failures, it is improbable that both debts can be punctually paid at the same time. Nor must it be forgotten that the approaching non-importation will considerably lessen the efficiency of the provision by which subsequent credits are refused to importers who have not discharged former revenue bonds. Upon the whole, a perfect conviction is felt, that, in the critical situation of the country, new evils ought not to be superadded, and a perilous experiment be attempted, unless required by an imperative necessity.

In these hasty remarks, I have not adverted to the question of constitutionality, which is not a subject of discussion for the Secretary of the Treasury. Permit me, however, for my own sake, simply to state, that the bank charter, having for a number of years been acted upon or acquiesced in as if Constitutional by all the constituted authorities of the nation, and thinking myself the use of banks to be at present necessary for the exercise of the legitimate powers of the General Government, the continuation of the Bank of the United States has not, in the view which I have been able to take of the subject, appeared to me to be unconstitutional.

I have the honor to be, respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

ALBERT GALLATIN.

Hon. WM. H. CRAWFORD, Chairman.

WEDNESDAY, February 6.

Mr. BRADLEY presented the petition of Charlotte Hazen, relict of the late Brigadier General Moses Hazen, praying a grant of land may be made to her, as a Canadian refugee, or that a small addition, in lieu thereof, may be added to her present pension from Congress, for reasons stated at large in the petition; which was read, and referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon by bill or otherwise; and Messrs. BRADLEY, FRANKLIN, and GERMAN, were appointed the committee.

Mr. B., also, presented the memorial of James Wilkinson, stating that he has made sundry advances of money in the course of his military service, for which, no provision having been made by law, he cannot obtain credit therefor at the proper accounting offices; and that he is improperly charged on the books of the War Department with disbursements made by him in the prosecution of certain orders from the Executive, and praying relief, for reasons therein mentioned; and the memorial was read, and referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon, by bill or otherwise; and Messrs. BRADLEY, CAMPBELL, and GREGG, were appointed the committee.

Mr. ANDERSON, from the committee to whom was referred "the bill making further provision for the Corps of Engineers," reported it with amendments; which were read.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that they have passed the bill, entitled "An act making compensation to John Eugene Leitzendorfer, for services rendered the United States in the war with Tripoli," with an amendment, in which they request the concurrence of the Senate. The House have passed a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Richard Tervin, William Coleman, Edwin Lewis, Samuel Mims, Joseph Wilson, and the Baptist Church at Salem Meeting-house, in the Mississippi Territory; also, a bill, entitled "An act providing for the sale of a tract of land lying in the State of Tennessee, and a tract in the Indiana Territory;" in which bills they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The bills last brought up for concurrence were read, and passed to the second reading.

The amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill, entitled "An act making compensation to John Eugene Leitzendorfer, for services rendered the United States in the war with Tripoli," was read.

Mr. CRAWFORD, from the committee appointed on the subject, reported a bill to authorize the payment of certain certificates, credits, and pensions, and for other purposes. And the bill was read and passed to the second reading.

The bill entitled, "An act concerning the Bank of Alexandria," was read the third time and passed.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of Government for the year one thousand eight hundred and eleven;" and having agreed to the amendment, on motion, by Mr. CAMPBELL, it was agreed that the further consideration of the bill be postponed until to-morrow.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate of the United States:

I transmit to the Senate a report of the Secretary of State, complying with their resolution of the first instant.

JAMES MADISON.

FEBRUARY 5, 1811.

The Message and report were read, and ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate.

The Senate resumed as in Committee of the Whole, the bill making further provisions for the disposal of the sections of land, heretofore reserved for the future disposition of Congress, and for other purposes;" and after progress, it was agreed that the consideration thereof be further postponed until to-morrow.

The bill, entitled "An act providing for the final adjustment of claims to lands, and for the sale of public land in the Territories of Orleans and Louisiana," was read the third time as amended.

Resolved, That this bill pass with amendments.

THURSDAY, February 7.

The bill to amend and continue in force an act, entitled "An act to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States," passed on the twenty-fifth day of February, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-one, was read the second time, and on motion, by Mr. CRAWFORD, it was agreed that the further consideration thereof be made the order of the day for Monday next.

The bill to authorize the payment of certain certificates, credits, and pensions, and for other purposes, was read the second time.

Mr. ANDERSON gave notice that to-morrow he should ask leave to bring in a bill to extend the right of suffrage in the Indiana Territory, and for other purposes.

The bill authorizing the sale and grant of a certain quantity of public land to Havre de Grace Bridge Company, was read the second time.

Mr. CAMPBELL, from the committee to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act providing for the removal of the land office established at Nashville, in the State of Tennessee, and Canton, in the State of Ohio; and to authorize the Register and Receiver of Public Moneys to superintend the public sales of land in the district east of Pearlriver," reported it with amendments; which were read.

The bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Richard Terwin, William Coleman, Edwin Lewis, Samuel Mims, Joseph Wilson, and the Baptist Church at Salem Meeting-house, in the Mississippi Territory," was read the second time, and referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon; and Messrs. GREGG, FRANKLIN, and BRADLEY, were appointed the committee.

The bill, entitled "An act providing for the sale of a tract of land lying in the State of Tennessee, and a tract in the Indiana Territory," was read the second time, and referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon; and Messrs. WORTHINGTON, CAMPBELL, and FRANKLIN, were appointed the committee.

The Senate resumed the third reading of the bill, entitled "An act to enable the people of the Territory of Orleans to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, and for other purposes."

On the question, Shall this bill pass as amended? it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 22, nays 10, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Brent, Campbell, Clay, Condit, Crawford, Cutts, Franklin, Gaillard, Gregg, Lambert, Leib, Mathewson, Pope, Robinson, Smith of Maryland, Smith of New York, Tait, Taylor, Turner, Whiteside, and Worthington.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Champlin, Dana, German, Gilman, Goodrich, Horsey, Lloyd, Pickering, and Reed.

So it was Resolved, That this bill pass with amendments.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of Government for the year one thousand eight hundred and eleven."

On motion, it was agreed that the consideration thereof be postponed until to-morrow.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill, entitled "An act making compensation to John Eugene Leitzendorfer, for services rendered the United States in the war with Tripoli."

On motion, by Mr. BRADLEY,

Resolved, That they disagree thereto.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate of the United States:

I transmit to the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, complying with their resolution of the 21st January last. JAMES MADISON.

FEBRUARY 7, 1811.

The Message and report were read, and ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill making a further distribution of such laws of the United States as respect the public lands. On the question, Shall this bill be engrossed and read a third time? it was determined in the affirmative.

Mr. FRANKLIN, from the committee to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act incorporating the Protestant Episcopal Church, in the town of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia," reported it without amendment.

Ordered, That it pass to a third reading.

On motion, by Mr. FRANKLIN,

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before the Senate such information as he may possess relative to the accounts of George W. Erving, for his services and compensation for attending the Board of Commissioners, established under the seventh article of the British treaty.

FRIDAY, February 8.

Mr. ANDERSON asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill to extend the right of suffrage in the Indiana Territory, and for other purposes; which was read, and passed to the second reading.

Mr. ANDERSON, from the committee appointed on the subject, reported a bill for the relief of David Porter, a Commander in the Navy of the United States; which was read, and passed to the second reading.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill, entitled "An act providing for the removal of the land office established at Nashville, in the State of Tennessee, and Canton, in the State of Ohio: and to authorize the Register and Receiver of Public Moneys to superintend the public sales of land in the district east of Pearl River," together with the amendments reported thereto by the select committee; and having agreed thereto, the President reported the bill to the House accordingly.

On the question, Shall this bill be read a third time as amended? it was determined in the affirmative.

Mr. CUTTS reported, from the committee, the bill making a further distribution of such laws of the United States as respect the public lands, correctly engrossed; and the bill was read the third time, and passed.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill making further provision for the Corps of Engineers, together with the amendments reported thereto by the select committee; and having agreed to the amendments, the President reported the bill to the House accordingly.

On motion, by Mr. LEIB, to strike out, in section five, line two, after the word "buildings," the following words: "at such place as shall be designated by the President of the United States," for the purpose of inserting, in lieu thereof, the words "in Carlisle, in the State of Pennsylvania:" a division of the question was called for: and the question was taken on striking out, and determined in the negative—yeas 14, nays 17, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Condit, German, Gilman, Goodrich, Gregg, Lambert, Leib, Lloyd, Mathewson, Pickering, Reed, Robinson, Smith of Maryland, and Whiteside.

On motion, by Mr. BRADLEY, it was agreed that the consideration thereof be postponed and made the order of the day for Monday next.

The bill, entitled "An act incorporating the Protestant Episcopal Church in the town of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia," was read the third time, and passed.

On motion, by Mr. BRADLEY,

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of establishing an additional collection district on the northern boundaries of the United States, with leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Ordered, That Messrs. BRADLEY, GERMAN, and CRAWFORD, be the committee.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill authorizing the sale and grant of a certain quantity of public land to the Havre de Grace Bridge Company. And on the question, Shall this bill be engrossed and read a third time? it was determined in the affirmative.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill for the relief of the collectors of the ports of Norfolk, Baltimore, and Philadelphia. And on the question, Shall this bill be engrossed and read a third time? it was determined in the affirmative.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill declaring the laws now in force in the Territory of Orleans, to extend to and to have full force and effect to the river Perdido, pursuant to the treaty concluded at Paris on the 30th day of April, 1803, and for other purposes.

On motion, by Mr. GILES, it was recommended to the committee appointed the 8th of December on so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to that subject.

Mr. BRENT submitted the following motion:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to bring in a bill making compensation to certain officers of the customs.

Mr. BRADLEY, from the committee appointed this day to consider the subject, reported the bill to establish the districts of Memphremagog, of Oswagatchie, and of the White Mountains; and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

Mr. CLAY presented the petition of Philip Hammond, on behalf of himself and of the heirs of John Prior, deceased, praying that he and the said heirs may be compensated for certain services rendered by him and the said John Prior to the United States, as mentioned in the petition; which was read, and referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon by bill or otherwise; and Messrs. CLAY, CAMPBELL, and FRANKLIN, were appointed the committee.

MONDAY, February 11.

Mr. GILES introduced a bill in addition to an act, entitled "An act to amend the judicial system of the United States," as follows:

"Be it enacted, &c., That during the term of the Supreme Court of the United States, commencing on the first Monday of February instant, the said court shall be holden by the Justices thereof, or any three of them: Provided, that in case only three Judges be present, the said court shall not have power to hear or determine any case, without the consent of the parties or their counsel, except those brought before the court from the Circuit Court of the District of Columbia."

The bill was twice read and referred to Messrs. BAYARD, GILES, and CLAY.

The bill for the relief of David Porter, a commander in the Navy of the United States, was read the second time.

The bill to extend the right of suffrage in the Indiana Territory, and for other purposes, was read the second time and referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon; and Messrs. WORTHINGTON, ANDERSON, and GREGG, were appointed the committee.

The bill to establish the districts of Memphremagog, of Oswagatchie, and of the White Mountains, was read the second time.

The Senate resumed the third reading of the bill to enable the Georgetown Potomac Bridge Company to levy money for the object of its incorporation.

On motion, by Mr. PICKERING, the bill was recommended to a select committee, further to consider and report thereon; and Messrs. PICKERING, ANDERSON, and TAIT, were appointed the committee.

The Senate resumed the bill to authorize the payment of certain certificates, credits, and pensions, and for other purposes.

On motion, by Mr. CRAWFORD, it was recommended to a select committee, to consist of five members, further to consider and report thereon; and Messrs. CRAWFORD, FRANKLIN, GOODRICH, BRADLEY, and CONDIT, were appointed the committee.

The engrossed bill making further provision for the Corps of Engineers was read the third time as amended, and the blank filled. On the question, Shall this bill pass as amended? it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 19, nays 10, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Bayard, Bradley, Campbell, Champlin, Clay, Crawford, Franklin, Gaillard, Giles, Gregg, Horsey, Pope, Smith of Maryland, Tait, Taylor, Turner, Whiteside, and Worthington.

NAYS—Messrs. Condit, Dana, German, Gilman, Goodrich, Lambert, Leib, Pickering, Reed, and Robinson.

Resolved, That this bill pass, and that the title thereof be "An act making further provision for the Corps of Engineers."

Mr. BAYARD, from the committee to whom was referred the bill in addition to an act, entitled "An act to amend the judicial system of the United States," reported it with an amendment; which was read and agreed to as in Committee of the Whole, and the President reported the bill to the House accordingly.

On the question, Shall this bill be engrossed and read a third time as amended? it was determined, by unanimous consent, in the affirmative.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act to authorize the election of sheriffs, in the Indiana Territory;" also, the bill, entitled "An act in addition to the act, entitled 'An act supplementary to the act concerning Consuls and Vice Consuls, and for the further protection of American seamen;" in which bills they desire the concurrence of the Senate. They have also passed the bill, entitled "An act to incorporate the subscribers to the Farmers' Bank of Alexandria," with amendments, in which they ask the concurrence of the Senate; the bill, entitled "An act to incorporate the Bank of Potosi," with an amendment, in which they ask the concurrence of the Senate; the bill, entitled "An act to incorporate the Bank of Washington," with amendments, in which they ask the concurrence of the Senate; also, the bill, entitled "An act to incorporate the Bank of Georgetown," with amendments, in which they ask the concurrence of the Senate. The House of Representatives concur in all the amendments of the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act to enable the people of the Territory of Orleans to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, and for other purposes," except the second, to which they do not agree.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendment to the last mentioned bill disagreed to by the House of Representatives; and on motion, by Mr. BAYARD, the further consideration thereof was postponed until to-morrow.

The two last bills brought up for concurrence were read, and passed to the second reading.

Mr. CURTIS, from the committee, reported the bill in addition to an act, entitled "An act to amend the judicial system of the United States," correctly engrossed; and the bill was read the third time by unanimous consent.

On the question, Shall this bill pass? it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 23, nays 2, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Bayard, Bradley, Campbell, Champlin, Clay, Condit, Crawford, Dana, Franklin, Gaillard, German, Giles, Gilman, Goodrich, Horsey, Leib, Lloyd, Pickering, Smith of New York, Taylor, Turner, and Whiteside.

NAYS—Messrs. Reed and Worthington.

So it was Resolved, That this bill pass, and that the title thereof be "An act in addition to an act, entitled 'An act to amend the judicial system of the United States.'"

Mr. PICKERING, from the committee to whom was recommitted the bill to enable the Georgetown Bridge Company to levy money for the object of its incorporation, reported it amended.

Mr. CRAWFORD, from the committee to whom was recommitted the bill to authorize the payment of certain certificates, credits, and pensions, and for other purposes, asked leave to report a new bill; which was read and passed to the second reading.

The PRESIDENT communicated a letter from the Governor of the State of Ohio, enclosing a resolution of that Legislature, approving the amendment to the Constitution of the United States respecting titles of nobility; which were read.

Ordered, That they be transmitted to the office of the Secretary for the Department of State.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate of the United States:

I transmit to the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, complying with their resolution of the 7th instant. JAMES MADISON.

FEBRUARY 11, 1811.

The Message and report were read and ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to amend and continue in force an act, entitled "An act to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States," passed on the 25th day of February, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-one.

Mr. ANDERSON said that having been a member of the committee who reported the bill before the Senate, and not feeling himself at liberty to oppose the introduction of the report, yet, thinking it might be advisable to try the principle before they proceeded to discuss the details, he should move to strike out the first section of the bill. He would barely observe that, was this not a question which was generally understood, on which not only every member of this House, but every citizen of the United States had made up his mind, he should feel himself bound to offer reasons in support of the motion; but, inasmuch as it was a question which every gentleman had doubtless decided in his own mind, he felt unwilling to take up any more of the attention of the Senate, especially so late in the session, when there was so much business of importance before them, which required to be acted on.

Mr. CRAWFORD said this was a way of disposing of business which struck him as somewhat astonishing. A bill was proposed to the Senate to continue in operation an institution of twenty years standing, the good effects of which had been universally experienced, whose influence on the public prosperity was admitted by all; and, without assigning any reason why it should not be continued, they were told that the public sentiment had decided the question, and every gentleman must have made up his mind. He appealed to the gentleman who made the motion, whether this was a fair and magnanimous mode of procedure. How was it possible for the friends of this bill to meet objections never made? To foresee the grounds on which gentlemen would have made up their minds? Surely, when a question of this magnitude was to be decided, it ought to be expected that some reasons should be offered why the bill should be rejected. Mr. C. said he hoped if the honorable gentleman from Tennessee chose to veil himself and argument from discussion, on the ground that he had made up his mind, that some gentleman would condescend to give reasons in favor of the motion.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said there was certainly nothing novel in the course taken by the gentleman from Tennessee. The gentleman from Georgia could not be ignorant that some of the State Legislatures had taken the subject up. It, therefore, became the duty, with all respect to his friend from Georgia, of the introducer of the bill to give some reason to induce the Senate to give their votes for a renewal of the charter.

Mr. ANDERSON said that he had deemed it strictly proper and parliamentary to make the motion which he had offered to the House. He deemed it incumbent on those who meant to support this bill to assign the reasons why the section should not be struck out. To his mind, Mr. A. said, this system was infinitely more injurious than beneficial; it created a kind of fictitious wealth in the community; destroyed in a degree the firm principles of our political institutions; and, if we went on with it for twenty years more, we should be at least fifty years older, he would not say in corruption, but in the want of the strict political virtue which, if the bank had never have existed, we might have maintained. This opinion was a sufficient objection, without saying anything of the unconstitutionality of the thing, which to him had always been a paramount objection.

Mr. CRAWFORD said that the gentlemen from Tennessee and Maryland had misconceived what he had said. He had not complained that the motion was made; nothing like it. He knew that such a course was sometimes pursued. But it was the first time he ever knew such a motion to be made without a discussion of the details, without a detailed statement of the reasons for opposing such and such provisions. He must be permitted to state that such a course was not usual in this or any other body, as that a chairman should be called upon to state reasons which induced a committee to report any provision, when a motion was made which went to put an end to any discussion of the detail. Gentlemen assumed the affirmative side of the question; they were about to defeat the bill—ought they not to assign their reasons? What a situation am I placed in, said Mr. C. How is it possible I can foresee all the objections to the bill? And if perchance I should foresee them and defeat them, will not gentlemen say these are not the reasons which influenced their votes? It is like pursuing a will-o'-the-wisp; you can never arrive at the true object of pursuit. I should humbly hope, sir, that some gentleman, who wishes to put an end to this bill, would assign the reasons on which he determined to give his vote.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said he had always thought it was the duty of a committee to inform the Senate of the reasons which induced them to report a bill. I was not on the committee, said he. There were but five on it; and consequently there are twenty-nine of us who cannot tell what induced that gentleman to report the bill which has produced this agitation among us, and which some of the States have declared hostile to the Constitution. I was so certain that the gentleman would give his view of the subject, that I did not come prepared to enter into the question. I did expect to hear something from that gentleman which I or some other gentleman would have thought it our duty to give an answer to.

Mr. CRAWFORD said that he should proceed, though reluctantly, to explain the reasons of the committee for reporting the bill, which is now under consideration. After the most minute examination of the Constitution, the majority of that committee were decidedly of opinion that the Congress of the United States were clearly invested with power to pass such a bill. The object of the Constitution was two-fold: 1st, the delegation of certain general powers, of a national nature, to the Government of the United States; and 2d, the limitation or restriction of the State sovereignties. Upon the most thorough examination of this instrument, I am induced to believe, that many of the various constructions given to it are the result of a belief that it is absolutely perfect. It has become so extremely fashionable to eulogize this Constitution, whether the object of the eulogist is the extension or contraction of the powers of the Government, that whenever its eulogium is pronounced, I feel an involuntary apprehension of mischief. Upon the faith of this imputed perfection, it has been declared to be inconsistent with the entire spirit and character of this instrument, to suppose that after it has given a general power it should afterwards delegate a specific power fairly comprehended within the general power. A rational analysis of the Constitution will refute in the most demonstrative manner this idea of its perfection. This analysis may excite unpleasant sensations; it may assail honest prejudices; for there can be no doubt that honest prejudices frequently exist, and are many times perfectly innocent. But when these prejudices tend to destroy even the object of their affection, it is essentially necessary that they should be eradicated. In the present case, if there be any who, under the conviction that the Constitution is perfect, are disposed to give it a construction that will render it wholly imbecile, the public welfare requires that the veil should be rent, and that its imperfection should be disclosed to public view. By this disclosure it will cease to be the object of adoration, but it will nevertheless be entitled to our warmest attachment.

The 8th section of the 1st article of the Constitution contains among others the following grant of powers, viz: to coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin, and fix the standard of weights and measures; to raise and support armies; to provide and maintain a navy; to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes; to establish post offices and post roads. This selection contains five grants of general power. Under the power to coin money it is conceived that Congress would have a right to provide for the punishment of counterfeiting the money after it was coined, and that this power is fairly incidental to, and comprehended in, the general power. The power to raise armies and provide and maintain a navy comprehends, beyond the possibility of doubt, the right to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces; and yet in these three cases, the Constitution, after making the grant of general power, delegates specifically the powers which are fairly comprehended within the general power. If this, however, should be denied, the construction which has been uniformly given to the remaining powers which have been selected, will establish the fact beyond the power of contradiction. Under the power to regulate commerce, Congress has exercised the power of erecting light-houses, as incidental to that power, and fairly comprehended within it. Under the power to establish post offices, and post roads, Congress has provided for the punishment of offences against the Post Office Department. If the Congress can exercise an incidental power not granted in one case, it can in all cases of a similar kind. But it is said, that the enumeration of certain powers excludes all other powers not enumerated. This is true so far as original substantive grants of power are concerned, but it is not true when applied to express grants of power, which are strictly incidental to some original and substantive grant of power. If it were true in relation to them, Congress could not pass a law to punish offences against the Post Office Establishment, because the Constitution has expressly given the power to punish offences against the current coin, and as it has given the power to punish offences committed against that grant of general power, and has withheld it in relation to the power to establish post offices and post roads. Congress cannot, according to this rule of construction, so warmly contended for, pass any law to provide for the punishment of such offences. The power to make rules for the regulation and government of the land and naval forces, I have shown to be strictly incidental to the power to raise armies, and provide and maintain navies; but, according to this rule of construction, all incidental powers are excluded except the few which are enumerated, which would exclude from all claim to constitutionality, nearly one half of your laws, and, what is still more to be deprecated, would render your Constitution equally imbecile with the old articles of confederation. When we come to examine the 4th article, the absurdity of this rule of construction, and also of the idea of perfection which has been attributed to the Constitution, will be equally manifest. This article appears to be of a miscellaneous character and very similar to the codicil of a will. The first article provides for the organization of Congress; defines its powers; prescribes limitations upon the powers previously granted; and sets metes and bounds to the authority of the State Governments. The second article provides for the organization of the Executive Department, and defines its power and duty. The 3d article defines the tenure by which the persons in whom the judicial power may be vested shall hold their offices, and prescribes the extent of their power and jurisdiction. These three articles provide for the three great departments of Government called into existence by the Constitution, but some other provisions just then occur, which ought to have been included in one or the other of the preceding articles, and these provisions are incorporated and compose the 4th article. The 1st section of it declares, that "full faith and credit shall be given in each State, to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of every other State. And the Congress may by general laws prescribe the manner in which such acts, records, and proceedings shall be proved, and the effect thereof." In the second section it declares, that a person, charged in any State with treason, felony, or other crime, who shall flee from justice, and be found in another State, shall, on demand of the Executive authority of the State from which he fled, be delivered up, to be removed to the State having jurisdiction of the crime. A similar provision is contained in the same section, relative to fugitives who are bound to labor, by the laws of any State. In the first case which has been selected, express authority has been given to Congress, to prescribe the manner in which the records, &c., should be proved, and also the effect thereof, but in the other two, no authority is given to Congress, and yet the bare inspection of the three cases will prove that the interference of Congress is less necessary in the first than in the two remaining cases. A record must always be proved by itself, because it is the highest evidence of which the case admits. The effect of a record ought to depend upon the laws of the State of which it is a record, and, therefore, the power to prescribe the effect of a record was wholly unnecessary, and has been so held by Congress—no law having been passed to prescribe the effect of a record. In the second case there seems to be some apparent reason for passing a law to ascertain the officer upon whom the demand is to be made; what evidence of the identity of the person demanded and of the guilt of the party charged must be produced before the obligation to deliver shall be complete. The same apparent reason exists for the passage of a law relative to fugitives from labor. According, however, to the rule of construction contended for, Congress cannot pass any law to carry the Constitution into effect, in the two last cases selected, because express power has been given in the first and is withheld in the two last. Congress has nevertheless passed laws to carry those provisions into effect, and this exercise of power has never been complained of by the people or the States.

SENATE.

Mr. President, it is contended by those who are opposed to the passage of this bill, that Congress can exercise no power by implication, and yet it is admitted, nay, even asserted, that Congress would have power to pass all laws necessary to carry the Constitution into effect, whether it had given or withheld the power which is contained in the following paragraph of the 8th section of the 1st article: "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States or in any department or officer thereof." If this part of the Constitution really confers no power, it at least, according to this opinion, strips it of that attribute of perfection which has by these gentlemen been ascribed to it. But, sir, this is not the fact. It does confer power of the most substantial and salutary nature. Let us, sir, take a view of the Constitution upon the supposition that no power is vested in the Government by this clause, and see how the exclusion of power by implication can be reconciled to the most important acts of the Government. The Constitution has expressly given Congress power "to constitute tribunals inferior to the Supreme Court," but it has no where expressly given the power to constitute a supreme court. In the 3d article it is said, "the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one supreme court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish." The discretion, which is here given to Congress, is confined to the inferior courts, which it may from time to time ordain and establish, and not to the Supreme Court. In the discussion which took place upon the bill to repeal the judicial system of the United States in the year 1802, this distinction is strongly insisted upon by the advocates for the repeal. The Supreme Court was said to be the creature of the Constitution, and, therefore, intangible, but that Congress, possessing a discretionary power to create or not to create inferior tribunals, had the same discretionary power to abolish them whenever it was expedient. But if even the discretionary power here vested does extend to the Supreme Court, yet the power of Congress to establish that court must rest upon implication, and upon implication alone. Under the authority to establish tribunals inferior to the Supreme Court, the power to establish a supreme court would, according to my ideas, be vested in Congress by implication. And, sir, it is only vested by implication. even if the declaration, that Congress shall have power to pass all laws necessary and proper to carry into effect the power vested in any department or officer of the Government should be held to be an operative grant. Under this grant, Congress can pass laws to carry into effect the powers vested in the judicial department. What are the powers vested in this department. That it shall exercise jurisdiction in all cases in law and equity arising under this Constitution, &c., in all cases affecting ambassadors, &c., but the power to create the department and to carry into effect the powers given to or vested in that department, are very different things.

The power to create the Supreme Court cannot be expressly granted in the power to pass all laws necessary and proper to carry into effect the powers vested in that court, but must, as I have endeavored to prove, be derived from implication. Let me explain my understanding of a power which exists by implication, by an example which will be comprehended by all who hear me. In a devise, an estate is granted to A, after the death of B, and no express disposition is made of the estate during the life of A; in that case A is said to have an estate for life, by implication, in the property so devised. So when the Constitution gives the right to create tribunals inferior to the Supreme Court, the right to create the Supreme is vested in Congress by implication. Shall we after this be told that Congress cannot Constitutionally exercise any right by implication? By the exercise of a right derived only from implication, Congress has organized a Supreme Court, and then, as incidental to power, existing only by implication, it has passed laws to punish offences against the law by which the court has been created and organized. Sir, the right of the Government to accept of the District of Columbia, exists only by implication. The right of the Government to purchase or accept of places for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, and dockyards, exists only by implication, and yet no man in the nation, so far as my knowledge extends, has complained of the exercise of those implied powers, as an unconstitutional usurpation of power. The right to purchase or accept of places for the erection of light-houses, as well as the right to erect and support light-houses, must be derived by implication alone, if any such right exists. The clause in the Constitution which gives Congress the power "to exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever, over such district (not exceeding ten miles square) as may, by cession of particular States, and the acceptance of Congress, become the seat of Government of the United States, and to exercise like authority over all places purchased by the consent of the Legislature of the State in which the same shall be, for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dockyards, and other needful buildings," certainly gives no express power to accept or purchase any of the places, destined for the uses therein specified. The only power expressly given in this clause is that of exercising exclusive legislation in such places; the right to accept or purchase must be derived by implication from this clause, or it must be shown to be comprehended in or incidental to some other power expressly delegated by the Constitution. I shall now attempt to show, that according to the construction which has been given to other parts of this Constitution, Congress has the right to incorporate a bank to enable it to manage the fiscal concerns of the nation. If this can be done, and if it can also be shown that the correctness of such construction has never excited murmur or complaint—that it has not even been questioned, I shall have accomplished everything which it will be incumbent on me to prove, to justify the passage of the bill upon your table. The power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises, together with the power to pass all laws which may be necessary and proper for carrying into effect the foregoing powers, when tested by the same rule of construction which has been applied to other parts of the Constitution, fairly invests Congress with the power to create a bank. Under the power to regulate commerce, Congress exercises the right of building and supporting light-houses. What do we understand by regulating commerce? Where do you expect to find regulations of commerce? Will any man look for them anywhere else than in your treaties with foreign nations, and in your statutes regulating your custom-houses and custom-house officers? What are the reasons for vesting Congress with the right to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States? The commerce of a nation is a matter of the greatest importance in all civilized countries. It depends upon compacts with other nations, and whether they are beneficial or prejudicial depends not so much on the reciprocal interest of nations as upon their capacity to defend their rights and redress their wrongs. It was therefore highly important that the right to regulate commerce with foreign nations should be vested in the National Government. If the regulation of commerce among the several States had been left with the States, a multiplicity of conflicting regulations would have been the consequence. Endless collisions would have been created, and that harmony and good neighborhood, so essential between the members of a Federal Republic, would have been wholly unattainable. The best interest of the community, therefore, imperiously required, that this power should be delegated to Congress. Not so of light-houses. The interest of the States would have induced them to erect light-houses, where they were necessary, and when erected they would have been equally beneficial to their own vessels, the vessels of their sister States, and of foreign nations. The performance of this duty could have been most safely confided to the States. They were better informed of the situations in which they ought to be erected than Congress could possibly be, and could enforce the execution of such regulations as might be necessary to make them useful. How then has it happened that Congress has taken upon itself the right to erect light-houses, under their general power to regulate commerce? I have heard and seen in the public prints a great deal of unintelligible jargon about the incidentality of a law to the power delegated and intended to be executed by it, and of its relation to the end which is to be accomplished by its exercise, which I acknowledge I do not clearly and distinctly comprehend, and must therefore be excused from answering. I speak now of the public newspapers, to which I am compelled to resort to ascertain the objections which are made to this measure, as gentlemen have persevered in refusing to assign the reasons which have induced them to oppose the passage of the bill. But, sir, I can clearly comprehend that the right to erect light-houses is not incidental to the power of regulating commerce, unless everything is incidental to that power which tends to facilitate and promote the prosperity of commerce. It is contended that under the power to lay and collect taxes, imposts, and duties, you can pass all laws necessary for that purpose, but they must be laws to lay and collect taxes, imposts, and duties, and not laws which tend to promote the collection of taxes. A law to erect light-houses is no more a law to regulate commerce, than a law creating a bank is a law to collect taxes, imposts, and duties. But the erection of light-houses tends to facilitate and promote the security and prosperity of commerce, and in an equal degree the erection of a bank tends to facilitate and insure the collection, safe-keeping, and transmission of your revenue. If, by this rule of construction, which is applied to light-houses, but denied to the bank, Congress can, as incidental to the power to regulate commerce, erect light-houses, it will be easy to show that the same right may be exercised, as incidental to the power of laying and collecting duties and imposts. Duties cannot be collected, unless vessels importing dutiable merchandise arrive in port; whatever, therefore, tends to secure their safe arrival may be exercised under the general power; the erection of light-houses does facilitate the safe arrival of vessels in port, and Congress therefore can exercise this right as incidental to the power to lay imposts and duties.

But it is said the advocates of the bank differ among themselves in fixing upon the general power to which the right to create a bank is incidental, and that this difference proves that there is no incidentality, to use a favorite expression, between that and any one of the enumerated general powers. The same reason can be urged, with equal force, against the constitutionality of every law for the erection of light-houses. Let the advocates for this doctrine lay their finger upon the power to which the right of erecting light-houses is incidental. It can be derived with as much apparent plausibility and reason from the right to lay duties, as from the right to regulate commerce. Who is there, now, in this body who has not voted for the erection of a light-house? And no man who reads one of these will believe it to be a regulation of commerce. And no man in the nation, so far as my knowledge extends, has ever complained of the exercise of this power. The right to erect light-houses is exercised, because the commerce of the nation, or the collection of duties, is greatly facilitated by that means; and, sir, the right to create a bank is exercised because the collection of your revenue, and the safe-keeping and easy and speedy transmission of your public money is not simply facilitated, but because these important objects are more perfectly secured by the erection of a bank than they can be by any other means in the power of human imagination to devise. We say, therefore, in the words of the Constitution, that a bank is necessary and proper, to enable the Government to carry into complete effect the right to lay and collect taxes, imposts, duties, and excises. We do not say that the existence of the Government absolutely depends upon the operations of a bank, but that a national bank enables the Government to manage its fiscal concerns more advantageously than it could do by any other means. The terms necessary and proper, according to the construction given to every part of the Constitution, imposes no limitation upon the powers previously delegated. If these words had been omitted in the clause giving authority to pass laws to carry into execution the powers vested by the Constitution in the National Government, still Congress would have been bound to pass laws which were necessary and proper, and not such as were unnecessary and improper. Every legislative body, every person invested with power of any kind, is morally bound to use only those means which are necessary and proper for the correct execution of the powers delegated to them. But it is contended, that if a bank is necessary and proper for the management of the fiscal concerns of the nation, yet Congress has no power to incorporate one, because there are State banks which may be resorted to. No person who has undertaken to discuss this question has, as far as my knowledge extends, ventured to declare that a bank is not necessary. Every man admits, directly or indirectly, the necessity of resorting to banks of some kind. This admission is at least an apparent abandonment of the Constitutional objection; for, if a bank is necessary and proper, then have Congress the Constitutional right to erect a bank. But this is denied. It is contended that this idea rests alone upon the presumption that the Government of the United States is wholly independent of the State governments, which is not the fact; that this very law is dependent upon the State courts for its execution. This is certainly not the fact. The courts of the United States have decided, in the most solemn manner, that they have cognizance of all cases affecting the Bank of the United States. Sir, it is true that the Government of the United States is dependent upon the State governments for its organization. Members of both Houses of Congress, and the President of the United States, are chosen by the State governments, or under the authority of their laws. But it is equally true, that wherever the Constitution confides to the State governments the right to perform any act in relation to the Federal Government, it imposes the most solemn obligation upon them to perform the act. The Constitution of the United States, as to these particular acts, is the constitution of the several States, and their functionaries are accordingly sworn to support it. Can it, then, be seriously contended, that because the Constitution has in some cases made the Government of the United States dependent upon the State governments, in all which cases it has imposed the most solemn obligations upon them to act, that it will be necessary and proper for Congress to make itself dependent upon them in cases where no such obligation is imposed? The Constitution has defined all the cases where this Government ought to be dependent upon that of the States; and it would be unwise and improvident for us to multiply these cases by legislative acts, especially where we have no power to compel them to perform the act, for which we have made ourselves their dependents. In forming a permanent system of revenue, it would be unwise in Congress to rely, for its collection and transmission, from one extreme of this extensive empire to the other, upon any accidental circumstance, wholly beyond their power or control. There are State banks in almost every State in the Union, but their existence is wholly independent of this Government, and their dissolution is equally so. The Secretary of the Treasury has informed you that he conceives a bank is necessary to the legitimate exercise of the powers vested by the Constitution in the Government. I know, sir, that the testimony of this officer will not be very highly estimated by several honorable members of this body. I am aware that this opinion has subjected him, and the committee also, to the most invidious aspersions; but, sir, the situation of that officer, independent of his immense talents, enables him to form a more correct opinion than any other man in the nation of the degree of necessity which exists at the present time for a national bank, to enable the Government to manage its fiscal operations. He has been ten years at the head of your Treasury; he is thoroughly acquainted with the influence of the bank upon your revenue system; and he has, when called upon, declared that a bank is necessary to the proper exercise of the legitimate powers of the Government. His testimony is entitled to great weight in the decision of this question, at least with those gentlemen who have no knowledge of the practical effects of the operations of the bank in the collection, safe-keeping, and transmission of your revenue. In the selection of means to carry any of your Constitutional powers into effect, you must exercise a sound discretion; acting under its influence, you will discover that what is proper at one time may be extremely unfit and improper at another. The original powers granted to the Government by the Constitution can never change with the varying circumstances of the country, but the means by which those powers are to be carried into effect must necessarily vary with the varying state and circumstances of the nation. We are, when acting to-day, not to inquire what means were necessary and proper twenty years ago, not what were necessary and proper at the organization of the Government, but our inquiry must be, what means are necessary and proper this day. The Constitution, in relation to the means by which its powers are to be executed, is one eternal now. The state of things now, the precise point of time when we are called upon to act, must determine our choice in the selection of means to execute the delegated powers.

SENATE.

Bank of the United States.

FEBRUARY, 1811.

It is said, that the States have reserved to themselves the exclusive right of erecting banks. That the States have exercised the right of establishing banks is a fact not to be denied, but that they have this right under the Constitution, is extremely questionable. Had these great States, who have undertaken by their instructions to influence the decision of this question by Congress, contented themselves with the exercise of this right to establish banks, I should not, upon this occasion, enter into an investigation of that right. But these great States, not content with the exercise of an usurped authority, are by usurpation attempting to legislate for Congress.

And, sir, what is the inducement with these great States to put down the Bank of the United States? Their avarice, combined with the love of domination. They have erected banks, in many of which they hold stock to a considerable amount, and they wish to compel the United States to use their banks as places of deposit for their public moneys, by which they expect to increase their dividends. And in the banks in which they hold no stock, many of the individual members of their legislatures are stockholders, and no doubt were influenced to give instructions by motives of sheer avarice. The love of power no doubt has had some influence in producing these instructions. Every person, who is not wholly ignorant of the history of this Government, knows something of the influence of these great States upon the councils of the nation. Have we not heard it said, that after three of the great States had instructed their members to vote against the bank, it was a matter of too great delicacy for Congress to think of acting upon the subject? I had thought that the rights of the States were equal; that if the rights of three of the little States were violated or affected in any manner, that it was a subject of as much delicacy as if the rights of three great States had been affected. Sir, if this doctrine becomes fashionable; if two or three great States can upon all occasions, through the agency of their legislatures, control the deliberations of Congress, you will compel the smaller States, by the most direful necessity, to adopt the principle of one consolidated government. Which of the States are to be principally benefited by the dissolution of the bank? Those States in which the principal part of your revenue is to be collected. The great commercial States are to monopolize the benefits which are to arise from the deposits of your public money. The suppression of this bank will benefit none of the interior or smaller States, in which there is little or no revenue collected. As the whole benefit is to be engrossed by three or four of the great Atlantic States, so the whole of the power which the dissolution of this bank will take from the National Government will be exclusively monopolized by the same States. Is it desirable to increase the influence of these great States, which is already too great, at the expense of the United States? Does not the history of these great States admonish us in the most impressive terms to beware of placing this Government in a state of dependence upon them? Sir, the time has been, and it will certainly arrive again, when some one or more of these great States will be found in a state of hostility to the National Government; and with this knowledge you are about to place the management of your public money in the hands of the State banks, who are dependent for their legal existence upon the State governments. But, sir, permit me to examine this exclusive right of the State governments to create banks. In the tenth section of the first article of the Constitution of the United States, it is declared, among other things, that no State shall coin moneys; emit bills of credit; make anything but gold or silver a tender in the payment of debts. What, sir, is a bill of credit? Will it be contended that a bank bill is not a bill of credit? They are, emphatically, bills of credit. But it may be said, that the States do not, by the creation of banks with authority to emit these bills of credit, infringe upon the Constitution, because they do not emit the bills themselves. If they have not the power to emit bills of credit, a fortiori, they cannot delegate to others a right which they themselves cannot exercise. But, sir, according to the maxims of law and sound reason, what they do by another they do themselves. If, then, the State governments are restrained from exercising this right to incorporate a bank, it would appear ex necessitate rei that this right is vested in the Government of the United States. The entire sovereignty of this nation is vested in the State governments and in the Federal Government, except that part of it which is retained by the people, which is solely the right of electing their public functionaries. The right to create a corporation is a right inherent in every sovereignty; the people of the United States cannot exercise this right. If, then, the States are restrained from creating a bank with authority to emit bills of credit, it appears to be established that the Federal Government does possess this right. If, however, it is still believed that the law by which this bank has been created was the result of a forced construction of the Constitution, yet I must contend that that construction is entitled to some weight in the decision of this question. The time and state of the public mind, when this construction was given, gives it a strong claim to consideration upon this occasion. This construction was given shortly after the Government was organized, when first impressions had not been effaced by lapse of time, or distorted by party feelings, or individual animosity. This law did not pass in the hard unconstitutional times which produced the Sedition law. No, sir, this law passed in the best days of this Republic. At that time the idea of party, as now understood, was wholly unknown. The parties which then existed were literally Federal and anti-Federal. Those who were friendly to the Federal Constitution, and those who were inimical to it, formed the only party then known in this nation. What, sir, is the situation in which we are now placed? What are the circumstances under which we are called upon to reject this bill? The great influential States, induced by motives of avarice and ambition, interpose the weight of their authority; attempt to put a veto upon your right to pass such laws as are necessary and proper for the general welfare, through the instrumentality of instructions, by depriving not only their Senators and Representatives of the exercise of a sound and honest discretion, but also by intimidating others by the weight of their influence and authority. The Democratic presses in these great States have for more than twelve months past teemed with the most scurrilous abuse against every member of Congress who has dared to utter a syllable in favor of the renewal of the bank charter. The member who dares to give his opinion in favor of the renewal of the charter, is instantly charged with being bribed by the agents of the bank, with being corrupt, with having trampled upon the rights and liberties of the people, with having sold the sovereignty of the United States to foreign capitalists, with being guilty of perjury, by having violated the Constitution. Yes, sir, these are the circumstances under which we are called upon to reject the bill. When we compare the circumstances under which we are now acting with those which existed at the time when the law was passed to incorporate the bank, we may well distrust our own judgments. Sir, I had always thought that a corporation was an artificial body, existing only in contemplation of law; but if we can believe the rantings of our Democratic editors in these great States, and the denunciations of our public declaimers, it exists under the form of every foul and hateful beast and bird, and creeping thing. It is an Hydra; it is a Cerberus; it is a Gorgon; it is a Vulture; it is a Viper. Yes, sir, in their imaginations it not only assumes every hideous and frightful form, but it possesses every poisonous, deleterious, and destructive quality. Shall we, sir, suffer our imaginations to be alarmed, and our judgments to be influenced, by such miserable stuff? Shall we tamely act under the lash of this tyranny of the press? No man complains of the discussion in the newspapers of any subject which comes before the Legislature of the Union. But I most solemnly protest against the course which has been pursued by these editors in relation to this question. Instead of reasoning to prove the unconstitutionality of the law, they charge members of Congress with being bribed or corrupted. And this is what they call the liberty of the press. To tyranny, under whatever form it may be exercised, I declare open and interminable war. To me, it is perfectly indifferent whether the tyrant is an irresponsible editor or a despotic Monarch.

Mr. President, if the construction which has been given to the Constitution is entitled to no weight with the members who now compose the Senate, will it also be contended that the different acts of successive democratic Congresses, by which they have sanctioned the validity of the construction under which this bank was created, are entitled to no weight or consideration? Perhaps it would be unfair to lay any stress upon the simple acquiescence of our democratic predecessors in this measure. I shall therefore show, that the acts to which I allude were positive affirmative acts, and not simply, or in any degree, acts of acquiescence. By the charter, the corporation was authorized to establish offices of discount and deposit wheresoever it should think fit, within the United States. In the year 1803, the United States obtained Louisiana by purchase. Under the authority given in the charter, the corporation could not extend its branches into Louisiana. In the year 1804, a democratic Congress passed a law to authorize this devouring monster to lay its destructive fangs upon the unfortunate people of these newly acquired Territories. It has been said that the State governments were competent to resist the execution of this law. How ungenerous, then, was it in our democratic predecessors to authorize this institution, with its pestilential fangs, to seize upon these helpless and unfortunate people, who had no State governments competent to resist the execution of this law, and shield them from the deadly poison of this venomous viper. It was unkind; it was cruel. Permit me, sir, to make one or two observations upon this competency of the State governments to resist the authority or the execution of a law of Congress. What kind of resistance can they make which is Constitutional? I know of but one kind, and that is by elections. The people and the States have a right to change the members of the National Legislature; and in that way, and in that alone, can they effect a change of the measures of this Government.

It is true there is another kind of resistance which may be made, but it is unknown to the Constitution. This resistance depends upon physical force—it is an appeal to the sword—and by the sword must that appeal be decided, and not by the provisions of the Constitution.

We are informed, however, that the States thought it most prudent to acquiesce in this law, and waive the right of resisting it, to which they were so entirely competent.

Does the positive sanction of this measure by our democratic Congresses rest alone upon this act of 1804? No, sir; the act by which the bank was incorporated made no provision for the punishment of those who might counterfeit its bills and checks. In the year 1798, a law for the punishment of such offences was passed. In the year 1807, a democratic Congress, composed of many of the same members who are now called upon to act again upon the subject of the bank, passed a law also for the punishment of the same offences against the bank. This is not all, sir; so great was the unanimity of both Houses upon this question, that the bill passed through both Houses without producing a call for the yeas and nays upon its final passage, or in any of its intermediate stages. The Constitution says, Congress shall make laws "to provide for the punishment of counterfeiting the securities and current coin of the United States." I have shown that the power to punish counterfeiting the current coin was fairly incidental to the power of coining money. But the power to punish counterfeiting the securities is an original grant of power, and not incidental to any one of the delegated powers. As the Constitution has given the power to punish counterfeiting the securities and the current coin, expressly, according to the doctrine contended for by the enemies of the bank, the power to punish any other species of forgery is withheld. But let us pursue this idea a little further. The law incorporating the bank is denounced as unconstitutional; it therefore is not binding upon the people of the United States as a law, and yet the very men who denounce it, who declare it to be unconstitutional, have passed a law to condemn those who violate its provisions to ten years imprisonment, and to enormous fines. With what propriety can we say that our republican predecessors have simply acquiesced in this measure? With what consistency can we now refuse to renew the charter on account of the want of Constitutional power? But it is contended that we have done nothing more than simply acquiesced in this measure, and that our acquiescence was wholly the result of a conviction that the act incorporating a bank was a contract. What, sir, is the essence of a contract? That there shall be parties able to contract; that they do contract; that there shall be a consideration, a quid pro quo; that the conditions shall be reciprocal. What is the fact in relation to the bank bill? Does the bank make any stipulations in favor of the Government? No, none. Does the charter stipulate that the Government shall provide for the punishment of those who counterfeit bank bills? No. And yet a republican Congress, under the idea, I suppose, of its being a contract, has passed a law for that purpose. The law does not contain one essential feature of a contract; it is, therefore, no contract.

If I have succeeded in establishing the Constitutional right of this House to pass a bill to incorporate a bank, the remaining part of the task which I have undertaken to perform will be easily dispatched. What are the circumstances under which we are called upon to vote against the renewal of the charter of the Bank of the United States? Europe is still convulsed to its centre, by wars which, in their progress, have overthrown the ancient bounds and limits of the independent nations among whom it has been immemorially parcelled out. The established usages and laws of nations have been trampled under foot both by land and sea. Such is the prospect abroad. What is our internal situation? The confiscation of American property in the ports of France, Spain, Italy, and Holland. The depredations committed upon our commerce on the high seas by British cruisers, and the embarrassments to which it has been subjected in the northern ports of Europe, have already produced numerous bankruptcies in most of our commercial cities. In addition to the embarrassments produced by these causes, we have superadded those which must necessarily result from a non-intercourse with England, the country with which we have hitherto had the most extensive commercial intercourse. From these additional embarrassments we may be saved by the want of good faith in the French Government. Should that be the case, we shall most inevitably be excluded from all commercial intercourse with the European continent, which may be as embarrassing as the non-intercourse with Great Britain. In that event our European commerce will be confined solely to Great Britain and her dependencies. Such, sir, are the circumstances under which we are called upon to dissolve suddenly an institution which circulates $13,000,000, and to which the commercial class of this nation are indebted $14,000,000. It must also be remembered, that the same class of your citizens are indebted to the Government nearly $12,000,000, upon which your payments into the Treasury for the discharge of the current expenses of the year are solely dependent. Sir, I have never believed that the mantle of Elijah has descended upon my shoulders, and yet I can very easily foresee, that individual and national distress must be produced by the sudden dissolution of the bank. The poorer part of your manufacturers and mechanics will be the first to feel the distress. The deputation of mechanics and manufacturers from the city of Philadelphia stated to the committee, that upon the rejection of the bill for the renewal of the charter, in the other House, the bank began to contract its discounts, and that the whole city was filled with alarm and dismay. That the credit even of bank paper was shaken, and individual confidence had received a severe shock. That in consequence of this alarm and distress, the bank had determined to return to its former extent of discounts and to continue it to the last moment. That the contraction of discounts by the Bank of the United States had produced a contraction of discounts in the State banks, so that those who had their accounts with the latter banks were in no better situation than the debtors of the former. Whenever a man testifies against his apparent interest, he ought to be believed. It is apparently the interest of the State banks that the Bank of the United States should be put down. It is their interest to discount good paper as largely as possible. The Bank of the United States discounts to the amount of about $15,000,000. The dissolution of this bank will bring into the market, which will then be solely occupied by the State banks, an excess of $15,000,000 of good paper to be discounted. The demand for discounts, when compared with the discounting capital, will be greatly increased, and the benefit of that increase will be exclusively enjoyed by the State banks; it is therefore apparently their interest that the Bank of the United States should be dissolved. But they have petitioned for the renewal of the charter.

It is said, however, that if so much distress is to flow from the dissolution of the bank, it proves that the banking system is deleterious in its consequences. I will not now enter into the discussion of that question, because it is not the question before the Senate. The system has long been practised upon; is increasing from day to day, and is wholly beyond the control of Congress. But, sir, an inspection of the Journals of the Senate of the present session affords abundant evidence, that this House, at least, believe that the banking system is a beneficial one. We have not incorporated more, I believe, than five banks within the District of Columbia during the present session. The renewal, or the refusal to renew this charter, does not then decide the question whether the banking system shall be abolished in the United States or not. Gentlemen cannot but be sensible of this. The old Congress incorporated the Bank of North America in the year 1781. New York and Massachusetts had followed the example before the Bank of the United States was incorporated, and every State in the Union has since incorporated banks. The banking system has been too long and too deeply rooted, to be frowned out of existence by Congress. If, however, gentlemen are convinced that the system of banking known and established among us is injurious in its effects, these injurious effects will be diminished by renewing the charter of the Bank of the United States. The State banks, whose credibility in this case is unquestionable, have told you that the influence of the Bank of the United States upon them is a beneficial one; that it prevents excessive discounts and emissions of paper, which but for this check would inevitably take place in the State banks. Every one of the State banks of Philadelphia, except one, has petitioned for the renewal of the Bank of the United States, and one of the deputation of merchants who was a director of one of those banks stated the reason why that bank had declined. That an association in some of the interior towns had been formed without the authority of law, and that the bank was suspected by the State Legislature of having favored it; that a motion had been made in the State Legislature to inquire into the fact, and that, in consequence of this circumstance, that bank had been prevented from petitioning. The check which one bank has upon another is in fact the only substantial check which can be devised against excessive discounts and emissions by State banks. You may limit and restrain them by subjecting the directors individually to any loss which may be incurred by a violation of the restrictions imposed by the charter. Suppose they discount to twice the amount permitted, and the stockholders, who alone have the means of discovery, ascertain the fact; they will not disclose it, because disclosure would destroy the credit of the bank. But it is objected to the renewal of the charter, that it has been a political machine in the hands of our political opponents, and that it has been partial in its operations. That it may have been so used is very possible; but that it has within the last twelve years not so used is not believed. Some of the delegation of the mechanics, all of whom I believe were democrats, had been dealers with that

Bank for twelve years, and they all united in contradicting all idea of its being partial, or influenced in the slightest degree by the political character of its customers during that time. And one of them said explicitly that opposition to the renewal in Philadelphia was confined principally to the newspapers. When there were but few banks and the competition for discounts was great, I can readily believe, that it might have had some influence upon political questions and that it was guilty of partiality; and so would any other institution placed in the same situation. The multiplication of banks in the United States has given us the most ample security against the repetition of either of these offences. The most formidable objection against the expediency of the renewal, in the estimation of those who are opposed to it, is that a large portion of the stock is held by foreigners; and apprehensions are entertained that these foreigners have had, and will again have some influence upon our public councils; that but for the influence thus acquired, we should have taken stronger measures in vindication of our rights. If this influence really exists, some degree of influence must also exist and operate upon those foreigners in our favor. If the most profitable part of their capital is that which is invested in our bank stock, which the Government has sold to them, will they not exert their influence upon their own councils, upon any apprehension of war between the two countries? Surely the country in which their capital is employed, and who can at any moment lay their hands upon it, must have more influence upon the conduct of the capitalists, than they can possibly have upon it. How long shall we frighten ourselves with empty phantoms and imaginary evils? How long shall we indulge ourselves in the pursuit of some imaginary theoretical good, which, like the will-o'-the-wisp, continually eludes our grasp? Sir, we have the experience of twenty years for our guide. During that lapse of years your finances have been, through the agency of this bank, skilfully and successfully managed. During this period, the improvement of the country and the prosperity of the nation have been rapidly progressing. Why then should we, at this perilous and momentous crisis, abandon a well tried system; faulty perhaps in the detail, but sound in its fundamental principles? Does the pride of opinion revolt at the idea of acquiescing in the system of your political opponents? Come! and with me sacrifice your pride and political resentments at the shrine of political good. Let them be made a propitiatory sacrifice for the promotion of the public welfare, the savor of which will ascend to Heaven, and be there recorded as a lasting, an everlasting evidence, of your devotion to the happiness of your country.

SENATE.

Bank of the United States.

FEBRUARY, 1811.

Samuel Mims, Joseph Wilson, and the Baptist Church at Salem Meeting-house, in the Mississippi Territory," reported it without amendment.

On motion, by Mr. GILMAN,

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of opening another passage to the gallery, on the west side of the Senate Chamber, and to propose such alterations as they may deem proper.

Ordered, That Messrs. GILMAN, GREGG, and DANA, be the committee.

Mr. DANA, from the committee to whom was referred the bill for the benefit of seamen of the United States, reported it amended; and the amendments were read, and ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. DANA also communicated a letter to the committee, from the Secretary of the Department of State, on the subject of naturalized American seamen; which was read; and ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate.

The bill to authorize the payment of certain certificates, credits, and pensions, and for other purposes, was read the second time.

The bill, entitled "An act to authorize the election of sheriffs in the Indiana Territory," was read the second time and referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon; and Messrs. CAMPBELL, FRANKLIN, and LEIB, were appointed the committee.

The bill, entitled "An act in addition to the act, entitled 'An act supplementary to the act concerning Consuls and Vice Consuls,' and for the further protection of American seamen," was read the second time, and referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon; and Messrs. BRADLEY, GILMAN, and BRENT, were appointed the committee.

The Senate resumed the motion of the 8th instant, "That a committee be appointed to bring in a bill making compensation to certain officers of the customs;" and, on the question to agree thereto, it was determined in the negative.

Mr. TAYLOR presented the memorial of Joseph Wheaton, praying remuneration for services rendered to the United States in the Revolutionary war, and compensation for losses sustained therein; and the memorial was read, and referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon, by bill or otherwise; and Messrs. TAYLOR, BRADLEY, and DANA, were appointed the committee.

The Senate resumed the consideration of their amendment, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, to the bill, entitled "An act to enable the people of the Territory of Orleans to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States; and for other purposes."

On motion, by Mr. TAIT, that the Senate recede from the said amendment, it was determined in the negative—yeas 11, nays 19, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Campbell, Condit, Crawford, Franklin, Lambert, Matthewson, Robinson, Smith of Maryland, Tait, and Whiteside.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Bradley, Brent, Champlin,

Dana, Gaillard, Giles, Gilman, Goodrich, Gregg, Horsey, Leib, Lloyd, Pickering, Reed, Smith of New York, Taylor, Turner, and Worthington.

On motion, by Mr. TAIT,

Resolved, That the Senate insist on their amendment to the said bill.

The engrossed bill authorizing the sale and grant of a certain quantity of public land to the Havre de Grace Bridge Company was read the third time, and the blanks filled.

On motion, by Mr. WORTHINGTON, that the further consideration of the bill be postponed to the first Monday in December next, it was determined in the negative. And on the question, Shall this bill pass? it was determined in the negative—yeas 13, nays 15, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Bayard, Giles, Goodrich, Gregg, Horsey, Leib, Pickering, Reed, Smith of Maryland, Smith of New York, Whiteside, and Worthington.

NAYS—Messrs. Bradley, Champlin, Condit, Crawford, Cutts, Franklin, Gaillard, Gilman, Lambert, Lloyd, Matthewson, Robinson, Tait, and Turner.

The bill, entitled "An act providing for the removal of the land office established at Nashville, in the State of Tennessee, and Canton, in the State of Ohio, and to authorize the Register and Receiver of the Public Moneys to superintend the public sales of land in the district east of Pearl river," was read the third time as amended.

Resolved, That this bill pass with amendments.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill, entitled "An act to incorporate the Bank of Potomac;" and concurred therein.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill, entitled "An act to incorporate the Bank of Washington," and concurred therein.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill, entitled "An act to incorporate the subscribers to the Farmers' Bank of Alexandria," and concurred therein.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill, entitled "An act to incorporate the Union Bank of Georgetown."

On motion, by Mr. BRENT, they were referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon. Messrs. BRENT, POPE, and CRAWFORD, were appointed the committee.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to amend and continue in force an act, entitled "An act to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States," passed on the 25th day of February, 1791.

Mr. LEIB said that it was not his intention to have broken silence on this subject; he meant to content himself with a silent vote, as he considered the merits of the bill to be well understood, and every member's mind made up on them. The subject had become so trite, and was so hackneyed, as to have become threadbare, and he united in opinion with his friend from Tennessee, that it was not only a waste of time, but a work of supererogation to discuss it. He should not have risen but for some remarks, which had yesterday fallen from the gentleman from Georgia. Some intimation had been given by him about instructions from the great States, and while it seemed to be matter of complaint that such instructions had been given, it appeared also that the complaint extended to the non-production of them to the Senate. He had received instructions from a great State, as the gentleman from Georgia had termed it; for he did not recollect that the gentleman from Maryland, to whom the phrase was attributed, had used it—the great State of Pennsylvania; and those instructions he would have offered to the Senate before, had not some informality in their shape precluded him. The instructions having been mentioned, he deemed it a duty to read them to the Senate.

The people of the United States, by the adoption of the Federal Constitution, established a General Government for special purposes, reserving to themselves respectively the rights and authorities not delegated in that instrument. To the compact thereby created, each State acceded in its charter as a State, and is a party; the United States forming, as to it, the other party. The act of union, thus entered into, being to all intents and purposes, a treaty between sovereign States. The General Government, by this treaty, was not constituted the exclusive or final judge of the powers it was to exercise; for if it were so to judge, then its judgment and not the Constitution would be the measure of its authority.

Should the General Government, in any of its departments, violate the provisions of the Constitution, it rests with the States and with the people to apply suitable remedies.

With these impressions, the Legislature of Pennsylvania, to secure an administration of the Federal and State Governments conformably to the true spirit of their respective constitutions, feel it their duty to express their sentiments upon an important subject now before Congress, viz: the continuance or establishment of a bank. From a careful review of the powers vested in the General Government, they have the most positive conviction that the authority to grant charters of incorporation, within the jurisdiction of any State, without the consent thereof, is not recognised in that instrument, either expressly or by any warrantable implication: Therefore,

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, in General Assembly met, That the Senators of this State in the Senate of the United States be and are hereby instructed, and the Representatives of this State, in the House of Representatives of the United States be, and they hereby are, requested to use every exertion in their power to prevent the charter of the Bank of the United States from being renewed, or any other bank from being chartered by Congress, designed to have operation within the jurisdiction of any State without first having obtained the consent of the Legislature of such State.

Resolved, That the Governor be and he hereby is requested to forward a copy of the above preamble and resolution to each of the Senators and Representatives of this State in the Congress of the United States.

JOHN WEBER, Speaker H. R.

P. C. LANE, Speaker of the Senate.

In the House of Representatives, January 11th, 1811. Read and adopted.

Attest: GEORGE HECKERT, Clerk H. R.

In Senate, January 11th, 1811. Read and adopted.

Attest: J. A. McJIMSEY, Clerk of the Senate.

Wherefore, he would ask, was this made a cause of complaint? The instructions were given by the Legislature of Pennsylvania to their representatives. Was the right of the constituent denied to instruct his representative? For the instructions extended not beyond the representation. It was an affair between representatives and constituents, and as it did not proceed beyond them, as none else were comprehended, surely no cause could have been given for complaint. For his part he assented to the right of constituents to instruct, and was ready to yield it obedience—it was in accordance with his political maxims; and he should ever consider himself bound to obey instructions as long as they did not require the performance of an act, which would violate that oath which he had taken. On this occasion he yielded obedience with pride and pleasure, as the instructions corresponded with his own impressions of solemn obligation. He considered himself as the representative of the State of Pennsylvania; to represent, in his mind, was to appear for, or stand in the place of the body represented, and, in this view, he considered it his duty to speak the sense of his constituents, to do as they would do, were they present, otherwise he should misrepresent them. Did this look like dictation? Did it appear as if the great States desired to give law to the smaller ones, when they only gave their instructions to their own representatives, and none else were asked to render them obedience? He could not suppose it.

Allusion had been made to Pennsylvania on account of resistance to the laws of the United States. He felt the reproach, and had often experienced mortification from it. He had never countenanced unlawful opposition, nor had the people of Pennsylvania; for when it had existed, it had been local, and had never embraced the State; and therefore, the people of Pennsylvania were not comprehended in the reproach. The gentleman from Georgia had cited authority for renewing the charter of the Bank of the United States, and had at the same time disclaimed authority; in imitation of his example he would do so too, and he might say, that for the excitement to insurrection in a part of Pennsylvania he might refer to a source of authority as high as the gentleman from Georgia had referred for the establishment of the bank charter.

Some reasons had been assigned for the refusal of the Farmers and Mechanics Bank of Philadelphia to unite with the other banks in petitioning for a charter, which did not appear to him to be correct. The gentleman who gave the information to the committee was a director of the Bank of Philadelphia, and his information must have been derived from out-of-doors rumor. The Farmers and Mechanics Bank, Mr. LEIB apprehended, refused to petition for the renewal of the charter of the Bank of the United States, for other reasons. He knew a gentleman who managed the affairs of that bank, of superior intelligence and information, and second to none in point of knowledge of banking, who was as much opposed to a renewal as he was, and for a reason not unlike that hinted at by the gentleman from Georgia, that the Bank of the United States was a check upon the other banks, but a check like that of a shark upon the little fish around him. It was in the power of the Bank of the United States, by means of its great capital and the Governmental patronage, to prey upon the other banks whenever it pleased, and this was sufficient reason for the Farmers and Mechanics Bank to refuse its aid towards a renewal of the charter. These remarks he thought it his duty to submit to the Senate, and, in conformity with his first determination, he avoided any remarks upon the merits of the bill, which he conceived every member was already prepared to decide upon.

Mr. LLOYD.—Mr. President: This is indeed, sir, an up-hill, wind-mill sort of warfare—a novel mode of legislative proceeding. That a bill should be brought in on a very important subject which has been long under consideration, and that a gentleman should move to strike out the first section of the bill, which comprises all its vitality, (for it is the first section which provides for the continuance of the bank,) and should be supported in it, without deigning to assign any other reasons than may be derived from newspaper publications, which are so crude and voluminous that not one man out of ten will so far mispend his time as to take the trouble to read them, is indeed extraordinary. Still, if gentlemen choose to adopt this dumb sort of legislation, and are determined to take the question without offering any arguments in support of their opinions, I certainly should not have interfered with their wishes, had I not been a member of the committee who had reported the bill, who had heard the testimony offered by two very respectable delegations from Philadelphia; one from the master manufacturers and mechanics of the city, and the other from the merchants; and had I not taken minutes of this testimony, which I find it is expected from me that I should relate to the Senate.

Sir, I consider the motion to strike out, now under consideration, as going to the entire destruction of the bill, without any reference to its details or modifications; it therefore appears to me in order, to take into consideration only the material principle of the bill; that is, whether it be proper that the charter of the bank should be renewed on any terms whatever, let those terms be what they may.

[Mr. SMITH of Maryland stated, that the gentleman was mistaken; he was at liberty to go into consideration of the details, and might discuss them if he pleased.]

tion of a bill was moved to be struck out, that the subject-matter of the part so moved to be stricken out was only in order to be considered—but however this may be, I take it to be strictly in order to show, that this bank has been ably and fairly conducted, that it has been beneficial to the country, and extremely useful to the Government; because if this be shown, it will be the best argument that can be adduced for the rejection of the present motion, and the continuance of the bank.

Sir, it is admitted by the Secretary of the Treasury, in his communications to Congress, that the concerns of this bank have been "skillfully and wisely managed," that the bank has made a very limited and moderate use of the public moneys deposited with it; and that it has greatly facilitated the operations of Government by the safe-keeping and transmission of the public moneys. It has at all times met the wishes of the Government in making loans. It has done this even at six per cent., while the Government have been obliged, in one instance, for a considerable amount, to pay eight per cent. to other persons for the loans obtained from them. It is admitted, sir, that the bank, at the request of the Treasury Department, has established branches for the purpose of facilitating the operations of the Government at places where such establishments could not but be inconvenient to them in point of management, and disadvantageous in point of profit. I allude more particularly, sir, to the branches of the bank which have been established at New Orleans and at Washington. We have been told this session, sir, by a gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. SMITH,) that the Territory of Orleans is a very wealthy one, that it probably contains a greater number of rich inhabitants, for its population, than any other district in the Union. Sir, if this be the fact, of whom does this wealthy population consist? Not of the inhabitants, but of the planters; men who are not borrowers of the bank, who, when they realize the sales of their produce, invest the surplus proceeds of it beyond their expenditure in the funds, or in the acquisition of new lands, or in the purchase of an additional number of negroes. Sir, it is notorious, that from the recent possession by the United States of Louisiana, and the certainty that New Orleans must soon be the emporium of an immense western commerce, that city has become more the resort of the young, the adventurous, the enterprising, and the rash among the mercantile men of our country, than any other city in the Union; and it is obvious, sir, in proportion as the borrowers from a bank consist of persons of this description, in the same proportion must the circumstances of such bank be unsound; and without possessing any particular knowledge whatever on the state of this bank, if the collections of its debts are speedily made, I would not make the purchase at a discount of twenty-five per cent. from the nominal amount of them.

Sir, we can judge with more accuracy when we come nearer home. What is the state of the bank in this city? What the ability of its debtors to meet their engagements? It is stated the branch has a loan out here of four hundred thousand dollars. Where is the navigation?—where the wealthy merchants?—where are the opulent tradesmen?—the extensive manufacturers, to refund this money, when they are called on to do it? Sir, they are not to be found; they do not exist here; there are but very few opulent men in the city, and those are either not borrowers of the bank, or not borrowers to an amount of any importance. Where then is the money to be found, or what has been done with it? It has probably been taken out of the Bank of the United States to build up the five or six District banks which you have chartered the present session; to furnish the means of erecting the fifty or sixty brick houses which we are told have made their appearance during the last Summer; to encourage speculations in city lots, and to enable the proprietors to progress with the half finished canal which nearly adjoins us. Well, sir, if the bank promptly calls in its loan of four hundred thousand dollars, will the debtors be enabled to meet their payments? Can they sell these lots, these brick houses, these canal shares? No, sir, in such a state of things they could find no purchasers, they could nearly as well create a world as to furnish the money; and if the bank is to stop, and the payment of this debt be speedily coerced, I would not give two hundred thousand dollars for the whole of it.

In addition to this, I shall show presently, from testimony which cannot be controverted, that the conduct of the Bank of the United States, or its directors, or rather the stockholders, whose agents they are, in addition to being wise and skilful, and moderate, as the Secretary of the Treasury states them to have been, that they have also been honorable, and liberal, and impartial; and if, in addition to this, it be proved, that the bank has, in every instance where it had the ability to do it, met the wishes of the Government, and to facilitate its views in the security and collection of the revenue, it has also established branches where it must have been obviously and palpably to the disadvantage of the bank to do it—if it has furnished capitals for the extension of our commerce, if it has provided means for the establishment of important manufactures, if it has had a tendency to raise the price of our domestic produce, and has thus encouraged industry, and improved and embellished the interior of the country—it would seem pretty strongly to follow, that if it be expedient to preserve the existence of an institution similar to this, then these gentlemen, on the score of merit, added to the experience of twenty years successful operation, have a fair claim on the Government for a preference in favor of that which is already in operation.

I am aware, sir, that it may be stated in opposition to this claim, that these stockholders have enjoyed a boon for twenty years from which others of their fellow-citizens have been deprived, except on such terms as the sellers of shares chose to prescribe; that the charter expires by its own limitation, and that beyond this period they have no right to expect anything which may not arise from the interest and convenience of the Government. I admit, sir, there is considerable strength in these objections. The exclusive right contained in the charter ever appeared to me as furnishing the most solid Constitutional objection against the bank. The creation of monopolies; the granting of exclusive privileges, except so far as to secure to the authors of useful inventions the benefit of their discoveries; the tying up of the hands of the Legislature, and depriving itself of the power of according to a set of citizens, who may come into legal existence to-morrow, or ten years hence, what it had given to another; ever appeared to me hostile to the genius and spirit of the people of the United States, and of all their institutions. Highly then, sir, as I am induced to think of the conduct of this bank, from the best evidence I can obtain, still, from the considerations I have just mentioned, did the question now before us simply affect the stockholders, I should certainly not trouble the Senate with any remarks in reference to it, and should sit down in entire acquiescence, whether the prayer of their petition for the renewal of the charter of the bank were granted or rejected.

Sir, before quitting this idea of Constitutional objection, permit me to make one or two brief remarks in regard to it. It is impossible for the ingenuity of man to devise any written system of Government, which, after a lapse of time, extension of empire, or change of circumstances, shall be able to carry its own provisions into operation—hence, sir, the indispensable necessity of implied or resulting powers, and hence the provision in the Constitution that the Government should exercise such additional powers as were necessary to carry those that had been delegated into effect. Sir, if this country goes on increasing and extending, in the ratio it has done, it is not impossible that hereafter, to provide for all the new cases that may rise under this new state of things, the defined powers may prove only a text, and the implied or resulting powers may furnish the sermon to it.

Permit me, sir, to put one question on this head, in addition to those so ably, and to my view, unanswerably put yesterday by the honorable gentleman from Georgia (Mr. CRAWFORD.) Whence, sir, do you get the right, whence do you derive the powers to erect custom-houses in the maritime districts of the United States? To attach to them ten, fifteen, or twenty custom-house officers; and clothe these men with authority to invade the domicile, to break into the dwelling-house of perhaps an innocent citizen? Whence do you get it, sir, except as an implied power resulting from the authority given in the Constitution "to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises." If, under this authority, you can erect these custom-houses and create this municipal, fiscal, inquisitorial gens d'armes, with liberty to violate the rights of the citizen, to break into his castle at midnight, without even a form of a warrant, on a plausible appearance of probability, or probable cause of suspicion of his secreting smuggled goods, which the event may prove to be unfounded—and it will be recollected that a majority of Congress voted for the grant of this power in its most offensive form, when two years since they voted for the act enforcing the embargo—I say, sir, if under this general power to collect duties, you can erect the establishment and give the offensive power just mentioned, can you not, with the concurrence even of the citizens, adopt another more mild and useful mode, and create an establishment for the collection and safe-keeping of the revenue, and place it under the direction of ten or twelve directors, and christen it an office of discount and deposit, or of collection and payment, as you like best? And can you not, when you have thus created it, give to the directors a power, which perhaps they would have without your grant, to receive and keep the cash of those who choose to place it with them and to loan them money at the legal rate of interest, and in some places, as at New York, at nearly fifteen per cent. above the legal rate of interest? If you can do this, then you have your bank established, sir—and, most assuredly, if you can do one of these things you can do the other.

Sir, the Constitutional objection to this bank, on the ground that Congress had not the power to grant an act of incorporation, has ever appeared to me the most unsound and untenable. Still gentlemen of intelligence and of integrity, who have thought long and deeply on the subject, think differently from me; and I feel bound to respect their opinions, however opposed they may be to my own. Yet, sir, I will venture to predict, without feeling any anxiety for the fate of the prophecy, that should this bank be suffered to run down, such will be the state of things before this time twelve months, that there are other gentlemen, who at present have Constitutional objections, but who have not thought so long and deeply upon them, will, before that time, receive such a flood of intelligence, as on this head perfectly to dispel their doubts, and quiet their consciences.

Sir, I shall now proceed as briefly as may be in my power to state the situation of this bank on the expiration of its charter, and the effects on the community consequent on it. There is now due to the bank from individuals, fifteen millions of dollars. These fifteen millions of dollars must be collected—the power of the bank to grant discounts will have ceased, and the duty of the directors must require them to make the collection. Sir, how is this to be done? Whence can the money be obtained? I shall demonstrate to you presently, that already, from an apprehension of a non-renewal of the charter of the bank, business is nearly at a stand—that navigation, real estate, and merchandise are unsaleable; and that a man worth one hundred thousand dollars, at the recently rated value of property, and owing ten thousand dollars, must still be utterly unable to meet his engagements. Suppose, sir, this property consists in houses or shipping; suppose his warehouse is full of goods, and he has a large sum placed at his credit in England? If, sir, he can neither sell his ships, nor his goods—if he cannot sell his real estate nor scarcely give away his exchange, which hitherto, to men who had money in England, has been a never failing source of supply in case of need; I say under these circumstances, sir, whatever may be his property, he cannot meet his engagements. Sir, can men thus situated, solvent as they ought to be ten times over, find relief from the State banks? Certainly not, sir. These banks have already gone to the extreme length of their ability; they have always discounted to an amount in proportion to their capital exceeding that of the Bank of the United States, which is incontrovertibly proved by the dividends they have declared, which have at most universally equalled and frequently exceeded those of the Bank of the United States, notwithstanding the advantage enjoyed by the latter from the deposit of public moneys. Sir, so far from having it in their power, in the case of the dissolution of the Bank of the United States, to assist the debtors to that bank in meeting their engagements to it—I affirm the fact, on which I have myself a perfect reliance, that, take the State banks from Boston to Washington, and after paying their debts to the Bank of the United States, they have not, nor do I believe they have had, for six months back, specie enough to pay the debts due to their depositors, and the amount of their bills in circulation. And here I beg it to be observed, that bank bills, and bank deposits, or credits, are precisely the same thing—with this difference, that the latter, from the residence in the neighborhood of the banks, and the vigilance of the proprietors, would be the first called for. How idle is it then to expect to obtain relief from banks which have already extended themselves beyond the bounds of prudence, and have not even at present the ability to meet their existing engagements? It might nearly as well be expected, that a man who was already a bankrupt should prop and support his failing neighbor.

Sir, much has been recently said of the amount of specie in the United States. Theoretical men have made many and vague conjectures about it, for after all it must rest upon conjecture; some have estimated it at ten millions of dollars—some twelve, some twenty, and some newspaper scribblers at forty millions of dollars. Sir, I do not believe that for the last ten years the United States have at any time been more bare of specie than at the present moment. A few years since, specie flowed in upon us in abundance. This resulted principally from an operation of a very singular and peculiar nature. The Spanish Government, as it was then understood, agreed to pay to France a very large sum of money—many millions of dollars, the precise number I am unable to state, from her possessions in South America. France contracted with a celebrated English banking house, as was said at the time, with either the concurrence or connivance of the English Government, that this money should be obtained through the United States. These bankers, by their agent, contracted with certain American houses, principally I believe in Baltimore, for the importation of this specie from La Vera Cruz into the United States, from whence it was not transmitted in coin to Europe, but invested in adventures in the shipments of produce, the proceeds of which ultimately go into the hands of these bankers in London, or of their friends on the Continent, from whom it was finally realized by the French Government, either by drafts from Paris, or remittances to that city. This operation had a trebly favorable effect on the United States—it made fortunes for some of the merchants, it furnished the means of shipments to Europe, and it also provided the funds for adventures to the East Indies and to China. But this contract has now been finished some years; and since that time there has been a constant drain of specie from the country. Where it is in future to be procured from, I know not. Not from South America. Specie is, I believe, protected from exportation there, except to Spain. From Spain we cannot get it—to a great part of what was Spain we have now scarcely any trade. From France it cannot be obtained, for if we can get there even by license, we are obliged to bring back her produce or manufactures. From England it cannot be imported—it is now made highly penal to attempt to send it out of the kingdom. With South America we have but little trade—hitherto we furnished them with smuggled or licensed European and India goods; but now the markets are flooded with these goods, by importations direct from England, and which have been attended with great loss to the shippers. For these reasons, it is difficult to find a vessel sailing from the United States to the Spanish ports in South America. These are among the reasons why the amount of specie now in the country is small, and has for some time past been gradually lessening. Sir, without indulging in vague conjectures, what are the best data we have to form an estimate of the amount of specie in the country? The Bank of the United States has five millions of dollars in its vaults. In Boston there are three State banks—in New York I believe four, Philadelphia four, and Baltimore eight—call these nineteen twenty, and allow on an average one hundred and fifty thousand dollars specie, which probably is as much as they generally possess, and this will make three millions of dollars; this amount, united to the sum in the vaults of the Bank of the United States, gives eight millions of dollars—to which, if you allow two millions of dollars for a loose circulation of specie, you get an aggregate of ten millions of dollars. We are sometimes told of the large sums of money hoarded in our country by individuals—probably there may be some among the German farmers in Pennsylvania—perhaps more in that State than in any other, or all the others in the Union; but still of no great amount—the reputation of a little money possessed in this way easily swells into a large sum. At any rate, let the amount be what it may, in time of distress and mistrust, it would afford no addition to your circulating medium; for it is precisely in times like these, that men who hoard money will lock it up most securely.

Sir, the circulation of our country is at present emphatically a paper circulation—very little specie passes in exchange between individuals—it is a circulation bottomed on bank paper and bank credits, amounting perhaps to fifty millions of dollars. And on what, sir, does this circulation rest? It rests upon the ten millions of dollars, if that be the amount of specie in the country, and upon public confidence.

The Bank of the United States has fifteen millions of dollars to collect—call it ten, sir—nobody will dispute this—no one will pretend that this bank is not solvent—the remnant of its surplus dividends, and the interest it will have earned, will be sufficient to cover its losses at New Orleans, at Washington, and perhaps elsewhere. In what are these ten millions of dollars to be collected? In bank bills, the credit of which is at least doubtful? No, sir, in specie; and when this is entirely withdrawn from the State banks, and the banks are unable to pay the money for their bills, who does not see that this confidence is instantly destroyed—that the bubble bursts—that floods of paper bills will be poured in upon them, which they will be unable to meet, and which will for a time be as worthless as oak leaves—that the banks themselves must, at least temporarily, become bankrupts, and that a prostration of credit, and all those habits of punctuality which, for twenty years, we have been striving so successfully to establish, will inevitably ensue, and, with them, also, there must be suspended the commerce, the industry and manufactures of the country; and a scene of embarrassment and derangement be produced, which has been unexampled in our history.

I will now make a very few remarks on the effects which the dissolution of the bank will have on the revenue and fiscal concerns of the country. Can it be supposed, sir, that the source to which will be imputed the distress that will have flowed from this event, will be the first to be thought of to be guarded against a participation of the evils that will result from it, in preference to the claims of the most intimate friends and connexions? No, sir, the bonds due to the United States will be collected only at the tail of an execution. But I mean not to press this consideration. Admit, for a moment, that they will all be equally well collected—that they will be paid as usual, although it is palpable that for a considerable time the merchants will be unable to find the means to pay them: Yet, admit, sir, that the money is collected in the State banks, how is it to be transmitted? It must come to the centre of the seat of Government; very little of the public money is expended in the Northern section of the Union. Will it come from the Eastward, in bills of the State banks? Penobscot bank bills sometimes will not pass in Boston; Boston bills pass with difficulty in New York or Philadelphia; and the bills of New York State banks probably would not be readily current in Washington. You must then, sir, if Boston gives you a revenue of two millions of dollars, transmit the greater part of it to the seat of Government, or wherever it may be wanted in specie. Can this be done? We have not two millions of dollars of specie in our town, and, I may almost venture to say, never had. Suppose you make this transmission once, can you do it a second time? No, sir, the thing is utterly impracticable. You must adopt some other mode. Exchange between the different cities will not reach the case; frequently it cannot be purchased even for an insignificant amount.

SENATE.

Sir, will your money, when collected, be safe in the State banks? Of this I am extremely doubtful. Solicitations will undoubtedly be made for it from all quarters. They have already been made. In one instance, I am told, sir, the agent of a bank, even during the few past weeks, has been here for the purpose—that suddenly the agent was gone, and in a few days it was discovered that, owing to the failure of one of the debtors to the bank which he represented, (a great broker,) the stock had fallen in one day near 20 per cent. What was this the evidence of, but that those who were most interested in this bank, the stockholders who were on the spot, and best acquainted with its solidity, were willing to wash their hands of their concern in it, at almost any rate of sacrifice? Sir, I only state this, as it was here reported. I have no personal knowledge on the subject. But will you trust your funds with an institution thus precarious, and whose solidity is distrusted even by its best friends?

By an account of the receipts and expenditures for the year 1810, laid on our tables, I find there has been passed to the credit of the United States, $390 received from the Lincoln and Kennebec Bank, in Massachusetts, as an interest on the public money while deposited at that bank. The history of this credit of interest, is, I presume, the following: The money was deposited at the bank for account of the United States; the bank used the money for its own accommodation, and, when called on for the amount, could not refund it. This allowance of interest is therefore for the time during which the bank could not pay the money. The amount in this instance is small, sir, and the United States have received a compensation for the use of the money. It proves, however, what has been done, and will be done again. Suppose it should be done on a large scale, and when the Government wants its funds, it cannot command them—interest on the amount will not pay the salaries of the officers of the nation—it will not feed your armies, nor support your navy—it must derange the whole system of the Government, and perhaps bring it to a stand still. I have no hesitation, sir, in declaring, that in my opinion if the collection and transmission of the public moneys be intrusted exclusively to the State banks, that at least great trouble, perplexity, and occasional defalcation, will ensue.

I shall now present, sir, to the Senate, the testimony which was offered to the committee by the two delegations from Philadelphia, the one selected from the master manufacturers and mechanics, and the other from the merchants of that city. It will go conclusively to show the effects which it is apprehended will issue from the cessation of the Bank of the United States in a city, the first perhaps in population and wealth in the Union, and the one least engaged of any of the great seaports, in proportion to its wealth, in foreign commerce.

The agents from the manufacturers and mechanics told their story in a plain, straightforward manner, each one narrating facts which affected himself, and came within the scope of his personal observations. The representatives of the merchants took a wider scope, and entered into general reasonings which would present themselves generally to the minds of others, and to the members of the Senate; this explanation is here made to account for the cause why the former testimony, which was very impressively given to the committee, will be stated in detail, and the latter be presented in a much more compressed and concise form.

Mr. Leiper, a respectable, wealthy, and extensive tobaccoist, and a proprietor also of some stone quarries, which furnish considerable building stone to the masons in Philadelphia, informed the committee, that he had been long and extensively engaged in a tobacco manufactory. He employs upwards of a hundred workmen, and the expenses of his business amount to about one hundred and sixty dollars a day; he believes that the dissolution of the Bank of the United States would produce a scene of distress in the seaports unprecedented in our country; that it would stop one-half of the master manufacturers and mechanics of the city; that already confidence was nearly destroyed; the debts due to manufacturers and mechanics were on open accounts, on which it was impossible to make collections to any amount of consequence; that the manufacturers and mechanics must, unless the state of things be altered, in a great measure stop their business and dismiss their workmen, and very many of them sacrifice their property, or lose their reputation and stop payment. Money, he said, could not be commanded a short time since, however good the security offered; he generally met his engagements easily; he had however shortly before leaving home occasion to remit to his correspondent at Richmond, where he was in the habit of having considerable quantities of tobacco purchased, fourteen hundred dollars; he had on hand, towards this sum, eight hundred dollars, and found considerable difficulty in procuring the remainder; it had however been done since he left home, and remitted, with directions, however, to the agent to make no more purchases, nor to enter into any new contracts for his account.

Mr. Leiper further stated, that the pressure for money which recently existed in Philadelphia, has, for the moment, been relieved, although scarcely any sales or purchases are making, except at greatly reduced and destructive rates to the seller. This relief had been obtained by the Bank of the United States agreeing to continue its full discounts to the 4th of March next; and from the State banks, calculating on the forbearance of the Bank of the United States, having liberally issued new paper. The Bank of Pennsylvania, of which Mr. Leiper has been for many years a director, recently let out in one week eighty thousand dollars of new money; but if the Bank of the United States is not continued, this momentary relief would only extend the evil, as it would enlarge the liabilities, and still further increase the pressure and distress, and want of money which must then arise.

Bank of the United States.

SENATE.

About seventeen years since, Mr. Leiper felt hurt at the conduct of the Bank of the United States in rejecting his paper; he left the bank and did his business elsewhere; since that time he had heard no complaints; he believed the concerns of the bank had been conducted fairly and liberally, and that discounts had been afforded to democrats as well as to federalists, to manufacturers and mechanics as well as the merchants.

Mr. Leiper, sir, has been a zealous and unwavering partisan of the persons now in power, since the adoption of the Federal Constitution, and his testimony will not probably be thought entitled to less weight on that account.

Mr. Grice, a respectable master ship carpenter, in large business, informed the committee that there are now building, in Philadelphia, 9,145 tons of shipping, a list of which he exhibited to the committee, a larger amount of tonnage than was ever before on the stocks in that city, and which, when finished, would cost about a million of dollars; that the whole of this shipping had been contracted for, except about one thousand tons; that the work was to be done and delivered in the course of the ensuing Spring; that there were employed in the city, in connexion with this business, about two thousand persons; that, owing to the apprehensions excited by the expected non-renewal of the charter of the Bank of the United States, great inconvenience had been already experienced by all classes of men in that city; that confidence was nearly destroyed; he could neither obtain money to pay his workmen or to carry on his business; that the former, unless a change took place, he must dismiss; that such had been the rapid growth of the navigation of the United States, it was difficult to procure good workmen, it was highly important to keep them in the country, and would be extremely disadvantageous to have them drawn out of it; that already, owing to the great increase of ship-building in Canada, agents were endeavoring to induce them to leave the United States for that country, where they could earn more money than at home. That if the bank were obliged to stop, the master ship-carpenters could neither borrow money nor collect their debts, and must, of necessity, dismiss their workmen, in which case very many of them would leave the United States, and probably never return. That he did not believe that more than two or three of the persons who had contracted for vessels, in the event of the dissolution of the bank, would be able to fulfil their contracts; that, in consequence, the vessels would be left on the hands of the builders, who, on their part, would be unable to meet their engagements; and that the vessels must finally be sold for the most that they would fetch, probably at half their value, to the great loss, and perhaps ruin of the builders.

He had been himself largely in business, and had dealt for many years with the Bank of the United States; he had ever been treated liberally and kindly by it; he viewed himself indebted in a considerable degree for his present standing in society, to the accommodations he had received at that bank; still, in the course of his business, he occasionally took notes, at three, four, or six months, which, having a longer time to run than that at which the bank discounted, of sixty days, he found it convenient to convert into money; this hitherto he could always readily do, by carrying the notes to a wealthy merchant for whom he sometimes did business, and who hitherto had always been willing to discount them for him at bank interest; that being cut off from his usual discounts at the bank, he recently endeavored to avail himself of this resource, but found it wholly shut against him; that the gentleman, whose funds had hitherto appeared inexhaustible, would now afford no relief; confidence was destroyed; he knew not who was safe; he would make no new discounts, were the answers he obtained instead of money.

Mr. Grice stated, that this out-of-door discounting had been of great service to the manufacturers and mechanics, as they could frequently get money from it, when they could not obtain discounts at the banks; he had reason to believe that the amount of money thus employed in the city, at the legal and advanced rates of interest, was not less than seven millions of dollars; that this resource was now wholly cut off; they who had money would not loan it at any rate, and kept it on hand, either to secure it, or to derive an exorbitant advantage from the necessities and sacrifices of others. Mr. Grice believed, that, with very few exceptions, all classes in Philadelphia were in favor of the renewal of the charter of the bank; without it, he believed great numbers of persons would be rendered bankrupts, and general distress, at least among the manufacturers and traders, would ensue.

Mr. Vogdes, a master house-carpenter, in extensive business, informed the committee there were at this time building about five hundred brick houses in Philadelphia, two-thirds of which belonged to the mechanics of the city, who, are in the habit of purchasing lots of land on credit, and who, with their own capitals, which in many instances are small, and by borrowing of the banks or of individuals, and buying materials on credit, are enabled to erect buildings, on the sale of which they depend for the means of meeting their engagements; that he himself at present owns buildings of this description, on the sale of which he had calculated, to the amount of one hundred and thirty thousand dollars. He employs one hundred workmen.

Mr. Vogdes stated that he had been in the habit of receiving a moderate accommodation at the bank; he had ever been well treated by the bank; the directors had recently reduced his notes, but not in so great a degree as the State banks had done; that the expected termination of the charter of the Bank of the United States had greatly incommoded him, and others probably more; it had nearly suspended all business among the manufacturers and mechanics; it had stopped all sales of real estate, which he does not believe could now be effected at so high a rate within thirty per cent. as the sales could have been made at some time since; he had himself engaged to sell two houses, one for ten thousand dollars, the contractors for which had fallen from their engagements, under one small pretence or another, but really, as he believes, from the change of times, and the difficulty there existed in procuring money to meet the engagements even of the most wealthy persons; he himself had a note of one of the most respectable and undoubted men in the city; he offered it at three banks, but could not obtain a discount on it, and was finally obliged, in order to meet his engagements and pay his workmen, to sell it at one-and-a-half per cent. per month discount; he knew a broker who had notes to the amount of half a million of dollars lying by him for sale, which were considered good, but which he could not discount at any rate; he had a mortgage which he was constrained to sell at eighteen per cent. for twelve months; and his son, to pay his workmen, was obliged to have his note discounted on the best terms at which it could be done, which were at two per cent per month.

Mr. Vogdes is concerned in some rolling and slitting mills, which work about five hundred tons of iron annually. The proprietors have now on hand about one hundred tons of manufactured iron; commonly it is very saleable—at present, owing to the causes that have been mentioned, there is no demand for it. It is usual for manufacturers of iron to lay in their stocks when the importations are largest, generally late in the Autumn; this, several of them have done. The price is usually from $108 to $120 per ton—it has, however, fallen, from the pressure of the times, to eighty-five dollars per ton. This difference the manufacturers must suffer, which, in addition to the want of sale for their manufactures, and the other disadvantages under which they labor, if relief be not speedily obtained, must ruin most of those who have not large capitals to enable them to sustain the shock.

He does not believe that political considerations enter at all into the direction of this bank. He has no knowledge of a well-founded complaint of any mechanic, democrat or federalist, not receiving a discount if entitled to it, and the circumstances of the bank would admit of it. He stated that this was no party question; that, with a very few exceptions, all classes in Philadelphia are in favor of the renewal of the charter of the bank. He is authorized to say, that the person who now has, and for the last twelve months has had, the largest accommodation at the bank, is one of the best known and most leading democrats in the city. If the charter be not renewed, it is his opinion, the most serious and general distress will be the consequence.

Mr. Ord, a respectable rope manufacturer, stated to the committee that he worked up annually in his manufactory about one hundred tons of hemp; that he seldom wanted discounts—when he did, he obtained them with facility from the Bank of the United States, where he had been always well treated, and the business of which, he believed, had been conducted fairly and liberally, without reference to any party or political views whatever. He had hitherto been able to carry on his business with ease. He had large debts out, but now all confidence was destroyed; he could collect nothing—nor could he, without receiving his debts or borrowing money to meet his engagements; and, if times did not change, he must stop his business and dismiss his workmen, as must most of the other manufacturers of cordage in the city; that, at present, all business was at a stand—no sales could be effected. Hemp, which, shortly since, was at $350 per ton, had fallen to $250, without finding a market. He had recently bought some at $200 per ton, which had sustained so small a degree of damage as to make it scarcely worth naming. Kentucky yarns were also unsaleable, although there were never so many ships on the stocks in Philadelphia, and the cordage for which must be principally manufactured from these yarns, which, but for the present state of things, would have risen rather than declined in price, as the vessels building would have been rigged in the ensuing Spring; that the cordage for them would have been wanted nearly at the same time, and could be made much sooner from yarns than from hemp, which would have given them the preference.

Mr. Ord fully concurs with the other gentlemen in the distress which would be produced in consequence of a dissolution of the charter of the bank.

Mr. Fœring, an intelligent and respectable currier of leather, informed the committee that he was in the habit of purchasing domestic and foreign hides to a large amount, which, after manufacturing, he sold to his customers in the interior, and to the boot and shoemakers in the city, generally on a credit of six months—which, however, frequently extended to twelve months before he received his money; he also ships considerable quantities of leather to other parts of the United States. There are about forty curriers in Philadelphia, and from two to three thousand persons, including those who work the leather, are dependent on this manufactory in the city; a considerable number of whom, he believes, (unless some relief is obtained) from the present scarcity of money, will be greatly distressed, and be dismissed from employment. He has kept his account principally with the Bank of the United States; has always been well treated, and has derived a great facility in his business, both to the North and South, by the bank collecting his debts for him, and passing the amount to his credit in Philadelphia, free of commission and the risk of remitting money. This, he believes, is generally done by the bank for the merchants, manufacturers, and mechanics, who may request it, and cannot be done by the State banks, because they have not branches in the different seaports of the United States, even if they had the disposition to do it. He has hitherto been able to command, with ease, as large an amount of money as his business required; at present, he cannot collect his debts, nor sell his stock, nor get discounts at the banks. Having failed to do it at the Bank of the United States he applied to a State bank, where he had made some deposits, but without success.

Mr. Fœring states that confidence is beginning to be impaired even in bank paper. He shortly since bought some hides of an opulent farmer, with whom he had dealt before, and who had always, without objection, received his payment in checks or bank bills; in the recent sale, he, however, declined at first to receive them—after some persuasion he did take them, but immediately went to the bank and demanded the money and took it home with him. Very many of the manufacturers and mechanics have accounts open with the Bank of the United States. He has found discounts more readily obtained there than at the State bank. When he left Philadelphia, he had no personal knowledge of any one director of the banks. He has heard no complaints for many years of the conduct of the bank, the affairs of which he believes to be liberally and honorably conducted. He believes the only consideration with them in discounting, is, whether the paper which is offered be good or bad, without reference to political principles or conduct of the party offering it.

Mr. Fœring asserts that, in Philadelphia, this is no party question; nearly all classes wish for a continuance of the bank. He does not believe there are a hundred master manufacturers and workmen in the city, who would not readily have signed the memorial had there been time for it. The subscription was very hastily filled up; for, although it contains the names of between five and six hundred master manufacturers and mechanics, and not one name of any other description, it would have included a large number of others. He carried round one of the memorials, and met with scarcely any one who refused to sign it. He does not believe one out of a hundred would object to it—it was not true that it was a party question—he was a democrat—the whole delegation were democrats; some of them were from the very focus of democracy, the Northern Liberties; and yet they were anxious the charter of the bank should be renewed; indeed, if it were not, or some other relief obtained, a great many of the mechanics and manufacturers must stop their business, dismiss their workmen, and some of them be ruined, as they could now neither by loans nor by collections get money enough to meet their engagements and pay their expenses. The journeymen and laborers have not yet felt the pressure, because they have been kept in employ, from the hope that business and confidence would be renewed, and money again become as plenty as it had been. Should this not be the case, the clamor and distress will then be heard and felt more universally and extensively.

This, sir, was the narration which was most impressively delivered to the committee. In the sentiments of the delegation there was no variance; all the members of it stated the anxiety and wish for the renewal of the charter, which pervaded nearly all ranks, in the city of Philadelphia. They united in the opinion that party considerations did not mingle with the question; that if the bank were permitted to run down, they should individually be great sufferers; that a scene of embarrassment and distress would overwhelm great numbers of the citizens; that the State banks could afford no relief, having already extended their discounts to the utmost limits of prudence, calculating on the renewal of the charter, or the forbearance of the Bank of the United States; if this were not obtained, the mischiefs they have described must be experienced, and the manufacturers and mechanics would fall the first sacrifices—for the merchants were in the habit, either by auction or otherwise, of selling their property for endorsed paper or collateral security, while the manufacturers and mechanics were left exposed on a single name, as it never was their usage to demand security, nor could they do it; were they to attempt it, they would give offence to their employers, and lose not only their present but all future business from them; and, of consequence, severely as the merchants would suffer by this unexampled stopping of business, the manufacturers and mechanics would feel it still more seriously, and numbers of them undoubtedly be ruined.

A delegation from the merchants of the city of Philadelphia, composed of very respectable men, and equally divided as regards an attachment to the two great political divisions in our country, were heard before the committee. They confirmed the representations that had been made as to the conduct of the bank—the absence of party influence from its management—the interest which was excited for its continuance—the stagnation of business, and the prostration of credit, and all habits of punctuality, which they believed would ensue from its dissolution. They also stated the serious loss it would occasion to the Government from the inability of the importers to pay their bonds, and their disbelief in the ability of the State banks to afford any permanent relief. These gentlemen gave it as their opinion that the more liberal these banks were now, the worse would be their situation when the Bank of the United States ceased its discounts; that if the affairs of that bank were speedily wound up, the State banks could not meet their engagements and pay for the notes they had in circulation, and that they must of course stop payment as well as the merchants; that in such a state of things, the depositors would withdraw their deposits instantly, and the bank notes which were in circulation would immediately return upon the banks, when they would be unable to pay them; that, already, a considerable degree of suspicion was beginning to prevail of the security of bank paper; that there had been recently brought to the Bank of North America notes which had been issued twenty years before, and were supposed to have been lost, but which distrust had again brought to light. That neither navigation nor merchandise, nor exchange, however unexceptionable, could now be disposed of, except at great sacrifices; that flour had fallen in price from eleven to seven and three-quarters of a dollar, or eight dollars a barrel; that the house to which one of the gentlemen belonged, one of the first in point of standing in the United States, had recently received orders for the shipment of thirty thousand barrels of flour, which, from the uncertainty of finding funds, or procuring purchasers for bills of exchange, as heretofore, lucrative as was the commission, they had declined to execute. That it was the belief of these gentlemen that the dissolution of the bank and the collection of its capital at so unfortunate a period as the present, when so much property was otherwise absorbed and sequestered abroad, would be attended with extremely injurious consequences to the commercial, agricultural, and manufacturing interests, and to the revenue and prosperity of the country.

Sir, I shall neither trespass further upon your time, nor weaken this testimony by any comments of mine. I have now only to ask the indulgence of the Senate while I trouble them with a few additional observations, and those chiefly of a personal nature. Most certainly, sir, I am not acting under the bias of any sinister influence, or partiality, in advocating the renewal of the charter of this bank. I do not own a share of the stock, nor have I owned one for a considerable time past, nor do I owe to the institution a dollar. A few years since I was in the direction of one of its branches—the Bank in Boston—and I was left out of it with very little ceremony; not because I had abused the confidence reposed in me, for at the time I was left out of the direction I did not owe to the bank a single cent, either on my own account, or as surety for another, and my accommodation at the bank had never been large. I was then young, and possessed of but little property, and to enable me to exercise an independence of action, which I hope ever to preserve, I thought it proper to abstain in a considerable degree from accommodations to myself, in order that I might be enabled, if necessary, more freely to check undue accommodations to others. Still, sir, this was a conduct towards me not calculated to produce any peculiar partiality for the institution. It is true I was subsequently offered, from a source which I respected, a seat again at the Board of Directors, with the understanding that I should retain it as long as I pleased. This I declined, and should ever have declined it. Although from these circumstances it cannot be expected that I should feel any particular regard for the bank, yet still I am bound to say I feel no hostility towards it. I believe it has been an extremely useful institution; and from a personal knowledge of the management of the affairs of the Branch Bank at Boston, I freely declare, that in my opinion it is impossible for the concerns of any moneyed institution to be conducted with more correctness, integrity, and impartiality—with more discretion towards the public, or greater safety towards the corporation which created it. I know the directors. They are honorable and estimable men—and at the head of the bank is a gentleman, an Essex junto man perhaps he may be called, who would grace any station in any country.

Sir, I have received from the most numerous branch of the Legislature of Massachusetts a request that I would oppose the renewal of the charter of this bank. I receive the request, sir, with all the deference and respect which is due from me to an expression of the opinion of that honorable body. It has induced me to examine my sentiments, to reweigh and deliberately reflect upon them. Having done this, and having come into office, without an intimation of a wish on my part for public life—without a single stipulation as to my political opinions, or an indication of the course I should pursue, I can only say, I should not act, on a question in which I considered the public interests as implicated, in opposition to the convictions of my own mind, deliberately formed, in consequence of the request, or if you please instruction, of the entire Legislature of the State which I have in part the honor to represent, much as I am bound both by duty and inclination to respect it, nor in consequence of the request or instruction of all the congregated legislatures on earth. I believe the renewal of the charter of the bank will avert many evils, and I shall vote for it.

It will probably be said, sir, that the distresses which will be incident on the dissolution of the bank have been greatly exaggerated, that a city in this vicinity is ready to meet the consequences, and to set them at defiance. Let it be recollected, that in the five New England States, a country for which it is both my pride and pleasure to avow a marked partiality, we have but one branch of the Bank of the United States, and that with a capital of only $700,000. Surely, then, if a single city, with a population of thirty or forty thousand persons, can meet these consequences, we can sustain them—but we shall undoubtedly suffer much inconvenience, not however so great a degree of it, as any other district on the seaboard of the United States.

It is possible, sir, that apprehension may have magnified the evils which are to flow from the dissolution of the bank—it is possible, in this untried state of things, there may be found a power of expansion in the moneyed market of the country, which will be equal, or nearly equal, to the unexpected demand that may be made upon it. Should this be the result, I should be extremely gratified to have been mistaken. I should rejoice in my own disappointment.

When Mr. LLOYD had concluded his speech the Senate adjourned to to-morrow morning.

Proceedings.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, February 13.

The credentials of NICHOLAS GILMAN, appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the State of New Hampshire, for the term of six years, commencing on the 4th day of March next, were read, and ordered to lie on file.

Mr. BRADLEY, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 21st January, the petition of Moses Austin and John R. Jones, made report.

Whereupon, the further consideration of the petition was postponed to the next session of Congress.

Mr. WORTHINGTON, from the committee to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act providing for the sale of a tract of land lying in the State of Tennessee, and a tract in the Indiana Territory, reported it without amendment.

Mr. W., from the committee to whom was referred the bill to extend the right of suffrage in the Indiana Territory, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of Government for the year eighteen hundred and eleven;" and the bill having been amended, the President reported it to the House accordingly. And on the question, Shall this bill be read a third time as amended? it was determined in the affirmative.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed the bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act making a further distribution of such laws of the United States as respect the public lands," with amendments; in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate. They have passed a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Peter Audrain;" also, a bill, entitled "An act establishing navy hospitals;" in which bills they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The two bills last brought up for concurrence were read, and passed to the second reading.

The President communicated a letter from Robert Beverly, stating that he had resigned his appointment to the office of President of the Union Bank of Georgetown; and the letter was read, and referred to the committee to whom was recommended the bill to incorporate the Union Bank of Georgetown.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to establish the districts of Memphremagog, of Oswegatchie, and of the White Mountains. On the question, Shall this bill be engrossed and read a third time? it was determined in the affirmative.

Mr. GILMAN, from the committee appointed to consider the subject, made report. Whereupon, Ordered, That the Secretary of the Senate be directed to pay sixty-five dollars, out of the contingent fund of the Senate, for defraying the expense of opening a new passage to the gallery on the west side of the Senate Chamber.

Mr. WORTHINGTON, from the committee appointed the 4th instant to consider the subject, reported a bill in addition to the act to regulate the laying out and making a road from Cumberland, in the State of Maryland, to the State of Ohio; and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill respecting the Bank of the United States.

Mr. ANDERSON spoke in support of his motion to strike out the first section of the bill.

When he concluded, Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, remarking on the lateness of the hour, &c., and the probability that any gentleman wishing to speak could scarcely get through his remarks by the usual period of adjournment, moved a postponement of the subject till to-morrow, and to make it the order of the day for that day.—Carried—13 to 11.

THURSDAY, February 14.

Mr. CUTTS, from the committee, reported correctly engrossed the amendments to the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of Government for the year 1811;" and the bill was read the third time as amended, and passed.

Resolved, That this bill pass with amendments.

Mr. CUTTS, from the committee, also reported correctly engrossed the bill to establish the districts of Memphremagog, of Oswegatchie, and of the White Mountains; and the bill was read the third time, and passed.

The bill in addition to the "Act to regulate the laying out and making a road from Cumberland, in the State of Maryland, to the State of Ohio;" was read the second time.

The bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Peter Audrain," was read the second time, and Messrs. BRADLEY, GERMAN, and WORTHINGTON, were appointed the committee.

The bill, entitled "An act establishing navy hospitals," was read the second time, and referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon; and Messrs. GREGG, LLOYD, and GOODRICH, were appointed the committee.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill, entitled "An act making a further distribution of such laws of the United States as respect the public lands," and concurred therein.

Mr. BRENT, from the committee to whom were referred the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill, entitled "An act to incorporate the Union Bank of Georgetown," reported them without amendment; and on motion, by Mr. BRENT, that the bill and amendments be postponed indefinitely, it was determined in the negative—yeas 5, nays 22, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bradley, Brent, Clay, Lambert, and Whiteside.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Champlin, Condit, Crawford, Franklin, Gaillard, German, Giles, Goodrich, Gregg, Horsey, Leib, Lloyd, Mathewson, Pickering, Reed, Smith of Maryland, Smith of New York, Tajit, Taylor, Turner, and Worthington.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the amendments to the bill last mentioned, and concurred therein.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate, that the House concur in the second amendment of the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act providing for the removal of the land office established at Nashville, in the State of Tennessee, and Canton, in the State of Ohio; and to authorize the register and receiver of public moneys to superintend the public sales of land in the district east of Pearl river, and disagree to the other amendments. They have passed a bill, entitled "An act authorizing the Secretary of State to cause a general index to the laws of the United States to be made, printed, and distributed;" also, a bill, entitled "An act for establishing trading-houses with the Indian tribes;" in which bills they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to amend and continue in force an act, entitled "An act to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States," passed on the 25th of February 1791.

The question being to strike out the first section—

Mr. GILES.—Mr. President: It is with great reluctance that I find myself compelled to enter into the discussion of the subject now under the consideration of the Senate, but the observations which fell from the honorable gentleman from Georgia (Mr. CRAWFORD) were of such a character as to impose on me an irresistible obligation to present that view of the subject which has resulted from the best reflections I have been enabled to bestow on it. This obligation arises from the very high respect I entertain for the Legislature of the State I have the honor to represent, the great respect I feel for the gentleman who made the observations, as well as from the respect which is manifestly due to myself. In executing this unpleasant task, I labor under circumstances of peculiar embarrassment. This embarrassment arises from a conviction that the views of the subject now proposed to be exhibited will disappoint the expectations both of the opposers and the favorers of the bill, and that they will not be acceptable to either. I shall not, however, in this instance, depart from my invariable habit, when urged by duty to participate in debate before this honorable body, of disclosing in the most undisguised manner my real opinions upon the whole subject, free of any consideration of political difficulties or inconveniences which may consequently affect myself.

In the first place, I find myself called upon to oppose a law, on Constitutional grounds, which has been in existence for nearly twenty years, and during that period, I am compelled to admit, has been acquiesced in by the several State governments, as well as by the General Government, and its republican administrations. It is peculiarly irksome to me to question the constitutionality of a law which has been thus and so long acquiesced in, because it tends to give the character of instability to the laws generally, and in my judgment, tends, also, to impair the sacred character of the laws, and, of course, to lessen their efficacy. In a Government like ours, where the laudable boast of every citizen is that he lives under a government of laws, and not of men, no subject should be touched with more caution and delicacy than one which questions the validity of the laws, lessens the confidence of the citizens in them, or impairs the obligation of obedience to them. Yet, sir, the course of observations I propose to make may have some of these tendencies, which I should extremely regret, and this apprehension, of course, produces embarrassment. Connected with this idea is another circumstance of embarrassment. I cannot help observing the inordinate zeal manifested by the opposers of this bill, evidently resulting from a belief that its rejection will lessen the powers of the Federal Government. Although it may be properly directed in the present instance, yet I think I have seen, and fear I may hereafter see the same spirit directed against some of the powers and proceedings of the Government which I have deemed indispensable to its own preservation, and its beneficial efficacy towards the people. It may, perhaps, be thought by some not becoming in me to say that I have not been an inattentive observer of the progress of this Government for twenty years, and more particularly, since the Republican party came into power. Some of the scenes through which I have passed, have produced an impressive influence on my mind. Such is the nature of the Government that its administration will vibrate from one principle to another, and it will always require great wisdom to keep its oscillations from wandering too far. Whilst those who preceded us in power endeavored to legislate into the Constitution an unnecessary constructive energy, leading to what has been called consolidation, it appears to me that we have taken too much the opposite course, leading to disunion and dissolution, by depriving it constructively of its legitimate, necessary, and proper powers. If this course should be unfortunately persevered in, it requires no spirit of prophecy to foresee that the Government will fall to pieces from the want of due energy in the administration of its legitimate powers, or that some extraordinary means must be resorted to for its resuscitation. When we cast our eyes abroad, and see the aggressions committed on our rights by all the belligerents, &c.; when we reflect that we cannot calculate upon a perpetual exemption from wars and other political calamities, the common lot of all nations; when we look at home and see the State Governments interfering with and controlling the proceedings of the General Government, even in relation to measures directed towards these aggressing belligerents; when we look around us at home and see every where the inveterate struggles amongst political partisans for political power; when we recollect the number of choice spirits amongst us not content with the dull pursuits of civil life; when we look at our extensive defenceless frontier, almost without limits, and see almost every year ambitious, enterprising individuals with hostile arms in their hands, raised in defiance of the authority of the United States, &c., &c., it appears to me wonderful that gentlemen should be delighted with curtailing the Constitutional powers of the Government and enfeebling its necessary energies. It is the more wonderful when we see the same gentlemen, who seem to consider every curtailment of power as an individual triumph to themselves, the most clamorous against the Government for not taking a manly attitude in repelling foreign aggressions, &c., &c. It appears to me, sir, we often see the same gentlemen, with the best and most patriotic intentions, indulging in these irreconcilable opinions. This is not the first time I have endeavored in a solemn and impressive manner to present this subject to the view of the party now in power. Hitherto my efforts have been unavailing.

Let me now indulge a hope that these reflections will meet with due consideration from those now entrusted by the people with the management of their dearest interests. If inducements to these observations were called for, surely, sufficient could be found during the Republican Administrations. I need only call your attention, sir, to the lessons afforded in the inefficacy of our measures to repel foreign aggressions, to assert our rights, and do ourselves justice, &c., and the causes which have led to this inactivity and feebleness of the Government. They will not be found in any defect of powers in the Constitution, because in that respect they are unlimited; it is because gentlemen, from various weak and groundless alarms and apprehensions, have been unwilling to exert the legitimate energies of the Constitution for those great objects. They have theorized and criticized themselves into such fears of the undue exercise of power, that they will not duly exercise it when indispensably necessary to the national character and interests. It is not my wish to extend the powers of the Constitution beyond the fair and candid interpretation of its meaning, because that, in my judgment, will be sufficient for all salutary purposes. I only regret the unwillingness of gentlemen to act up to that point, and the probable consequences resulting from that indisposition. I have, also, to unite with the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. CRAWFORD) in expressing my regret that in discussing this subject, both within and without the walls of Congress, and particularly in various Republican newspapers, an unwise spirit and zeal should have been manifested, which, being more repulsive than persuasive, have, I verily believe, tended to defeat their own object, and to put at hazard the rejection of the bill. Why, on this subject particularly, should we witness such a display of intolerance and denunciation? Why the illiberal assertion of improper motives to the Republican members who support the bill? Can any good result to the nation, to the Republican party, or to the favored side of the question, by this course of conduct?

May it not produce an injurious influence on all? The subject certainly presents fair grounds for a difference of opinion amongst individuals; and even amongst Republicans, without searching for the causes of this difference in corrupt motives. Why, then, upon this particular occasion, should the free exercise of opinion be hunted down by a spirit of intolerance or denunciation? It was this spirit which, more than any other cause, blasted the hopes of the republican principles in France, and, if indulged in to excess, will destroy it in any other country upon earth. In the due administration of a republican Government, truth and right alone ought to be sought after, and they can only be found by leaving the mind free to investigation, by guarantying to all its faculties the most perfect exemption from all terror and alarm. I hesitate not to say that, in my judgment, this spirit, if indulged in, will become more dangerous to the due administration of this Government, more deleterious to its proceedings, than the adoption of any one single measure, however unwise or impolitic—even than the renewal of the charter of the Bank of the United States for twenty years, which now seems to be the cause, or the pretext for exciting and stimulating this unfortunate spirit. I am ready to admit, too, that I have never seen this spirit displayed with more positive assertion and bold denunciation upon any question than upon the present. This circumstance induced the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. CRAWFORD) to indulge himself in severe and most sensitive invectives upon this topic, and, in my judgment, not without cause. But it would have afforded me great pleasure, if the gentleman could have prevailed on himself to have viewed these proceedings “in the calm light of mild philosophy,” and not to have presented to the Senate an example in himself, in appearance at least, of the passions and prejudices he so justly reprehended in others. I think I do not mistake myself, Mr. President, when I profess to enjoy the most entire exemption from this baneful spirit of intolerance—when I profess to feel the greatest respect for the gentlemen who differ from me on this occasion, and for their motives, when I profess to express all possible indulgence and forbearance towards the opinions of those gentlemen, and feel, at the same time, conscious that I shall stand in need of the same liberality myself, from both sides of the question. Indeed, sir, I would not deign to accept a victory in argument, founded solely upon the ascription of improper motives to my antagonist. It is my intention to give the arguments of the gentlemen on the other side of the question the most impartial and attentive consideration. I know the gentlemen are personally entitled to it, and their observations merit it.

The honorable gentleman from Georgia, (Mr. CRAWFORD,) who reported this bill, as the chairman of the committee, to whom the subject was generally referred, excited not a little surprise in my mind by the prefatory remarks which fell from him in support of it. The gentleman prefaced his arguments by observing, “that it had latterly become the fashion to eulogize the Constitution of the United States; and that whenever he heard lavish encomiums applied to it, he could not help apprehending mischief." I acknowledge I could not comprehend the bearing of this remark upon the question under discussion. I, sir, have long been in the habit of venerating the Constitution, and have often expressed my admiration at the wisdom of its provisions; and I really had hoped that I might have been indulged in these sentiments and prepossessions, and even the expression of them upon proper occasions, without exciting in the mind of any gentleman apprehensions of mischief; nor can I divine what species of mischief the gentleman apprehends from that cause. Mr. President, when we look over the whole world known to us; when we particularly cast our eyes over that part of it, with which we have the most intimate relations; when we see the rapid strides which despotism is making over the whole human race; when we observe the various and powerful means now in use to rivet its immovable dominion upon mankind; when we reflect that the Constitution of the United States now affords the only practical experiment upon the republican principle, and the only and last hope for the preservation and extension of the liberties of man; is it wonderful or alarming, that we should feel and express some partiality and even veneration for an instrument of so peculiar a character? or should even endeavor to teach others to venerate, to cherish, to support it? An instrument, whose provisions at least exempt us from the general scene of despotism, and may eventually extend their blessings to the whole human race? Or if, in dwelling upon the wisdom and importance of its provisions, we might pass over some possible defects without scrutinizing them with an hypercritical eye, might not the omission be indulged without producing animadversion or censure? Sir, we all venerate the republican principle. I know the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. CRAWFORD) does; nor do I pretend that my devotion to it is greater than his; but, sir, I have given the greatest attention to the observations of the gentleman upon the Constitution; and I can now say that my veneration for the instrument, and admiration at the wisdom of its provisions, are not at all impaired nor diminished, notwithstanding the gentleman's criticisms, &c. I will now, Mr. President, endeavor to exhibit the general character of the Constitution; to point out the mode for its correct interpretation, and apply it to the subject now under consideration. In doing so, I propose to follow the course of observations made by the honorable chairman of the committee who reported the bill.

The gentleman proceeded to remark, that in taking a review of the Constitution he found general as well as incidental powers enumerated therein. I did not see the precise application the gentleman intended to make of this remark, but I have been induced to review the Constitution in reference to this subject, and it does appear to me, that the classification and definition of powers is as well arranged as human wisdom could devise. I know that nothing is perfect which is the work of man; that no language is capable of perfect definition. But, as far as definition can be drawn from language, I conceive the Constitution exhibits as perfect an example as is in existence. In the next place, the gentleman remarked that there was a number of cases in which Congress had departed from the particular enumerated powers in the Constitution, and had resorted to implication or construction for the derivation of its powers. The remark is perfectly correct, and I am very ready to admit that there is no such thing as carrying into effect enumerated powers in any instrument whatever, without the intervention of certain derivative and implied powers. But if the gentleman had succeeded in showing that there had been aberrations by the Congress of the United States from the enumerated powers of the Constitution, would he think it correct to use those aberrations as precedents for still further aberrations? Ought they not rather to be considered as mementoes on the part of Congress to induce them to tread with more care, and, if they find that their former errors could not be supported by a fair and candid construction of the Constitution, to restrain the laws within its wholesome provisions? Certainly that is the use to which the history of errors presented by the honorable gentleman from Georgia ought to be applied. But, before I proceed to examine the subject with more accuracy, I cannot avoid to express my surprise at another observation which fell from the gentleman. The gentleman observed, that the argument drawn from the distinction between ends and means was "incomprehensible;" and he went so far as to call it "nonsensical jargon." It is not only comprehensible to me, sir, as I conceive, but, in my opinion, is the only way in which a just construction of the Constitution is to be attained. This results from the peculiar nature and organization of the instrument. Permit me here to endeavor to illustrate my idea by a reference to the Constitution itself. The Constitution is an instrument which grew out of the situation of the United States at the time of, and preceding its adoption; and to show that the Constitution recited the great objects of its formation, and then prescribed the means for carrying them into effect, I beg leave to refer to a part of the instrument itself. The preamble, like all other preambles, was designed to express the objects of the instrument or the ends to be effected by its provisions. "We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity; do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America." What is the plain language of this preamble? The answer is obvious. That certain great ends or objects are here proposed to be effected. In what mode, or by what means are they to be effected? The preamble tells you, sir, "by establishing this Constitution for the United States of America." That is the mode in which these great ends are proposed to be effected, and the body of the instrument prescribes the means, which were deemed necessary and proper to the effectuation of these ends. This subject will be better understood by throwing the mind back to the period of time when this Constitution originated, and reviewing the peculiar political situation of the United States then, and for some time antecedently thereto.

At the time, and antecedently to the establishment of the present Constitution, the existing State governments were in possession of all the powers of sovereignty, subject only to feeble and inefficient articles of confederation, without the means of executing their own will, and resting for its execution solely on requisitions upon the respective States, which might either comply or refuse to comply with such requisitions at their discretion. A non-compliance was almost invariably the result of State deliberations, and hence the feebleness of the old Confederation. The present Constitution was adopted as the remedy for this great and alarming evil. Without it, disunion and ruin to the States would have been the inevitable consequence, because, upon actual experiment, the States were found utterly incompetent to the due administration of all the powers of sovereignty intrusted to their management. The reason of this incompetency was, that some of the most important powers of sovereignty inherently possessed a geographical influence beyond the geographical limits of the several States individually, and their jurisdiction could not transcend their geographical limits. Of this description of powers is the power to declare war, &c., to regulate commerce, &c., and all the other enumerated powers of the Constitution. In consequence of the conflicting systems adopted by the several States in relation to some of these powers, which were then in practical operation; particularly in the conflicting regulations of commerce, the States were getting into the most serious collisions, &c. The formidable evils necessarily growing out of the state of things required a formidable and competent remedy. The great subject for the contemplation of every reflecting mind in America was, what that remedy should be? The wise framers of our admirable Constitution, after great deliberation, conceived and executed the only practicable expedient. It consisted in separating the powers of sovereignty; in establishing a General Government, and conferring on it all the powers of sovereignty whose geographical influence was found co-extensive with the geographical limits of the United States, and reserving to the State governments respectively those powers which were of a mere local character, and which possessed no influence beyond the limits of the States respectively. And also to confer on the General Government "all the means necessary and proper" for executing its own laws in relation to these enumerated powers, without any dependence upon requisitions from the respective State governments for this indispensable object. The idea was a grand one, and executed with an admirable simplicity, and the most consummate wisdom. Hence it appears that the great object of the framers of the Constitution was to establish a General or Federal Government, and to confer on it all the powers of sovereignty, which in their nature and character possessed an influence co-extensive with the United States, and to reserve to the previously existing State governments all the powers of sovereignty of a more local character, and whose influence did not extend beyond the geographical limits of the States respectively, and therefore could be rendered completely subservient to State jurisdiction and management. These are the means prescribed in the Constitution for effecting the ends expressed in the preamble. To the administrators of the General Government the framers of the Constitution have said: We give to you all the powers of sovereignty of a general character; and to the administrators of the State governments, they have said: We reserve to you all the powers of sovereignty of a local character. I verily believe, that if those various Governments should be administered with the wisdom with which this separation of powers was made in the body of the Constitution, the people of the United States will not be disappointed in the great and interesting objects proclaimed in its preamble. But I cannot help expressing some apprehensions, that from an incorrect understanding of the Constitution, from an unwise spirit of jealousy, a disposition to strip the Government of its necessary and proper energies, &c., the administrators of the Government may not only disappoint the just expectations of the people in this respect, but may lead to incalculable political mischiefs and disasters. This arrangement was in my judgment indispensable to the preservation of the republican principle, and all-important to the dearest interests of the people of the United States. As far as the practical experiment has been carried, it has been attended with the happiest effects. I still hope for the best in its future operations; but I also hope I shall be pardoned for expressing some fears, arising from various manifestations of imbecility in measures relating to our internal as well as external concerns. From this short history of the origin of the Constitution, and the causes which produced it, it evidently appears, that the General or Federal Government is in its nature and character a Government of enumerated powers, taken from previously existing State governments, enumerated and conferred on it, reserving all unenumerated powers to the State governments, or to the people in their individual capacities. But if any doubts had existed upon this subject, two amendments to the Constitution, growing out of some jealousies lest a contrary interpretation should be given to the Constitution, have been adopted, which ought to put this question to rest forever. 10th articles of amendments to the Constitution are as follow :

"The enumeration in the Constitution of certain rights shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people." "The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people." Now, sir, can language be more explicit than this, in declaring that this charter contains certain enumerated powers, and that all not enumerated are reserved to the States or to the people? There is one article reserving rights to the people, and afterwards another article reserving them to the States and to the people. While on this subject, I beg leave to read a clause in the Constitution, which I find among the enumerated powers, and which has been construed by some, as intended to convey a general grant of powers among the enumerated powers. "Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States." The words "and to provide for the common defence and general welfare," have by some been considered as conveying a general grant of power. Nothing is necessary to show that this is not a fair and correct construction of the Constitution, but reading it with attention. These terms contain no grant of power whatever, but are used to express the ends or objects for which particular grants of power were given. Paying the debts and providing for the common defence and general welfare are great objects, intimately connected with the particular grants of power which are given for their effectuation; and without these particular grants of power, it would not have been possible for Congress to effect them. The framers of the Constitution have simply selected some of the objects expressed in the preamble, and declared that to effect them, and to pay the debts of the United States, were the considerations which induced them to give to Congress the "power to lay and collect taxes," &c. Thus taxes are to be laid, &c. "to pay the debts, and to provide for the common defence and general welfare." Could they have chosen a more appropriate phraseology? The plain language to Congress is: "You shall have power to lay and collect taxes, to pay the debts," &c., and to provide for the common defence and general welfare, or, in other words, for the purpose of paying the debts, &c., and of providing for the common defence and general welfare. These words do not contain a general grant of powers, but express the objects of a particular grant of powers. The framers of the Constitution could not have done an act so absurd as to make a general grant of powers, among an enumeration of specified powers.

I will now, Mr. President, proceed to examine those instances which the gentleman has presented of the supposed aberrations of the Congress of the United States from the enumerated powers, and I think it will not be difficult to show that there is not a single instance quoted, but which is deducible from a fair and correct interpretation of the express words of the Constitution, giving them their common and appropriate meaning.

The first instance presented to our consideration by the honorable gentleman from Georgia (Mr. CRAWFORD) of the exercise of a power by Congress not enumerated in the Constitution, was the erection of light-houses. The gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. LLOYD,) to whose dispassionate observations I listened with great pleasure, superadded the instance of the erection of custom-houses. On these, both of the gentlemen seemed to place great reliance, as cases in point with the one under consideration. Both these powers I conceive are given to Congress by the express words of the Constitution; but if I should be mistaken in this idea, they are certainly comprehended as incidental and subservient to, or in other words, "necessary and proper" for carrying into effect some of the enumerated powers.

The express words of the Constitution give to Congress the power "to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises," &c.; "to regulate commerce with foreign nations among the several States, and with the Indian tribes;" "to exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatever, &c., over all places purchased by consent of the Legislature of the State in which the same shall be, for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dock-yards, and other needful buildings." From these clauses of the Constitution, taken in connexion with each other, I think Congress possesses the power to erect light-houses and custom-houses by the express words of the Constitution; for both of these descriptions of houses must necessarily be included within the term "needful buildings," or the only construction which is at all applicable to these cases is, that needful buildings is the general term, and light-houses and custom-houses are particular instances or examples under the general term; or, if I may be so allowed to express my ideas, needful buildings may be considered as the genus, of which light-houses and custom-houses are particular species. The reason with the framers of the Constitution for using this general term is obvious. It was, because it was impossible for them to foresee all the particular species of needful buildings, which might become necessary to the salutary operations of this Government in the course of its complicated and due administration; they therefore wisely left that subject to the discussion of Congress, restrained and limited, nevertheless, by the requisition of the consent of the Legislatures of the States respectively, in every case proposed for the exercise of this discretion. That this is a plain and correct interpretation of the Constitution is evinced by the concurrent opinions of every Legislature of every State, which has heretofore ceded lands for any of these objects; and it is to be remarked, that Congress has never attempted to erect any of these buildings without the Constitutional requisition of the consent of the States respectively. But if this term "needful buildings" had not been expressed in the Constitution, I should not hesitate to admit with these gentlemen that the erection of light-houses and custom-houses might properly be deduced from the power to lay and collect taxes, duties, &c., which are particular grants of power enumerated in the Constitution. Because custom-houses are appropriately necessary to the collection of duties, and have always been deemed indispensable for that object, as are light-houses to the due regulation of commerce.

These two powers are indispensably connected with, and subservient to, particular enumerated powers, and are therefore among the means which are necessary and proper for their effectuation; and as such are given to Congress by the express words of the Constitution, which are: Congress shall have power "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof." From this course of interpretation, the gentlemen, reasoning from a supposed analogy, have asked, if Congress can derive the right to erect light-houses and custom-houses from their necessary agency in effectuating the particular powers to which they are said to be appendant or appurtenant, why may it not in the same way derive the right of granting charters of incorporation for the same objects? Or, in other words, if Congress can constitutionally erect custom-houses for the purpose, or as the necessary means of collecting duties; why may it not establish a bank for the same object, &c.? The question is admitted to be a fair one; and if a clear distinction cannot be made in the two cases, it will be admitted either that Congress may constitutionally establish a bank, or that it has heretofore transcended its powers in erecting custom-houses, &c. A clear and most obvious distinction appears to me to exist in the cases suggested by the gentlemen to be analogous, arising from the striking difference in the nature and essential character of these powers. A custom-house is in its nature incidental and subservient to the collection of duties. It is one of the common, necessary, and proper means to effect that end. It is believed that in no commercial country in the world are duties collected without them. Besides, the erection of custom-houses does not involve in it the exercise of any other higher or consequential powers. The same remarks will apply to light-houses, as among the common, necessary, and proper means for the regulation of commerce, &c.

Is the incorporation of a bank of this character? It is not among the common, necessary, and proper means of effecting either of the foregoing enumerated powers, nor of any other enumerated in the Constitution; still less is it incidental or subservient to any of the enumerated powers. It wants that connexion, affiliation, and subserviency, to some enumerated power, which are clearly pointed out in relation to the two powers, to which it has been said to be analogous. Besides, does granting a charter of incorporation to a bank involve no other higher or consequential power than merely erecting a needful building for collecting duties, &c.? It certainly does. It involves the power to grant charters of incorporation generally; and in this respect, principally, its character is essentially different from both of the powers cited by the gentleman. The power to grant charters of incorporation is not an incidental, subordinate, subservient power; it is a distinct, original, substantive power. It is also susceptible of the clearest definition; and not being among the enumerated powers, it seems to me that Congress can have no fair claim to its exercise in any case. If Congress had been expressly authorized to grant charters of incorporation generally, then granting a charter of incorporation to a bank would have been an instance, or among the means, of carrying into effect that enumerated power, and would have been as much connected and affiliated with it as is the erection of custom-houses with the collection of duties; but the power to grant charters of incorporation generally not being expressly given in the Constitution, no particular instance involving the exercise of that power can be inferred by a fair and candid interpretation of the instrument. I do not mean to exaggerate the consequences which might result from an assumption of the power to grant charters of incorporation, &c. It is sufficient for me to say that it is a power of primary importance; that it involves as many incidental powers in its exercise as any one of the enumerated powers; that it is equal, if not paramount, to any; and, therefore, in my judgment, cannot be assumed by fair construction as incidental and subservient to any; and, of course, not as among the necessary and proper means for carrying any into effect. In fact, in its nature it does not in the smallest degree partake of the derivative, incidental character. It is original, substantive, distinct in itself, and susceptible of the plainest definition. Hence, whilst I am willing to admit that a power, which is in its nature incidental and subservient to any enumerated power, and also among the necessary and proper means for carrying it into effect, may be exercised by Congress without the express words of the Constitution, I should be very unwilling to admit that Congress should also exercise a power neither incidental or subservient to any of the enumerated powers, nor among the necessary and proper means for carrying any into effect; still less should I be inclined to this admission, when the power thus proposed to be derived, incidentally or constructively, involves in it the exercise of almost unlimited powers. To illustrate my idea still further in this respect, I would observe, that the power to regulate descents, and to regulate the distribution of intestates, I conceive to be original, distinct, substantive powers; and, being among the powers which could in all respects be limited by the geographical boundaries of the individual States; and were therefore among the powers reserved to the management of the States, might as easily be assumed by Congress as incidental to some one of the enumerated powers, as the assumption of the power to grant charters of incorporation, which I conceive was, for the same reason, left to the management of the States. I believe no gentleman will contend that Congress can, under any candid construction, go so far in relation to those powers; nor do I see how it can in relation to the power of granting charters of incorporation.

I have not overlooked the observation, sir, made by gentlemen to destroy the effect of this course of reasoning, to wit: that the passing every law is an act of sovereignty; that to pass a law to erect a light-house, is as much an act of sovereignty as to pass a law to lay and collect, &c., or to grant a charter to a bank, &c. In fact that there are no degrees of sovereignty. Without entering into this reasoning it will be sufficient to show its inapplicability to my argument to observe, that I have not grounded my distinctions upon any suggested difference in the degrees of sovereignty, but upon the clear and obvious difference in the nature and character of the powers upon which this sovereignty, &c., is intended to operate, &c.

The gentleman from Georgia (Mr. CRAWFORD) observed, that the clause in the Constitution, last read, "Congress shall have power to pass all laws which shall be necessary and proper," &c., had been considered by some as entirely inoperative, but that he thought it a clause of great importance, &c. In this opinion I entirely concur with the gentleman; I consider it the most important clause in the Constitution. It is in my judgment the true key for unlocking the meaning of all the other clauses. The former confederation did not possess the means necessary and proper for carrying into execution its own powers. It was dependent upon the State Legislatures for that purpose; and it was too important a difference in the organization of the present and former Government to be left to construction. It was therefore expressed, to declare the true character of the present Government, and to proclaim its sovereignty upon all the subjects of the enumerated powers. But, sir, the most important bearing of this clause appears to me to be the designation of the department, which should be the ultimate depository of all the power vested in the Government by the Constitution. Thus Congress is declared not only to have power to pass all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the powers particularly confided to its management, but "all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof." This clause, I think, intended to settle all differences between the departments respecting the ultimate deposit of power, in which light it has been hitherto too little regarded. None of these considerations, however, can vary in the smallest degree the results I have attempted to draw against the power of Congress to resort to unenumerated, original, substantive power, general in its character and operation, as the necessary and proper means for carrying into effect any of the enumerated powers.

This brings me to consider the observations of the gentleman (Mr. CRAWFORD) upon the fourth article of the Constitution in the following words:

"Full faith and credit shall be given in each State to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of every other State. And the Congress may, by general laws, prescribe the manner in which such acts, records, and proceedings, shall be proved, and the effect thereof.

"The citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States.

"A person charged in any State with treason, felony, or other crime, who shall flee from justice, and be found in another State, shall, on demand of the Executive authority of the State from which he fled, be delivered up, to be removed to the State having jurisdiction of the crime.

"No person held to service or labor in one State, under the laws thereof, escaping into another, shall, in consequence of any law or regulation therein, be discharged from such service or labor, but shall be delivered up on claim of the party to whom such service or labor may be due."

The gentleman observed, that this article contained no grant of power whatever; it was merely declaratory of certain principles, which ought to be left to the States to carry into effect; yet Congress had passed laws in relation to several of these subjects, &c., and, of course, transcended the limits of the Constitution, or rather had legislated upon subjects not enumerated, &c. To these observations I would reply, that I do consider these clauses as investing the Government generally with the exercise of all these powers, although the particular department intended for their exercise is not here designated; but by reading these clauses in connexion with the clause before read, it will be found that Congress is intrusted with the execution of these powers.

Congress shall have power to pass all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into effect the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, &c. It is then clear that other powers were vested, and intended to be vested in Congress, besides the foregoing enumerated powers; all the powers in the fourth article, I presume, to be strictly of this description. That this is the understanding of the article is evinced by the concurrent opinions of the General and State Governments in those respects.

The difference of opinion therefore between the gentleman and myself consists in this: That the principles here declared, he thinks, ought to be executed by the State authorities, and I think they were intended to be executed by Congress; and if my interpretation be correct, then Congress has not transcended the limits of its authority.

This solution is at least satisfactory to myself. Another argument urged by the honorable gentleman (Mr. CRAWFORD) requires some attention. The gentleman considered the General and State Governments, taken collectively, as forming one complete sovereignty; he then referred to a clause in the Constitution, which he conceived excluded the State governments from the right to grant bank charters, and thence inferred the right in the General Government, &c. Although I have full confidence in the opinions generally expressed by that gentleman, I cannot concur with him in this mode of deriving power to the General Government. It is directly repugnant to the principles of construction I have just suggested, and therefore I cannot yield my assent to it.

The tenth section of the first article says, "no State shall enter into any treaty of alliance or confederation, grant letters of marque and reprisal, coin money, emit bills of credit," &c. The particular terms of this section selected to exclude the States from incorporating banks are these: "No State shall emit bills of credit." The gentleman supposes that a bank bill is a bill of credit, and therefore that the States cannot establish an institution to issue a bill of credit. Our ideas differ as to the meaning of the term, "bills of credit." As to the argument of the gentleman, that he who does an act by another does it by himself, it does not apply to the present case; for if we recur to the charters of incorporation, we shall find that a particular fund is fixed, and that this fund only is answerable for the redemption of the notes. The argument of the gentleman would as well apply to every common note given by one individual to another, because the States as much issue bills of credit by protecting promissory notes as by authorizing banks to issue such notes. In case of notes given by individuals, they become the property of him to whom they are payable; the drawer is responsible for the amount, and the State enforces the payment. In that case, too, the whole property of the drawer is pledged for the payment. In the case of bank bills, nothing is pledged but the sum specified in the charter. The real meaning of this clause, therefore, I understand to be to prevent the emission of bills, the payment of which is to be made by the States themselves, similar to the old Continental paper money; for that was evidently in the contemplation of the framers of the Constitution when they very wisely denied the power of issuing such bills to the States.

The gentleman from Georgia next read the first section of the third article of the Constitution. I should not take up the time of the Senate in noticing it, but that the construction which I then put upon it differs from that which he gave as an universal admission. The gentleman supposed there had been some departure from the Constitution under the following clause: "The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish." The gentleman observes, that, at the time of the repeal of the judiciary act, it was generally admitted by the advocates of the repeal that the Supreme Court was not tangible. That was not the opinion I then expressed; and the opinion I then expressed has, since that time, been strengthened and confirmed by further reflection. I do not know how the gentleman's argument can apply to the case under consideration, unless he meant to show that the decision in that respect made by Congress was unconstitutional. My opinion is, that it was Constitutional, and that Congress might constitutionally modify and change the Supreme Court in the most essential point; and permit me here to protest against the usual mode of construing the Constitution by analogy. Instead of examining the expressions of the Constitution itself to ascertain its meaning, we are often referred to certain principles borrowed from the British jurists. Thus we are often referred to the fundamental principle of the separation of departments, &c., the independence of judges, &c., although neither of these terms are to be found in the Constitution; and the principles, although correct in themselves as general principles, are subject in practice to material qualifications and limitations; and this is particularly the case in the Constitution. It appears to me as easy to ascertain the true meaning of the words used in the Constitution as the meaning of these or any other terms; and the error in this mode of reasoning generally arises from the misapplication of the terms to the subject in question; or, in other words, when reasoning from analogy, in recollecting the resemblances and overlooking the differences in cases supposed to be analogous. To ascertain the true meaning of the Constitution, therefore, I have always had reference to its own words, and discarded all reasoning from its analogy to anything else. By referring to the clause respecting the judicial department just read, and taking it in connexion with the clause which declares that Congress shall have power to pass all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution all the powers, &c., "vested in any department," &c., it will appear obvious that Congress might, according to the express words of the Constitution, establish the judicial department as it has done, and from time to time alter or modify it at its discretion, &c.; and if Congress thought proper to increase or lessen the number of judges of the Supreme Court, or to increase or lessen the duties to be performed by them, I would ask, where is the Constitutional prohibition? I see none. Congress can designate the duties of the court and the compensation of the judges. They may take away the duties, and, of course, also, the compensation, and why? Because we find the service and compensation inseparably connected, and the one made the consideration of the other. Congress has a right to designate the services which the judges shall perform. And by what authority will they retain compensation after the services to be performed are taken away? It is not the name of office, nor good behaviour in it, for which compensation is constitutionally given, but for service rendered. The reason of this article in relation to the Supreme Court is very obvious. It was to obtain an uniformity of decision; and if Congress establish one Supreme Court, they perfectly satisfy all the injunctive part of the Constitution. But I do not know how the gentleman's reference to this clause could affect the Constitutional question in the present case.

I have thus far endeavored to explain and reconcile to the Constitution those laws passed by Congress which the gentleman has considered contrary to the Constitution.

I will now proceed to some other arguments of the gentleman. He observed that the bank law had been in existence for twenty years, during which time there had been an acquiescence in the law. I concur in that opinion. I do consider that all the instances presented by the gentleman; to wit: authorizing the bank to lend money; the extension of its right of establishing branches to New Orleans in 1804; and also the act to punish counterfeiting bank paper in 1807, ought to be considered as acts of acquiescence by the Government in the constitutionality of that law.

I have given the most respectful attention to the arguments used by the opposers of the bill to account for this acquiescence, and to obviate the reasoning drawn from it by its friends; and whilst I give the gentlemen in opposition great credit for the ingenuity of the argument, I cannot concur in the reasoning upon which it is founded. I understand it to be bottomed upon the idea, that the bank was in the nature of a contract; and that under its influence, private rights became vested in individuals; and that, therefore, the Government was bound to carry it into effect, and that a refusal to have done so, or the repeal of the act would have been a violation of good faith, &c. &c. The honorable gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. ANDERSON) observed, that the Republican Administration, viewing this law in the nature of a contract, from a sacred regard to the preservation of good faith, passed these several acquiescing laws, &c. &c. The observation of the gentleman, so far as it respected the manifestations of good faith on the part of the Republicans, was certainly both just and pertinent. The Republicans have certainly fulfilled, with the most scrupulous fidelity, all the public engagements of their predecessors as well as their own; yet I do not believe that these several acquiescing laws were passed under the pressure of any obligation for the preservation of good faith.

I concur with the honorable gentleman from Georgia (Mr. CRAWFORD) in the conclusions he drew against this argument of the imperious obligation due to contracts under the influence of this law: but not precisely for the reasons he assigned for them. The gentleman observed, that it was essential in the formation of contracts that there should be parties, and a consideration. That under the bank law there was no sufficient consideration for the formation of a contract. In this I am inclined to think the gentleman is mistaken. I presume the mistake has arisen from an inattention to the circumstances under which the law was passed. Under the terms of the law, there were facilities given to the United States by the bank of very considerable value. The bonus given was certainly a sufficient consideration to make the contract binding on the part of the United States. But I have several objections to this argument urged against the bill; in the first place, parties, and a consideration, are not only essential to the formation of a contract, but parties capable of contracting. If the bank law be unconstitutional, then it cannot, as I conceive, give a Constitutional capacity to the artificial person created by it to contract. An unconstitutional corporation has no more a Constitutional or legal capacity to contract, than a married woman or even an idiot; each equally laboring under legal disabilities. The argument, therefore, which is used to show that the bank law is unconstitutional, and at the same time gave a Constitutional capacity to an artificial person to contract, appears to me to be in the nature of a felo de se, it destroys itself. Hence I conclude, that if the law be unconstitutional in itself, it cannot confer on an artificial person a legal capacity to contract, and that any contract made under its influence would be void for the want of that legal capacity. In the next place, if it be urged that Congress is bound to carry into effect all contracts in which individual rights or interests are concerned; then Congress may in this way derive to itself all the powers it may want for an object, instead of getting them by the shorter route of the assumption under the terms common defence and general welfare; and in a much more exceptionable mode; because it may not only thus acquire any power whatever, but may also acquire it in perpetuity. Hence it appears to me that if gentlemen should succeed in establishing this argument, they would lose more by the admission, than they would gain by limiting the powers of Congress to the enumerations of the Constitution. In fact that argument would be rendered worse than nugatory by this admission.

But I have a third objection to this argument of the obligation of the contract, more formidable than either of the preceding. It appears to me to be an argument against a fact. I know it is so, as it respects myself. I have been present when most of these acquiescing laws have been passed, and I have no recollection of having been influenced in the votes I gave in their favor by a view of the sacred obligations due to contracts; nor do I recollect to have heard this consideration urged by any gentleman at the time of passing these several laws. In fact at the time of passing the law for punishing counterfeiting the bills of the Bank of the United States, I recollect no other consideration operating on me, than the information, that certain unprincipled individuals were counterfeiting bills in general circulation, to the great injury of the honest part of the community. I thought such conduct ought to be suppressed, and therefore voted for punishing all who should be engaged in it, without much attention to the Constitutional question respecting the bank law. I cannot without some violation to my feelings, agree to have any of my public conduct propped up by an afterthought, nor by any other considerations than those which operated at the time. These remarks, however, will certainly not apply to those gentlemen who voted under the suggested impressions. The general principle operating with me, was this—that all laws passed by Congress must be considered as Constitutional until they are repealed. Their unconstitutionality is a good reason, and the best reason, for their repeal; but so long as they remain in the statute book unrepealed they must be considered Constitutional, and in my judgment no tribunal on earth can question their validity; nor can I admit that they are subject to the censorial power claimed by the Judiciary. I am, therefore, disposed to admit the acquiescence in the bank law, and to give the gentlemen in favor of renewal all the advantage of the precedents quoted by them for that object, considered under all the circumstances of the case; and to what do they amount? Will they go so far as to preclude the present Congress from exercising its sound discretion upon the Constitutional question, when brought directly to its consideration? and when at the time of the several precedents quoted, it was only collaterally or incidentally considered, if considered at all? Certainly not—and if in exercising the right of reviewing the Constitution, the present Congress should be convinced that a former Congress had exceeded its limits, is it not bound by every conscientious consideration to correct the error, and to bring the laws within its wholesome provisions? It appears to me not only to be the right, but the indispensable duty of Congress to do so.

I will now proceed to animadvert upon some important observations made by two gentlemen upon the right of the Legislatures of the respective States to instruct the Senators of the United States.

Acting, as I now am, Mr. President, under the influence of instructions from the Legislature of the State I have the honor to represent, I feel myself imperiously called upon to notice some observations, which fell from the honorable gentleman (Mr. CRAWFORD,) and the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. LEIB,) in relation to that subject.

The gentleman from Georgia (Mr. C.) feelingly complains of the tendency of instructions from the great States, to embarrass the proceedings of this Government, by giving an undue bias to the deliberations, and restraining the free exercise of opinion in this honorable body, &c. &c. Without particularly adverting to the emphasis laid by the honorable gentleman upon the term "great States," I agree in general with the gentleman in his opinions in that respect. But, sir, in the present case, it may be observed, that the question of instructions to Senators was first moved in the State of Maryland. Now, sir, Maryland, although great in virtues and resources, is not so great in point of population and extent of territory, as to have obtained the denomination of a great State. The proposition then, however, was rejected by one vote. A similar motion, I am informed, is now depending before the Legislature of New Jersey. New Jersey, like Maryland, although great in virtues and resources, is not so great in point of population and extent of territory as to have obtained the denomination of a "great State." Indeed, sir, the right to instruct Senators has not been exclusively acted upon by the great States, generally so called, during the operations of this Government; but, I admit, has been more frequently resorted to by them.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. LEIB) after having read his instructions, informed the Senate, that he represented one of the great States, which had given instructions, and that he felt himself absolutely bound by them in the vote he should give on the present question; that he considered himself the representative of the Legislature of Pennsylvania; that it was the principal and he the agent, and he was bound to carry into effect its will, &c., &c. However high may be the respect I generally entertain for the opinions of the honorable gentleman (Mr. L.) I am compelled to dissent from him in these opinions. I feel myself compelled, too, to express this dissent; lest it might be supposed, that being similarly circumstanced with that gentleman on the present question, my conduct might be influenced by similar considerations.

I do not consider myself the representative of the Legislature of Virginia, although I feel the most unbounded confidence in its wisdom and patriotism, and the highest respect for its proceedings. I consider myself the representative of the people of the United States, delegated to that character by the Legislature of Virginia. As an evidence of the correctness of this opinion, I have only to remark, that the laws which I contribute to pass, in the character of Senator, are co-extensive with the United States, and operate upon the people thereof in their individual capacities. They do not operate upon the State Legislatures in their corporate characters, except in cases where in that character they are connected with the Federal Government, or instrumental in the execution of some of its powers. Still less do they operate upon the Legislature of Virginia exclusively; of course I cannot consider myself as the representative of that Legislature exclusively, as its agent, and bound in all cases to execute its will upon this floor, &c. &c. It is not necessary, nor do I mean to question the right of the State Legislatures, so long practised upon, to instruct the Senators of the United States, chosen by them respectively; because that might produce an unmeaning and useless discussion about terms; but I mean to inquire, whether the exercise of the right imposes a Constitutional obligation on the Senator instructed, to obey; in what the real obligation to obedience consists; whether the instruction is injunctive and compulsory on him, or addressed only to his discretion; or, in other words, whether the Senator instructed has not a right to disobey? And whether such disobedience violates any moral or political obligation? I also propose to make a few observations on the operation of instructions upon the Federal Government and its proceedings. That the Senator instructed has a Constitutional and legal right to disobey his instructions, is most obvious to my understanding, from the single consideration, that a law passed by a vote in disobedience of instructions is as valid as a law passed by a vote in obedience to instructions. Obedience to instructions is no where commanded. Nor is disobedience of instructions any where prohibited by any written law or constitution. The act of disobedience does not subject the disobeying Senator to any punishment whatever; of course the disobedience of instructions violates no political duty, and, if the instructions be addressed only to the discretion of the Senator, his disobedience of them violates no moral obligation; provided he exercises a sound and conscientious discretion, founded upon the best reflections he is able to bestow upon the subject thus presented for consideration. I therefore conclude, if the State Legislatures possess the right to instruct Senators of the United States, chosen by them respectively, it is an incomplete right, without a remedy, or with a very remote one. The influence, or the true obligation of instructions, therefore, arises from the expression* of opinion by the State Legislatures; and the very high respect which is at all times due from the Senator to the expression of such opinion by the Legislature of the State he represents. A respect which I feel so strongly,

*It is presumed that this was the sense in which the Legislature of Virginia viewed this subject in 1800. In the memorable instructions of that day, the Legislature prefaces them with a declaration to the Senators of the United States, that they deem it important 'to express their opinions,' upon the subject of instructions. Then follows a course of reasoning to convince the Senators of the propriety of the opinions thus expressed. The instructions in this case therefore were clearly addressed to the discretion of the Senators, and not considered as imposing a positive command.

In 1808, the Legislature of Virginia instructed the Senators of that State in the Congress of the United States, to use their best endeavors to obtain amendments to the Constitution of the United States, which in effect would make the Senators of the United States recallable at the pleasure of the Legislatures of the respective States. It is presumed that the Legislature did not consider its instructions mandatory, and that the instructed Senator was bound to obey, or, in other words, had no right to disobey. Because if the Senator was bound to obey the instructions of the Legislature, it might instruct him to resign, upon the same principle which would authorize instructions how to vote, and if the instructions be mandatory, the instructed Senator would be bound to resign as well as vote conformably thereto—of course such an amendment to the Constitution would be unnecessary. The Senators from Virginia, with the most respectful attention to the opinion expressed by the Virginia Legislature, in the most respectful terms presented the instruction to the consideration of the Senate; but never thought themselves bound to use their best endeavors to obtain the amendment to the Constitution, as they were instructed to do. The Legislature, however, forwarded the proposed amendment to the other State Legislatures for concurrence; and as far as information is yet received, the proposition has been unanimously disapproved by every State Legislature which has acted upon it.

that I never would depart from an opinion thus expressed, unless in a clear and indisputable case; but the point I contend for is not injunctive, compulsory, or mandatory. That it is not in the nature of a command, but addressed to the discretion of the Senator instructed; taking into due consideration all the circumstances of the case connected with such instructions.

It may be said that the Senator is responsible to the Legislature, which appoints him at the expiration of his term of service; this is true, if applied to the individuals who may compose the Legislature at that time; but it does not vary my conclusion; because every act that he performs, whether instructed or not, is an act of responsibility; and the most which can be inferred from this idea, is, that it increases his responsibility, and would naturally produce caution; but cannot affect his right to disobey.

It cannot escape attention, that I purposely avoid all observations upon the rights of the people, as the legitimate source of all power, in their highest sovereign capacities, and upon whom all laws passed by their Representatives operate in their individual characters, to instruct all their Representatives, which I presume, if practicable, would not be denied by any; because such a discussion would be unnecessary upon the present question. The inquiry I am making respects the right of one set of Representatives of the people, chosen for certain purposes, to give mandatory instructions to another set of Representatives of the people chosen for other purposes, without any written law to that effect, and by the mere force of implication. If it should be contended that the Senators of the United States are the Representatives of the Legislatures of the respective States, and not the Representatives of the people of the United States in their individual characters, contrary to the express provisions of the Constitution, then this absurd conclusion would follow; that the people of the United States are governed by laws, not passed by their Representatives, but by the Representatives of their State Legislatures, in their corporate characters, contrary to the fundamental principles of all Republican Governments, and directly opposite to the universal expectations of the whole American people.

But, sir, let us resort to the Constitution itself, and see the actual relations which do there exist between the Legislatures of the respective States, and the Senators of the respective States, composing the Senate of the United States.

In the third section of the first article of the Constitution are these words: "The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the Legislature thereof for six years, and each Senator shall have one vote." In another place, are these words: "And if vacancies happen by resignation or otherwise, during the recess of the Legislature of any State, the Executive thereof may make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the Legislature, which shall then fill such vacancies." These clauses of the Constitution present all the relations between the Legislatures and Executives of the respective States, and the Senators of the United States; and in what do they consist? Certainly in nothing but in choosing the Senators; when that is done, all the functions of the Legislature and Executive are at an end quo ad that particular subject. I see no influence given either over the votes or the acts of the Senator during the six years for which he is elected. During that period, the Senator is intrusted with the execution of all the powers and authorities conferred upon him by the Constitution, at his own discretion, subject only to his Constitutional responsibility at the expiration of his term of service. But it may be said, that the right to instruct arises from the necessary connexion between the constituent and the Representative. To this it may be replied, that this upon the general principle is a constructive or an implied right; but I doubt its application, at least in its full force, to this particular case. The relations in this case between the constituent and the Representative are expressly prescribed by the Constitution; neither of them can claim any original or native rights; and no construction nor implication ought to be inferred against its provisions, nor inconsistent with its obvious meaning. Besides, if this mere implication be the only foundation of the right of the State Legislatures to instruct Senators of the United States, it would equally apply to the State executives, when from adventitious causes they exercise the right of appointment; a right I believe not generally admitted, even by the State Legislatures; especially in the sense contended for, that the instruction is mandatory and conclusive. Will it not also apply to the connexion between electors and the President of the United States? I find, by the second article of the Constitution, that the President of the United States is to be chosen by electors appointed by the several States, and they of course become the immediate constituents of the President. But what would be thought of their inferring a right from this connexion to instruct the President of the United States in what manner to execute the powers and duties of his office? And what would be the probability of a concurrence in such instructions from the different electors of the several States? The President's responsibility is tested at the expiration of every four years; that of a Senator at the expiration of every six years; and I believe that the changes of the individual electors in the several States are not greater at the expiration of every four years, than are the changes in the individuals composing the State Legislatures at the expiration of every six years. The responsibility of the President of the United States, therefore, may be considered as great or greater, to his electors, than the responsibility of the Senators of the United States to the respective State Legislatures: for I contend the responsibility of the Senator is not to the State Legislature in its corporate character, but to the individuals who may happen to compose the State Legislature at the time of his election, in their individual capacities, described only by the corporate term. It is believed that a pretension of this kind by the electors of the President of the United States would not be tolerated even by the State Legislatures. But is there nothing expressly contained in the Constitution of the United States which would afford a stronger implication against the exercise of this right by the State Legislatures, than the implication from which the right is said to be derived?

I think, sir, that the very first words of the Constitution, after the preamble, afford strong evidence of the exclusion of the right of the State Legislatures to give mandatory instructions to the Senators of the State. They are the following: "All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives." Now, sir, upon the principle of mandatory instructions from the State Legislatures to the Senators of the United States, will Congress exercise all the legislative powers granted by the Constitution? Will not the State Legislatures essentially participate in the exercise of the legislative powers? If they can command and direct the votes of one distinct and essential branch of Congress upon all legislative subjects, will it not be a material participation in the legislative powers granted exclusively to Congress? Could they not thus embarrass the whole proceedings of Congress? Could they not render all deliberations on the part of the Senate unnecessary? Could they not thus deprive the Government itself of all energy and efficiency? Surely the wise framers of the Constitution could never have anticipated, still less could they have sanctioned, the assertion of such principles!

These considerations bring me to examine the tendency of the principle contended for upon the character and proceedings of the General Government; and, sir, had it not been for the opinions I entertain on this question, I should not have given the other the critical examination I have attempted; but, sir, such is my opinion of the injurious effects of the practice of giving instructions by the Legislatures of the States to the Senators of the United States, that I deem it my indispensable duty to give the subject a full and candid investigation; although in doing so, I know I shall have to encounter strong and honorable and perhaps insuperable prepossessions against my opinions; particularly in the State I have the honor to represent. I wish it to be understood, however, sir, that in the discharge of my duties on this floor, I shall always obey the honest dictates of my own judgment; and whenever I see, or think I see, danger of any kind threatening the due administration of this Government, I will at all times endeavor to expose it to the view of the people, and particularly of those from whom the unintentional danger is apprehended; regardless of any consequences to myself upon the political theatre. The best mode of appreciating the tendency of mandatory instructions upon the proceedings of the Federal Government, will be to bring to our recollection the great points of difference between the present Government and former confederation.

Under the former confederation, the States voted in their corporate characters; and if the Representatives of any one of them were equally divided in opinion, the State gave no vote. Under the present Government, each Representative votes in his individual character, and upon his individual responsibility. The words of the Constitution are "and each Senator shall have one vote." Under the former confederation, the requisitions of Congress operated upon the States in their corporate characters. Under the present Government, the laws of Congress operate upon the people of the United States in their individual characters.

The former Congress did not possess the means necessary and proper for executing its own will upon the subjects confided to its deliberations. The present Congress possesses power to carry into effect its own will or its laws, upon all subjects confided to its management. These are among the great points of difference in the character and powers of the two Governments. The former Government fell to pieces from the feebleness of its organization, and principally from the want of power to execute its own will, from its dependence upon the State Legislatures for the execution of its requisitions.

Now, sir, if the State Legislatures possess the right to give mandatory instructions to their Senators respectively, I see very little difference in the character of the present and former confederation; for there can be very little difference in the practical effect of the principle of requisitions by Congress upon the State Legislatures, which may be rejected at their discretion, and the principle of the State Legislatures making requisitions by mandatory instructions upon one essential branch of Congress; which must be obeyed by that branch in exclusion of all discretion whatever. The feebleness and incongruity of the latter principle is, in my opinion, at least equal to the first, and if admitted and indulged in, will as certainly terminate in the ruin and dissolution of the Government. Another injurious tendency of mandatory instructions, is, to add to the locality of feelings and opinions in the deliberations of this honorable body, already too strong by native and habitual prepossessions and predilections. Another injurious tendency of mandatory instructions results from their influence in restraining the free exercise of opinion in the deliberations of this honorable body: and if generally practised upon would render all deliberations unnecessary. The incongruity of mandatory instructions to the operations of this Government will appear more obvious, by reflecting, that, if the same measure were to be concurred in and required by every State Legislature in the Union, and their Senators peremptorily instructed to effect it, without exercising any discretion of their own, it is probable that such would be the difference in the mode or detail of the instructions from the respective State Legislatures, as to put it out of the power of the Senate to effect their object; the Senators from each State being bound to pursue the mode pointed out to them by the Legislature of the State they respectively represent. Indeed such is my opinion of the tendency of the principle of mandatory instructions, that I should regret very much to see it established and frequently resorted to. The practice, in my opinion, would eventuate in producing feebleness and inefficiency in the General Government; collision among the several States; and finally disunion and dissolution of the General Government.

Sir, I now am, and always have been, attached to an efficient Government—a Government strong enough to repel external violence, and to insure domestic tranquillity, and to secure the person and property of the individual citizens. The Federal Government I conceive to be an indispensable instrument in the effectuation of these great objects. I have often wondered at seeing gentlemen of learning, of talents, and of patriotism, rejoicing at the curtailment of its necessary powers. They seem to me to enjoy the triumph of every event of this kind, as much as if they had plucked a laurel from the brow of their most inveterate enemy and placed it round their own; not being sufficiently impressed, in my judgment, with the importance of the Federal Government to the preservation of their own personal safety, and the security of their property, &c.

The gentleman from Georgia (Mr. CRAWFORD) was pleased to say, that in giving instructions to the Senators upon this occasion, the great States had been influenced solely by motives of avarice. I regret the remark; and I think, if the gentleman would dispassionately reconsider it, he would also regret it. I think he would admit, that the Legislature of Virginia could not have acted under the influence of such a motive. And, sir, I feel a pride and a pleasure in standing here to repel the imputation, and to do justice to the real motives of the Legislature. I am at a loss to determine what are the particular circumstances which could have induced the gentleman to ascribe the motive of avarice to the Virginia Legislature on this occasion. It is true, that a branch of the Bank of the United States with the trifling capital of $300,000 is established at Norfolk; and that a branch of the Bank of Virginia is also established there. But these circumstances furnish no possible motive of avarice to the Virginia Legislature. The amount of capital and its effects, are quite unimportant to the State. Norfolk itself, although equally respectable and important with any other portion of the State of the same extent and population, is not sufficient to excite the avarice of the Virginia Legislature. The Legislature of Virginia consists principally of agriculturists residing in the interior of the State, who concern themselves very little with banks and bank operations. They have made no calculations of pecuniary interests upon this occasion. They have acted in giving instructions from the purest and most honorable motives, from a conviction that the power of granting charters of incorporation was not conferred on Congress by the Constitution, but reserved to the States respectively. That this conviction alone was the inducement to their instructions will appear obvious from the instructions themselves, which I beg leave to read :

"The General Assembly of Virginia view with the most serious concern the late attempts which have been made to obtain from Congress a renewal of the charter incorporating the Bank of the United States.

This Assembly is deeply impressed with the conviction that the original grant of that charter was unconstitutional, that Congress have no power whatever to renew it, and that the exercise of such a power would be not only unconstitutional, but a dangerous encroachment on the sovereignty of the States. Therefore,

Resolved, That the Senators of this State, in the Congress of the United States, be instructed and our Representatives most earnestly requested, in the execution of their duties, as faithful representatives of their country, to use their best efforts in opposing by every means in their power the renewal of the charter of the Bank of the United States.

It manifestly appears from these instructions that a conviction of the unconstitutionality of the original bank law was the sole inducement with the Legislature for giving them; and here, sir, permit me to express a hope, that the arguments I have urged in favor of this opinion will amply justify the Legislature in the honest conviction under which it has acted. Permit me also to remark, sir, that while I cannot admit that instructions in any case possess a mandatory influence over the Senator; and while I think the practice of giving instructions in general, and upon general points of policy, is attended with injurious effects upon the proceedings of this Government, &c.—yet, in a case of rights reserved to the States, the Legislatures not only have the right, but it is their duty to express their opinions to, or instruct, their Senators (for I will not cavil about terms) to resist the usurpations of the General Government. It is the mildest way in which their agency can be brought to bear upon all such cases; and this being a case in point, the instructing Legislatures stand perfectly justifiable in the conduct they have adopted in that respect. I hope, sir, that I have rescued the Legislature of Virginia from the unmerited imputations thrown against it, inadvertently I am sure, by the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. CRAWFORD;) and have shown that it has been influenced by the purest, the most laudable and the most honorable motives, &c.

I have, sir, thus presented to the Senate the most impartial and comprehensive views, which my best reflections have enabled me to take of the Constitutional question involved in the present discussion, and of all the other topics which have been incidentally connected with it. I will now proceed to examine the subject in another point of view.

Upon the question respecting the expediency of the renewal of the bank charter, the friends of the bill claim the whole weight of the argument; whilst some of its opposers tacitly acquiesce in, and others faintly oppose this lofty pretension. Notwithstanding these circumstances, I entertain very great doubts upon that point. There appear to me to be considerations of great weight against it; perhaps more than sufficient to counterbalance those urged in favor of it. Both the gentlemen in favor of the bill relied very much upon the suggestion, that the prosperity of the United States was attributable in a very great degree, indeed almost exclusively, to the establishment and operation of the Bank of the United States. I believe, sir, nothing is more difficult than to ascertain the true causes of the wealth and prosperity of nations; very few writers have been successful in the investigation of that intricate subject; but the adventitious establishment and operation of the Bank of the United States are amongst the last causes to which I would ascribe their rapid increase of wealth and their general and extensive prosperity. It is not to any adventitious, local causes we are to look for these universal effects. If I were to look for their real causes, I should expect to find them, in the genius and wisdom of political institutions; in permitting every citizen to employ his faculties at his own discretion, for the attainment of property; and securing to him the perfect and uncontrolled enjoyment of it when acquired. Each citizen, thus acquiring wealth and prosperity to himself, would of course accumulate the general stock, &c. These inestimable blessings have also been attended with signal and peculiar advantages, with an exemption from wars, and all other great political calamities, &c., &c., whilst that portion of the world with which we have the most extensive commercial relation has been, and still is, unhappily involved in wars almost interminable and of the most disastrous characters; from which, till latterly, our commercial fellow citizens have derived advantages almost incalculable, and of course added greatly to the general stock of wealth and prosperity, &c. To these and such like causes, permanent in their character, and universal in their operation, are properly to be ascribed the general wealth and prosperity of the nation; and not to the adventitious circumstance of the creation of a bank; still less should we rely upon this cause, when we reflect that the bank is local in its operations; whilst the scene of prosperity is universal through the United States, pervading those parts of them where the operations of the bank are scarcely known, and its influence never felt, as much as those parts immediately within the focal point of its influence, &c. This argument, therefore, I conceive has been urged by the friends of the bill, greatly beyond its real merits, and received with too much facility and effect by its opposers.

The gentleman from Georgia (Mr. CRAWFORD) upon introducing to the consideration of the Senate the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, was pleased to say, that he should rely in some degree upon that report; although he knew, that mentioning it would excite invidious feelings in some of the members of this body. I do not know to whom the gentleman meant to apply his allusion. I can only say for myself, that I think the report is entitled to a respectful attention—that I would give it the same respect, that I would show to a report from the head of any other department. It has always been my invariable habit, to form my opinions from the facts contained in the documents before me, regardless of the authors of them; nor could I ever condescend, in the discharge of my duty upon this floor, to permit personal considerations to intermingle with, still less bias my deliberations. But, sir, I see nothing very operative in the Secretary's report. He says in substance that he has found in practice the Bank of the United States to be a convenient instrument for facilitating the management of the fiscal concerns of the nation; which I believe is generally admitted. It is also true that the Secretary has found it convenient, and has ventured to express his opinion in favor of the constitutionality of the bank bill; and I am willing to give credit to the opinion, for what it is worth. No gentleman would say it ought to preclude the free exercise of opinion by others; and I acknowledge, upon this particular subject, I am not inclined to give it the weight to which that gentleman's opinions would be entitled upon other occasions; because he has uniformly manifested too much zeal for the success of this bill, to leave the mind perfectly free in the investigation. He has for a long time used such various and incessant means to effect the renewal, that his mind must be in some degree divested of that coolness and impartiality which are indispensable to a critical and correct analysis of the Constitution.

The gentleman from Georgia (Mr. CRAWFORD) observed, that it was better to have a bank dependant on the United States, than to increase the dependence of the government upon the State banks, over which the Government of the United States cannot exercise any control. I would submit to the honorable gentleman, upon further reflection, to say, whether the remark is applicable to the bill under consideration. After the charter is once granted, I see no control reserved to the Government. I fear the controlling influence would be on the other side. If, however, there must be an United States' Bank, I would prefer one of that character to the present project. I have too much confidence in Congress to be alarmed at the influence of a bank under its direction; and should greatly prefer it to one whose direction should be under the influence of British capitalists.

The honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. LLOYD,) to whose dispassionate, enlightened, and dignified observations I listened with great pleasure, informed us, that there was a capital of fifty millions of bank paper in circulation in the United States, and the specie circulation for its support did not exceed ten millions—and that was daily diminishing. If this be the true state of the circulating medium, I think the extension of bank paper circulation already too great; and it would not be surprising to me, if a knowledge of this fact alone should lessen its credit. Its excess has certainly become an evil, and instead of being still further extended, ought to be curtailed. But the most objectionable circumstance to this excess of circulation of bank paper, I conceive to be its inevitable tendency to exclude the specie circulation, which it substitutes. A specie circulation is certainly greatly preferable to paper circulation; it has an intrinsic value in itself, whereas the paper circulation has no intrinsic value, and its currency depends upon the value of the specie circulation which it represents. Of course a circulation of value is excluded from the country, and substituted by one of no value; and in times of war or other great political calamities, when the Government would stand most in need of the aid of banks for its support, their capacity to lend would be the most diminished, if not entirely destroyed, by the absence of specie capital, which the circulation of bank paper has banished from the country. I presume the gentleman would not consider the banishment of a circulation of intrinsic value, and substituting it with one of a representative value only, amongst the prosperous effects resulting from the operation of the Bank of the United States.

The gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. LLOYD) favored the Senate with the perusal of his notes of the evidence of the democratic merchants and manufacturers of Philadelphia. I paid great attention to this information, derived from practical men, and should be sorry to misconceive it; and certainly could not disrespect it. But there were two facts, stated and assented to by all of them, which seem to me irreconcilable with the opinions expressed by those gentlemen, respecting the real causes of the present scarcity of money, and the distresses consequent upon that scarcity. The first fact was, that the bank in Philadelphia discounted precisely as much now, and proposed to do so till the 4th of March, as it heretofore had done. The other fact was, that the paper had not depreciated, but was still in good credit. The complaint was not that the paper, when obtained, was not of good credit, and would not answer their purposes; but that they could not obtain it. Now, sir, I cannot conceive how the scarcity of money, and consequent distress, can arise from any apprehension of putting down the bank, when precisely the same sum of money is now put into circulation by it as was formerly done, and the money itself in good credit. The pecuniary distresses complained of, in my judgment, are not properly attributable to these causes, but to some others more inscrutable, and which have escaped the observations of those gentlemen. Perhaps they may more justly be ascribed, in some instances, to the general embarrassment of the commercial world at present—particularly the embarrassments of American commerce at the present moment, and perhaps, in some instances, to some unknown embarrassments and difficulties in the particular occupations of the complaining individuals. There is another fact to show that the alarm at present is greatly exaggerated, or is certainly greatly beyond any real cause for it. It will appear from the Secretary's report, that the debts due to the Bank of the United States are only $600,000 less than they were twelve months ago; of course the discounts of the whole institution could only be lessened to that extent, and it is impossible for me to believe that the payment of that trivial sum, compared with the whole mercantile capital of the United States, could be seriously felt by the merchants generally; especially as they have been twelve whole months in paying it. If the payment of that sum in twelve months could produce all the distresses we hear of, I hope we shall hear no more of our immense mercantile wealth, and the great extension of our mercantile capital. Yet this is the only real cause for all the clamor and alarm circulating through the country. I think, with some confidence, that the consequences of putting down the Bank of the United States must be artificially exaggerated, or very much misapprehended; and this opinion is grounded upon the consideration that it is directly repugnant to the interest of the bank to cause the apprehended distresses, and its directors certainly have the power to avoid the production of them. And I think that when a calculation is made, and a conclusion drawn upon the idea that a moneyed institution will pursue its own interest, it may fairly be said to be grounded on a solid consideration. I cannot see how putting down this institution can materially affect the pecuniary abilities of the nation; its actual funds for discounting will be nearly the same; the position of them only will be changed; they will find their way into the State banks, and their ability to discount will be increased proportionably to the increase of their deposits. Nor am I at all alarmed at the suggestion, that eleven millions of dollars will be drawn out of the country by the British capitalists, because it will not be their interest to do so. Their dollars are worth more here than in Great Britain. If drawn there, they would soon be melted down into their depreciated paper circulation. They might also draw bills to advantage, so that I doubt whether an additional dollar will be shipped from the country, in consequence of the rejection of this bill. Certainly they will not in any great extent.

I will now, Mr. President, suggest a few considerations, which I acknowledge have great influence on my mind in deciding on the expediency of the proposed renewal of the charter of the Bank of the United States. I do it with great diffidence, because I have not yet heard them suggested by any other gentleman; at least not precisely as they affect my mind. I will, however, present them to the Senate, and do not wish them to be appreciated beyond what they are worth. In the incorporation of a bank upon the principles now proposed, the great advantage to the stockholders consists in legalizing their credit, and authorizing them to draw an interest on it, as well as on their money. Individuals can obtain interest only on a loan of money—the bank is authorized to obtain interest on a loan of credit, and that interest, according to the reported dividends of the Bank of the United States, has been eight per cent. per annum; and it is probable it will continue quite as high. This advantage is not confined to the credit arising from the money owned by the stockholders; but also that which arises from the deposits of money belonging to other people—nor is this all; it extends to the credit which arises from the enormous deposits of public money. It appears from the Secretary's report, that seven tenths of the whole stock are held by British capitalists; perhaps the proportion is greater, but covered in some instances by American names. It also appears, that they will have enjoyed the full term of these incorporated advantages on the 4th of March next; of course, a refusal to renew them cannot in any respect be considered as a departure from good faith. Now I can see neither the policy nor expediency of extending these favors and advantages voluntarily to these foreigners for twenty years in exclusion of our own citizens; at least to the extent of the foreign capital now invested in the institution. I think, sir, at the same time, I can see very strong and peculiar grounds of objection to the policy and expediency of this measure. My objection arises from the enormous British influence, which notoriously pervades this country; and, I believe, affects the proceedings of Government, so seriously, that it can hardly be said to be independent. I verily believe, that this baneful influence has already driven the Government from measures which the best interest of the nation required.

Whilst we find Great Britain claiming exclusive dominion on the ocean, possessed of an immense mercantile capital and pecuniary resources almost inexhaustible, we find many of her subjects intimately connected with our citizens in commercial pursuits. We find many mercantile houses in that country associated with mercantile houses in this, so much so, that when we hear of great failures in Liverpool, we may look out for squalls and breakers at New York. Not only has this influence operated on the people generally, but I state it as my firm conviction that it has operated and now operates on the Government of the United States. Is this mercantile connexion the only source of influence? Not at all, sir; the influence accruing to Great Britain from the identity of language, from reading British books, from the precedents derived from her systems of jurisprudence, inculcated in early life—from intermarriages, and various other circumstances, paralyzes the efforts of our country, and almost reduces it to a state of colonial dependence; I consider this bank as giving that diversified influence a body and form for action. Have we not been told that this bank has been so operative, as to elevate or depress the State banks at pleasure? As to enlarge or contract the circulating medium? And is it desirable that such an engine should exist in the hands of foreigners? Take away this influence, and Great Britain would stand nearly on the same footing in relation to us, that any other nation does. I have not overlooked the observations of the gentleman from Georgia, in relation to this subject. He observed, if there be any influence, it is reciprocal; that these foreigners, having funds in the United States' Bank, will use their best exertions to procure a respect for our rights, or to keep the two nations at peace. I believe they will; but whilst they may have an influence in this country, they will have none in their own. The influence of seven millions of dollars will not be felt in that country, where three hundred millions are annually expended; although it will have much weight here. There is then no reciprocation of influence, as the gentleman supposes. I would ask the gentleman, how this influence has been heretofore exerted in practice upon the two Governments? Has it been able to induce Great Britain to relax in her hostility against us in the smallest degree? Has it prevented, or repealed the Orders in Council, &c.? Has it saved from impressment one American seamen? Did it prevent the attack upon the Chesapeake? In short, has it restrained the hostile arm of Great Britain from any hostile act, &c.? On the other hand, how has it acted on our Government? Has it not been instrumental in paralyzing every effort of resisting these hostilities? Has it not cooled us down to a state of humble submission, &c.? These are its natural practical effects, and will continue to be so. I am very far from wishing to interrupt the harmony and friendship between the United States and Great Britain, provided they can be preserved on honorable terms, but not by submission brought about by British influence. I find I have trespassed too long on the indulgence of the Senate; but I beg to be permitted to reply to two observations, one of which has been much relied on; and I will pass over all others.

It has been asked by one gentleman whether this was a very propitious time for putting an end to this establishment. I admit that it is not; that very serious embarrassments attend our commercial operations. The sequestrations of France, the British Orders in Council, as well as the interruptions from other countries, must have had a very serious effect on our commerce. I regret that this measure is called for, at so inauspicious a time. I am willing to admit that if we enforce the non-intercourse the pressure will not be lessened. But are these circumstances so inauspicious, as to warrant us in passing over solemn Constitutional objections? Are they such as to warrant us in still further increasing British influence in the nation? These are serious considerations; and, in my judgment, furnish strong grounds of objection to the policy and expediency of the proposed renewal of the bank charter. Gentlemen may speak of the impartiality of the bank as they please; but it is notorious that it has always been hostile to all measures directed against England, and against the Administration generally; evinced in the choice of directors, &c. The gentleman from Georgia (Mr. CRAWFORD) feelingly complained, that this had artificially been made a party question by the course adopted in its discussion. I fear the remark is too true; that this discussion partakes too much of that character. I have endeavored to exclude every idea of that nature from the observations just made. I always regret to see any question, in discussion before this honorable body, assume the character of parties. It is always unwise in the party in power artificially to create party questions. It reminds me of the silly boatswain, who, not content to sail easily along before a pleasant breeze, puts up his whistle for a storm, which, when it arrives, upsets his vessel, and sends her to the bottom. It is our duty to examine every question solely on the ground of right and wrong. In this country that party will keep longest in possession of power, which shall do right and administer justice regardless of all other considerations. I hope all my efforts have heretofore tended to produce these ends. It has been at all times my object to search out right, and vigilantly to pursue it, regardless of incidental consequences. Influenced solely by these considerations, I have endeavored to give this subject the most impartial investigation. I have done so with the most respectful attention to the motives and reasonings of other gentlemen. I know that I stand much in need of the same liberality and indulgence myself, which, I hope and doubt not, I shall receive in return.

When Mr. GILES had concluded, the Senate adjourned.

FRIDAY, February 15.

The Senate proceeded to consider their amendments to the bill, entitled "An act providing for the removal of the land office established at Nashville, in the State of Tennessee, and Canton, in the State of Ohio, and to authorize the Register and Receiver of Public Moneys to superintend the public sales of land in the district east of Pearl river," disagreed to by the House of Representatives; and, after progress, the further consideration thereof was postponed until to-morrow.

The two bills brought up yesterday for concurrence were read, and passed to the second reading.

On motion, by Mr. ANDERSON, the Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill for the relief of David Porter, a commander in the Navy of the United States; and, on motion, it was agreed that the consideration thereof be postponed until to-morrow.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to enable the Georgetown Potomac Bridge Company to levy money for the object of its incorporation; and the bill having been amended, the President reported it to the House accordingly. On the question, Shall this bill be now engrossed and read a third time as amended? it was determined in the affirmative.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to amend and continue in force an act, entitled "An act to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States," passed on the 25th day of February, 1791.

Mr. CLAY.—Mr. President: When the subject involved in the motion now under consideration was depending before the other branch of the Legislature, a disposition to acquiesce in their decision was evinced. For although the committee who reported this bill had been raised many weeks prior to the determination of that House on the proposition to re-charter the bank, except the occasional reference to it of memorials and petitions, we scarcely ever heard of it. The rejection, it is true, of a measure brought before either branch of Congress, does not absolutely preclude the other from taking up the same proposition; but the economy of our time, and a just deference for the opinion of others, would seem to recommend a delicate and cautious exercise of this power. As this subject, at the memorable period when the charter was granted, called forth the best talents of the nation—as it has, on various occasions, undergone the most thorough investigation, and as we can hardly expect that it is susceptible of receiving any further elucidation, it was to have been hoped that we should have been spared an useless debate. This was the more desirable because there are, I conceive, much superior claims upon us for every hour of the small portion of the session yet remaining to us. Under the operation of these motives, I had resolved to give a silent vote, until I felt myself bound, by the defying manner of the arguments advanced in support of the renewal, to obey the paramount duties I owe my country and its constitution; to make one effort, however feeble, to avert the passage of what appears to me a most unjustifiable law. After my honorable friend from Virginia (Mr. GILES) had instructed and amused us with the very able and ingenious argument which he delivered on yesterday, I should have still forborne to trespass on the Senate, but for the extraordinary character of his speech. He discussed both sides of the question, with great ability and eloquence, and certainly demonstrated to the satisfaction of all who heard him, both that it was Constitutional and unconstitutional, highly proper and improper to prolong the charter of the bank. The honorable gentleman appeared to me in the predicament in which the celebrated orator of Virginia, Patrick Henry, is said to have been once placed. Engaged in a most extensive and lucrative practice of the law, he mistook in one instance the side of the cause on which he was retained, and addressed the court and jury in a very splendid and convincing speech in behalf of his antagonist. His distracted client came up to him whilst he was progressing, and interrupting him, bitterly exclaimed, "you have undone me! you have ruined me!"—"Never mind, give yourself no concern," said the adroit advocate; and turning to the court and jury, continued his argument by observing, "May it please your honors, and you, gentlemen of the jury, I have been stating to you what I presume my adversary may urge on his side. I will now show you how fallacious his reasoning and groundless his pretensions are." The skilful orator proceeded, satisfactorily refuted every argument he had advanced, and gained his cause! A success with which I trust the exertion of my honorable friend will on this occasion be crowned.

It has been said by the honorable gentleman from Georgia (Mr. CRAWFORD) that this has been made a party question, although the law incorporating the bank was passed prior to the formation of parties, and when Congress was not biassed by party prejudices. [Mr. CRAWFORD explained. He did not mean that it had been made a party question in the Senate. His allusion was elsewhere.] I do not think it altogether fair to refer to the discussions in the House of Representatives, as gentlemen belonging to that body have no opportunity of defending themselves here. It is true that this law was not the effect, but it is no less true that it was one of the causes of the political divisions of this country. And if, during the agitation of the present question, the renewal has, on one side, been opposed on party principles, let me ask if, on the other, it has not been advocated on similar principles? Where is the Macedonian phalanx, the opposition in Congress? I believe, sir, I shall not incur the charge of presumptuous prophecy, when I predict that we shall not pick up from its ranks one single straggler! And if, on this occasion, my worthy friend from Georgia has gone over into the camp of the enemy, is it kind in him to look back upon his former friends, and rebuke them for the fidelity with which they adhere to their old principles?

I shall not stop to examine how far a representative is bound by the instructions of his constituents. This is a question between the giver and receiver of the instructions. But I must be permitted to express my surprise at the pointed difference which has been made between the opinions and instructions of State Legislatures, and the opinions and details of the deputations with which we have been surrounded from Philadelphia. Whilst the resolutions of those Legislatures—known, legitimate, Constitutional and deliberative bodies—have been thrown into the back ground, and their interference regarded as officious, these delegations from self-created societies, composed of whom nobody knows, have been received by the committee with the utmost complaisance. Their communications have been treasured up with the greatest diligence. Never did the Delphic priests collect with more holy care the frantic expressions of the agitated Pythia, or expound them with more solemnity to the astonished Grecians, than has the Committee gathered the opinions and testimony of these deputies, and through the gentleman from Massachusetts, pompously detailed them to the Senate! Philadelphia has her immediate representatives, capable of expressing her wishes upon the floor of the other House. If it be improper for States to obtrude upon Congress their sentiments, it is much more highly so for the unauthorized deputies of fortuitous congregations.

The first singular feature that attracts attention in this bill is the new and unconstitutional veto which it establishes. The Constitution has required only, that after bills have passed the House of Representatives and the Senate, they shall be presented to the President for his approval or rejection, and his determination is to be made known in ten days. But this bill provides, that when all the Constitutional sanctions are obtained, and when according to the usual routine of legislation it ought to be considered as a law, it is to be submitted to a new branch of the Legislature, consisting of the President and twenty-four Directors of the Bank of the United States, holding their sessions in Philadelphia, and if they please to approve it, why then it is to become a law! And three months (the term allowed by our law of May last, to one of the great belligerents for revoking his edicts, after the other shall have repealed his) are granted them to decide whether an act of Congress shall be the law of the land or not! An act which is said to be indispensably necessary to our salvation, and without the passage of which, universal distress and bankruptcy are to pervade the country. Remember, sir, that the honorable gentleman from Georgia has contended that this charter is no contract. Does it, then, become the representatives of the nation to leave the nation at the mercy of a corporation? Ought the impending calamities to be left to the hazard of a contingent remedy?

This vagrant power to erect a bank, after having wandered throughout the whole Constitution in quest of some congenial spot whereupon to fasten, has been at length located by the gentleman from Georgia on that provision, which authorizes Congress to lay and collect taxes, &c. In 1791, the power is referred to one part of the instrument; in 1811, to another. Sometimes it is alleged to be deducible from the power to regulate commerce. Hard pressed here, it disappears, and shows itself under the grant to coin money. The sagacious Secretary of the Treasury in 1791 pursued the wisest course—he has taken shelter behind general, high sounding, and imposing terms. He has declared, in the preamble to the act establishing the bank, that it will be very conducive to the successful conducting of the national finances; will tend to give facility to the obtaining of loans, and will be productive of considerable advantage to trade and industry in general. No allusion is made to the collection of taxes. What is the nature of this Government? It is emphatically federal, vested with an aggregate of specified powers for general purposes, conceded by existing sovereignties, who have themselves retained what is not so conceded. It is said that there are cases in which it must act on implied powers. This is not controverted, but the implication must be necessary, and obviously flow from the enumerated power with which it is allied. The power to charter companies is not specified in the grant, and I contend is of a nature not transferable by mere implication. It is one of the most exalted attributes of sovereignty. In the exercise of this gigantic power we have seen an East India Company created, which has carried dismay, desolation, and death throughout one of the largest portions of the habitable world. A company which is, in itself, a sovereignty—which has subverted empires and set up new dynasties—and has not only made war, but war against its legitimate sovereign! Under the influence of this power, we have seen arise a South Sea Company, and a Mississippi Company, that distracted and convulsed all Europe, and menaced a total overthrow of all credit and confidence, and universal bankruptcy. Is it to be imagined that a power so vast would have been left by the wisdom of the Constitution to doubtful inference? It has been alleged that there are many instances, in the Constitution, where powers, in their nature incidental, and which would have necessarily vested along with the principal power, are nevertheless expressly enumerated; and the power “to make rules and regulations for the government of the land and naval forces,” which, it is said, is incidental to the power to raise armies and provide a navy, is given as an example. What does this prove? How extremely cautious the Convention were to leave as little as possible to implication. In all cases where incidental powers are acted upon, the principal and incidental ought to be congenial with each other, and partake of a common nature. The incidental power ought to be strictly subordinate and limited to the end proposed to be attained by the specified power. In other words, under the name of accomplishing one object which is specified, the power implied ought not to be made to embrace other objects, which are not specified in the Constitution. If then you could establish a bank to collect and distribute the revenue, it ought to be expressly restricted to the purpose of such collection and distribution. It is mockery, worse than usurpation, to establish it for a lawful object, and then extend it to other objects which are not lawful. In deducing the power to create corporations, such as I have described it, from the power to collect taxes, the relation and condition of principal and incident are prostrated and destroyed. The accessory is exalted above the principal. As well might it be said that the great luminary of day is an accessory, a satellite to the humblest star that twinkles forth its feeble light in the firmament of heaven!

Suppose the Constitution had been silent as to an individual department of this Government, could you, under the power to lay and collect taxes, establish a judiciary? I presume not; but if you could derive the power by mere implication, could you vest it with any other authority than to enforce the collection of the revenue? A bank is made for the ostensible purpose of aiding in the collection of the revenue, and while it is engaged in this, the most inferior and subordinate of all its functions, it is made to diffuse itself throughout society, and to influence all the great operations of credit, circulation, and commerce. Like the Virginia justice, you tell the man, whose turkey had been stolen, that your book of precedents furnishes no form for his case, but then you will grant him a precept to search for a cow, and when looking for that he may possibly find his turkey! You say to this corporation, we cannot authorize you to discount—to emit paper—to regulate commerce, &c. No! Our book has no precedents of that kind. But then we can authorize you to collect the revenue, and, while occupied with that, you may do whatever else you please!

What is a corporation such as the bill contemplates? It is a splendid association of favored individuals, taken from the mass of society, and invested with exemptions and surrounded by immunities and privileges. The honorable gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. LLOYD) has said that the original law, establishing the bank, was justly liable to the objection of vesting in that institution an exclusive privilege, the faith of the Government being pledged that no other bank should be authorized during its existence. This objection he supposes is obviated by the bill under consideration; but all corporations enjoy exclusive privileges—that is, the corporators have privileges which no others possess; and if you create fifty corporations instead of one, you have only fifty privileged bodies instead of one.

I contend that the States have the exclusive power to regulate contracts, to declare the capacities and incapacities to contract, and to provide as to the extent of responsibility of debtors to their creditors. If Congress have the power to erect an artificial body and say it shall be endowed with the attributes of an individual—if you can bestow on this object of your own creation the ability to contract, may you not, in contravention of State rights, confer upon slaves, infants, and femes covert, the ability to contract? And if you have the power to say that an association of individuals shall be responsible for their debts only in a certain limited degree, what is to prevent an extension of a similar exemption to individuals? Where is the limitation upon this power to set up corporations? You establish one, in the heart of a State, the basis of whose capital is money. You may erect others whose capital shall consist of land, slaves, and personal estate, and thus the whole property within the jurisdiction of a State might be absorbed by these political bodies. The existing bank contends that it is beyond the power of a State to tax it, and if this pretension be well founded, it is in the power of Congress, by chartering companies, to dry up the whole of the sources of State revenue. Georgia has undertaken, it is true, to levy a tax on the branch within her jurisdiction, but this law, now under a course of litigation, is considered as invalid. The United States own a great deal of land in the State of Ohio; can this Government, for the purpose of creating an ability to purchase it, charter a company? Aliens are forbidden, I believe, in that State, to hold real estate—could you, in order to multiply purchasers, confer upon them the capacity to hold land, in derogation of the local law? I imagine this will hardly be insisted upon; and yet there exists a more obvious connexion between the undoubted power, which is possessed by this Government, to sell its land, and the means of executing that power, by increasing the demand in the market, than there is between this bank and the collection of a tax. This Government has the power to levy taxes—to raise armies—provide a navy—make war—regulate commerce—coin money, &c. It would not be difficult to show as intimate a connexion between a corporation, established for any purpose whatever, and some one or other of those great powers, as there is between the revenue and the Bank of the United States.

Let us inquire into the actual participation of this bank in the collection of the revenue. Prior to the passage of the act of 1800, requiring the collectors of those ports of entry, at which the principal bank or any of its offices are situated, to deposit with them the custom-house bonds, it had not the smallest agency in the collection of the duties. During almost one moiety of the period to which the existence of this institution was limited, it was noways instrumental in the collection of that revenue, to which it is now become indispensable! The collection, previous to 1800, was made entirely by the collectors; and even at present, where there is one port of entry, at which this bank is employed, there are eight or ten at which the collection is made as it was before 1800. And, sir, what does this bank or its branches when resort is had to it? It does not adjust with the merchant the amount of the duty, nor take his bond; nor, if the bond is not paid, coerce the payment by distress or otherwise. In fact it has no active agency whatever in the collection. Its operation is merely passive; that is, if the obligor, after his bond is placed in the bank, discharges it, all is very well. Such is the mighty aid afforded by this tax-gatherer, without which the Government cannot get along! Again, it is not pretended that the very limited assistance which this institution does in truth render, extends to any other than a single species of tax, that is duties. In the collection of the excise, the direct and other internal taxes, no aid was derived from any bank. It is true, in the collection of those taxes, the farmer did not obtain the same indulgence which the merchant receives in paying duties. But what obliges Congress to give credit at all? Could it not demand prompt payment of the duties? And in fact does it not so demand in many instances? Whether credit is given or not, is a matter merely of discretion. If it be a facility to mercantile operations (as I presume it is) it ought to be granted. But I deny the right to ingraft upon it a bank, which you would not otherwise have the power to erect. You cannot create the necessity of a bank, and then plead that necessity for its establishment. In the administration of the finances, the bank acts simply as a payer and receiver. The Secretary of the Treasury has money in New York and wants it in Charleston;

the bank will furnish him with a check, or bill, to make the remittance, which any merchant would do just as well.

I will now proceed to show by fact, actual experience, not theoretic reasoning, but by the records themselves of the Treasury, that the operations of that department may be as well conducted without as with this bank. The delusion has consisted in the use of certain high-sounding phrases, dexterously used on the occasion. "The collection of the revenue"—"The administration of the finance"—"The conducting the fiscal affairs of the Government," the usual language of the advocates of the bank, extort express assent, or awe into acquiescence, without inquiry or examination into its necessity. About the commencement of this year there appears, by the report of the Secretary of the Treasury of the 7th of January, to have been a little upwards of two millions four hundred thousand dollars in the Treasury of the United States; and more than one-third of this whole sum was in the vaults of local banks. In several instances, where an opportunity existed of selecting the bank, a preference has been given to the State bank, or at least a portion of the deposits has been made with it. In New York, for example, there was deposited with the Manhattan Bank $188,670, although a branch bank is in that city. In this District, $115,080 were deposited with the Bank of Columbia, although here also is a branch bank, and yet the State banks are utterly unsafe to be trusted! If the money, after the bonds are collected, is thus placed with these banks, I presume there can be no difficulty in placing the bonds themselves there, if they must be deposited with some bank for collection, which I deny.

Again, one of the most important and complicated branches of the Treasury Department is the management of our landed system. The sales have some years amounted to upwards of half a million of dollars, are generally made upon credit, and yet no bank whatever is made use of to facilitate the collection. After it is made, the amount in some instances has been deposited with banks, and according to the Secretary's report, which I have before adverted to, the amount so deposited was in January upwards of three hundred thousand dollars, not one cent of which was in the vaults of the Bank of the United States, or in any of its branches, but in the Bank of Pennsylvania, its branch at Pittsburg, the Marietta Bank, and the Kentucky Bank. Upon the point of responsibility, I cannot subscribe to the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury, if it is meant that the ability to pay the amount of any deposits which the Government may make under any exigency, is greater than that of the State banks; that the accountability of a ramified institution, whose affairs are managed by a single head, responsible for all its members, is more simple, than that of a number of independent and unconnected establishments, I shall not deny; but, with regard to safety, I am strongly inclined to think it is on the side of the local banks. The corruption or misconduct of the parent, or any of its branches, may bankrupt or destroy the whole system, and the loss of the Government in that event will be of the deposits made with each; whereas in the failure of one State bank the loss will be confined to the deposit in the vaults of that bank. It is said to have been a part of Burr's plan to seize on the branch bank at New Orleans. At that period large sums, imported from La Vera Cruz, are alleged to have been deposited with it, and if the traitor had accomplished his design, the Bank of the United States, if not actually bankrupt, might have been constrained to stop payment.

It is urged by the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. LLOYD,) that as this nation progresses in commerce, wealth, and population, new energies will be unfolded, new wants and exigencies will arise, and hence he infers that powers must be implied from the Constitution. But, sir, the question is, shall we stretch the instrument to embrace cases not fairly within its scope, or shall we resort to that remedy, by amendment, which the Constitution prescribes?

Gentlemen contend that the construction which they give to the Constitution has been acquiesced in by all parties, and under all Administrations; and they rely particularly on an act which passed in 1804, for extending a branch to New Orleans, and another act, of 1807, for punishing those who should forge or utter forged paper of the bank. With regard to the first law, passed no doubt upon the recommendation of the Treasury Department, I would remark, that it was the extension of a branch to a Territory, over which Congress possesses power of legislation almost uncontrolled, and where, without any Constitutional impediment, charters of incorporation may be granted. As to the other act, it was passed no less for the benefit of the community than the bank—to protect the ignorant and unwary from counterfeit paper, purporting to have been emitted by the bank. When gentlemen are claiming the advantage supposed to be deducible from acquiescence, let me inquire what they would have had those to have done who believed the establishment of the bank an encroachment upon State rights? Were they to have resisted, and how? By force? Upon the change of parties, in 1800, it must be well recollected that the greatest calamities were predicted as consequences of that event. Intentions were ascribed to the new occupants of power of violating the public faith and prostrating national credit. Under such circumstances, that they should act with great circumspection was quite natural. They saw in full operation a bank, chartered by a Congress who had as much right to judge of their Constitutional powers as their successors. Had they revoked the law which gave it existence, the institution would, in all probability, have continued to transact business notwithstanding. The Judiciary would have been appealed to; and, from the known opinions and predilections of the judges then composing it, they would have pronounced the act of incorporation, as in the nature of a contract, beyond the repealing power of any succeeding; Legislature. And, sir, what a scene of confusion would such a state of things have presented—an act of Congress, which was law in the statute book, and a nullity on the judicial records! Was it not wisest to wait the natural dissolution of the corporation, rather than accelerate that event by a repealing law involving so many delicate considerations?

When gentlemen attempt to carry this measure upon the ground of acquiescence or precedent, do they forget that we are not in Westminster Hall? In courts of justice, the utility of uniformity of decision exacts of the judge a conformity to the adjudication of his predecessor. In the interpretation and administration of the law, this practice is wise and proper; and without it, everything depending upon the caprice of the judge, we should have no security for our dearest rights. It is far otherwise when applied to the source of legislation. Here no rule exists but the Constitution; and to legislate upon the ground merely that our predecessors thought themselves authorized, under similar circumstances, to legislate, is to sanctify error and perpetuate usurpation. But if we are to be subjected to the trammels of precedents, I claim, on the other hand, the benefit of the restrictions under which the intelligent judge cautiously receives them. It is an established rule, that to give to a previous adjudication any effect, the mind of the judge who pronounced it must have been awakened to the subject, and it must have been a deliberate opinion formed after full argument. In technical language, it must not have been sub silentio. Now, the acts of 1804 and 1807, relied upon as pledges for the re-chartering this company, passed not only without any discussions, whatever, of the Constitutional power of Congress to establish a bank, but I venture to say, without a single member having had his attention drawn to this question. I had the honor of a seat in the Senate when the latter law passed; probably voted for it; and I declare, with the utmost sincerity, that I never once thought of that point; and I appeal confidently to every honorable member who was then present to say if that was not his situation.

This doctrine of precedents, applied to the Legislature, appears to me to be fraught with the most mischievous consequences. The great advantage of our system of government over all others is, that we have a written Constitution defining its limits and prescribing its authorities; and that, however for a time faction may convulse the nation, and passion and party prejudice sway its functionaries, the season of reflection will recur, when calmly retracing their deeds, and all aberrations from fundamental principle will be corrected. But once substitute practice for principle, the expositions of the Constitution for the text of the Constitution, and in vain shall we look for the instrument in the instrument itself. It will be as diffused and intangible as the pretended Constitution of England; and it must be sought for in the statute book, in the fugitive journals of Congress, and in reports of the Secretary of the Treasury. What would be our condition if we were to take the interpretations given to that sacred book, which is or ought to be the criterion of our faith, for the book itself? We should find the Holy Bible buried beneath the interpretations, glosses, and comments of councils, synods, and learned divines, which have produced swarms of intolerant and furious sects, partaking less of the mildness and meekness of their origin than of a vindictive spirit of hostility towards each other. They ought to afford us a solemn warning to make that Constitution, which we have sworn to support, our invariable guide.

I conceive, then, sir, that we are not empowered by the Constitution, nor bound by any practice under it, to renew the charter of this bank, and I might here rest the argument. But, as there are strong objections to the renewal upon the score of expediency, and as the distresses which will attend the dissolution of the bank have been greatly exaggerated, I will ask your indulgence for a few moments longer. That some temporary inconvenience will arise, I shall not deny; but most groundlessly have the recent failures in New York been attributed to the discontinuance of this bank. As well might you ascribe to that cause the failures of Amsterdam and Hamburg, of London and Liverpool. The embarrassments of commerce, the sequestration in France, the Danish captures—in fine, the belligerent edicts are the obvious sources of these failures. Their immediate cause is the return of bills upon London, drawn upon the faith of unproductive or unprofitable shipments. Yes, sir, the protests of the notaries of London, not those of New York, have occasioned these bankruptcies.

The power of a nation is said to consist in the sword and the purse. Perhaps, at last, all power is resolvable into that of the purse, for with it you may command almost everything else. The specie circulation of the United States is estimated by some calculators at ten millions of dollars; and if it be no more, one moiety is in the vaults of this bank. May not the time arrive when the concentration of such a vast portion of the circulating medium of the country in the hands of any corporation will be dangerous to our liberties? By whom is this immense power wielded? By a body who, in derogation of the great principle of all our institutions, responsibility to the people, is amenable only to a few stockholders, and they chiefly foreigners. Suppose an attempt to subvert this Government, would not the traitor first aim, by force or corruption, to acquire the treasure of this company? Look at it in another aspect. Seven-tenths of its capital are in the hands of foreigners, and these foreigners chiefly English subjects. We are possibly upon the eve of a rupture with that nation. Should such an event occur, do you apprehend that the English Premier would experience any difficulty in obtaining the entire control of this institution? Republics, above all other nations, ought most studiously to guard against foreign influence. All history proves that the internal dissensions excited by foreign intrigue have produced the downfall of almost every free Government that has hitherto existed; and yet gentlemen contend that we are benefited by the possession of this foreign capital. If we could have its use, without its attending abuse, I should be gratified also. But it is in vain to expect the one without the other. Wealth is power, and under whatsoever form it exists its proprietor, whether he lives on this or the other side of the Atlantic, will have a proportionate influence. It is argued, that our possession of this English capital gives us a certain influence over the British Government. If this reasoning be sound, we had better revoke the interdiction as to aliens holding land, and invite foreigners to engross the whole property, real and personal, of the country. We had better at once exchange the condition of independent proprietors for that of stewards. We should then be able to govern foreign nations, according to the arguments of gentlemen on the other side. But let us put aside this theory, and appeal to the decisions of experience. Go to the other side of the Atlantic, and see what has been achieved for us there by Englishmen holding seven-tenths of the capital of this bank. Has it released from galling and ignominious bondage one solitary American seaman, bleeding under British oppression? Did it prevent the unmanly attack upon the Chesapeake? Did it arrest the promulgation, or has it abrogated the Orders in Council—those orders which have given birth to a new era in commerce? In spite of all its boasted effects, are not the two nations brought to the very brink of war? Are we quite sure that, on this side of the water, it has had no effect favorable to British interests. It has often been stated, and, although I do not know that it is susceptible of strict proof, I believe it to be a fact, that this bank exercised its influence in support of Jay's treaty; and may it not have contributed to blunt the public sentiment, or paralyze the efforts of this nation against British aggression?

The Duke of Northumberland is said to be the most considerable stockholder in the Bank of the United States. A late Lord Chancellor of England, besides other noblemen, was a large stockholder. Suppose the Prince of Essling, the Duke of Cadore, and other French dignitaries owned seven-eighths of the capital of this bank, should we witness the same exertions (I allude not to any made in the Senate) to recharter it? So far from it, would not the danger of French influence be resounded throughout the nation?

I shall give my most hearty assent to the motion for striking out the first section of the bill.

Mr. POPE.—Mr. President, in rising on this occasion, I never more entirely obeyed both my feelings and my judgment. The principle involved in the decision about to be given, is in my view of more magnitude than any which has been presented for our consideration since I had the honor of a seat here. It is no less than whether we shall surrender to the State governments the power of collecting our revenue and rely upon the old system of requisitions. We are called upon to return to that state of imbecility and chaos from which this political fabric was reared by the wisdom and patriotism of the first statesmen of which any age or nation can boast. For twenty years we have collected our revenue, borrowed money, paid our debts, and managed our fiscal concerns through the agency of a national bank. That it has answered the most sanguine expectations of its authors; that it has been well managed, is admitted by the most decided opponents to the renewal of the charter. Although in public debate, in newspapers, court-yards, muster-fields, &c., we have heard much of dangerous powers, violations of the Constitution, British influence, and poisonous vipers, &c., &c., which were to sting to death the liberties of the people, yet we find ourselves as free almost as the air we breathe, and hardly subservient to the mildest code of laws by which any nation was ever governed. In the city of Philadelphia, and the State of Pennsylvania generally, where these animals called banks have grown to the most enormous size, we find as sound morals, and as much real practical republicanism, as in those parts of the Union, where the rattling of this viper's tail has never been heard, and in point of solid wealth and internal improvements, mark the contrast. We are required to disregard the lessons of that best teacher, experience, and to try some new scheme. However captivating new theories and abstract propositions were a few years since, I believe the thinking men of all parties in the nation are perfectly convinced that one ounce of experience and common matter of fact sense is worth more for the purposes of legislation than a ship-load of theory and speculation. We are told that we must force into the vaults of the bank a large portion of the circulating medium, and thereby depress the price of everything in the market; we must give a shock to credit of every kind, check, and embarrass every branch of agricultural, commercial, and manufacturing industry; give up the young mechanics, manufacturers, and merchants with small capitals a prey to the cupidity of moneyed men; who will be tempted to withdraw their funds from trade to speculate on the wrecks of the unfortunate. This is not mere matter of calculation. I only state facts proved to us by the most unquestionable evidence. We are not only, sir, to ruin many innocent and unoffending individuals, but to derange the national finances; and for what is all this to be done? To promote the public good or advance the national prosperity? No, sir, it is not pretended. We are gravely told that we, the Representatives of the people, must sacrifice the people to save the Constitution of the people, whose happiness and welfare it was intended to secure. If this be true, it is indeed a strange Government under which we live. I advance the opinion with confidence, that no principle which, in its practical effects, outrages the common sense and feelings of mankind, can be a sound one, and we ought to examine it well; and hesitate much before we give our assent. To bring distress on the country, not to prevent a violation of any positive provision of the Constitution; but to correct what we suppose to have been an erroneous construction of it by our predecessors, of which neither the States nor the people have ever complained, appears to me more nice than wise.

Disguise this question as you will, sir, and still it will clearly appear to be a contest between a few importing States and the people of the United States. Resolutions have been already laid on our table by gentlemen from the two large States; from which instructions have been received in substance, requiring Congress to give up to the State banks the collection of the national revenue. I am, Mr. President, on the side of the people of the United States. This is indeed a question of party, but of a very different character from that which will be attempted to be palmed on the people. It is a contest between the friends and enemies of the Federal Constitution revived; for, if I am not mistaken, the power of laying and collecting imposts and duties was strongly objected to by some of the large States having advantageous seaports, before the Constitution was adopted. I am for preserving both the States and the Union. I consider the safety and independence of the several States and the liberties of the people inseparably connected with and dependant on the efficiency of the National Government, and it is to me unaccountable that gentlemen in favor of strong measures against foreign nations should be so solicitous to strip the General Government of this very essential part of its power. We were told, a few days since, that our Army was so insignificant and contemptible, that it would require a constable, with a search warrant, to find it. I have heard another gentleman of very high standing suggest the propriety of retroceding the ten miles square to the States of Virginia and Maryland. Our gunboats are almost rotten. We have not more frigates and other armed vessels than sufficient to carry our Ministers and diplomatic despatches to foreign Courts, and if we yield to the States the collection of our revenue, what will remain of the Federal Government with which the people can identify their feelings or affections? In what will this Government consist? It will be a mere creature of the imagination—a political fiction. And, analogous to the fiction in the action of ejectment, we shall have to suppose its existence, and then bottom our proceedings upon that supposition. If I was hostile to our Federal Union, or wanted to prepare the public mind for a surrender of this happy system of Government, I would join in the hue and cry against this institution; I would support every measure calculated to destroy all confidence in and respect for this Government both at home and abroad; I would endeavor to produce throughout the country confusion and disorder, and a state of glorious uncertainty; then persuade the people to seek security and tranquillity under some other form of Government. The transition from a wild, factious democracy, to despotism, is often easy and generally sudden. The extremes are very nearly allied. A Republican Government, guided by the virtue and intelligence of a nation, is the first of human blessings, but when directed by the angry, vindictive passions of party, the worst of which the imagination can conceive. A Republic, to be durable, must inspire confidence and respect. Such instability, such variable unsettled policy as now appears to be the order of the day, could not have been anticipated by any man blessed with a tolerable degree of faith in the success of this great republican experiment. Mr. President, I have ever been opposed to yielding to the commercial interest an undue influence in this Government, but I am unwilling to make an unnecessary and wanton attack upon them. Coming from an agricultural State, I am not disposed to increase the jealousies which unfortunately exist, and thereby weaken the ties by which these States are held together. I am sensible, too, how much the prosperity of the State I represent depends on a prosperous state of trade, and although the shock from the dissolution of this bank will be first felt in the commercial cities, it must immediately react to the extremes of the empire. I know many are under an impression that Federalists and British agents are to be the victims; but very different will be the result. I refer to the evidence detailed by the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. LLOYD.) But is it possible that an intolerant spirit of party has prepared us for this? Are gentlemen ready to injure their country, weaken our Federal Union, the sheet-anchor of our political safety, to reach their political opponents? I will not believe it. When I see around me some of the soldiers of the Revolution, actuated I am sure by nobler views; when I see the professors of a religion which teaches us to love our neighbors as ourselves, I cannot persuade myself that Christian charity, and all the noble, generous feelings of the human heart are extinguished by this demon, party spirit. If there be a man in the nation who can witness with unfeeling apathy the distresses of his fellow-citizens, he would have figured in Smithfield in the bloody reign of Queen Mary of England, in binding heretics to the stake; or in the sanguinary time of Robespierre, in adding victims to the guillotine; but he is unworthy the blessings of a free Government.

Sir, I address the Senate under circumstances discouraging indeed. I have been told, and on this floor, that debate is useless; that no man's opinion is to be changed; that I shall find verified in the decision of this question the sentiment contained in two lines of Hudibras—"He that is convinced against his will, is of the same opinion still." I cannot admit this. I know there are gentlemen fully sensible of the evils about to befall their country, without any obstinate pride to conquer, who would rejoice at being convinced it is in their power to avert them. Let me entreat them to pause and reflect, before they inflict a wound on their country's interest, under the influence of Constitutional doubt; and if they err, I would ask them, would it not be more safe and patriotic to err in favor of the people? Permit me now, sir, to redeem this subject from the Constitutional difficulties with which it has been encumbered.

To form a correct opinion, we must retrospect the defects of the old Government, and ascertain the remedy which was anticipated in the present Constitution. I believe it will be conceded that the great cause of the inefficiency of the former was not because their principal field of legislation was too limited, but was owing to its dependence on the States for the means to carry their powers into effect. For the truth of this position, I appeal to the history of that day—to the candor of gentlemen who hear me. The present Constitution was framed for national purposes, with ample authority to pass all laws necessary and proper for the attainment of its objects, independent of State authority, except so far as expressly made dependent by the Constitution. The erroneous impressions with regard to this bank have arisen from ignorance of facts, relative to the practical fiscal operations of the Government, and from confounding an original, independent power, to establish banks and corporations, with a necessary auxiliary to the execution of the powers given. By the Constitution it is expressly declared, that Congress shall have power to pass all laws necessary and proper to carry into effect the powers previously enumerated, and all other powers vested in the Government of the United States, or any department or officer thereof. Our power to create a bank is not derived by implication. No, sir. If this express delegation of power had not been inserted, we must have implied the authority to provide the means necessary and proper, &c.

But the Convention, with a full knowledge of the defects of the old Confederation, and deeply impressed with the necessity of an efficient national Government, determined to exclude all doubt by granting to the new Government, in express and unequivocal language, ample authority to use all means necessary and proper for the attainment of the ends for which it was instituted. If a man was requested to look at the Constitution and decide whether power is given to Congress to create a bank, or corporations generally, he would answer in the negative. This would very naturally be the answer of most men upon the first blush of the Constitution. It is not pretended that Congress have power to create corporations as an independent proposition. The authority to establish a bank or corporations is only contended for so far as it can be fairly considered as a necessary and proper auxiliary to the execution of the powers granted by the Constitution. The question of constitutionality depends upon facts, debors the instrument, of which we must be informed before we decide, and which could not be ascertained before the attempt was made to give motion and energy to this political machinery. If the fact be ascertained, by the best evidence the nature of the subject affords, that a bank is necessary and proper to effectuate the legitimate powers of Government, then our power is express, and we need not resort to implication. To prove to the satisfaction of the Senate and the world, this material fact, will be my business before I request their assent to the position assumed, that Congress have an express power to incorporate a bank. To do this it is indispensable that we should understand the practical financial concerns of the Government, or have the information of those who do. We appropriate money for fortifications on the report of our engineer, Colonel Williams, and for the Capitol, &c., upon the report of Mr. Latrobe. To know how much timber or other materials are necessary for a ship or a house, you must understand the subject yourself, or have the information of those who do. For myself, I am ready to admit that I rely much upon the information and experience of others. To ignorant men, and those who do not profess to be fully acquainted with the nature and management of the national finances, the following evidence is presented. The first, and with many, perhaps the best, not heretofore particularly noticed, which I shall offer, is the Congress of 1781, which established a national bank, called the Bank of North America, during our revolutionary struggle, the utility and necessity of which was ascertained by the experience of that day.

It is worthy of remark, that they created a bank under powers much more limited than ours. That act was not passed precipitately, but was the result of the most mature and deliberate consideration. I beg leave to read the preamble of the law which contains the opinions of that Congress with regard to the utility and necessity of a National Bank. "Whereas Congress, on the 26th day of May last, did, from a conviction of the support which the finances of the United States would receive from the establishment of a National Bank, approve a plan for such an institution submitted to their consideration by Robert Morris, Esq., and now lodged among the archives of Congress, and did engage to promote the same by the most effectual means; and whereas the subscription thereto is now filled, from an expectation of a charter of incorporation from Congress, the directors and president are appointed, and application has been made to Congress by the said president and directors for an act of incorporation: and whereas the exigencies of the United States render it indispensably necessary that such an act be immediately passed—Be it therefore ordained," &c. This act passed on the 31st day of December, 1781. And here permit me to observe that this National Bank, styled the Bank of North America, was not produced by British influence or party spirit. No, sir, the little, slanderous, intriguing partyism of the present moment was unknown to the patriots of that awful period. They had no party but their country—liberty and independence were their objects. Their souls were fired with a noble, a generous enthusiasm, on which Heaven looked down with pleasure. It appears from the journals of the Congress of 1781, that the members from every State were unanimous in favor of a National Bank, except Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, and Virginia—the two members from Massachusetts voted against it, the two members from Pennsylvania were divided—of the four from Virginia, Mr. Madison alone voted against it. Here it is evident that, in the very infancy of our Republic, before indeed it could with propriety be said to be born, when every bosom glowed with enthusiasm for liberty and a pure disinterested patriotism, a National Bank was not thought that dangerous, dreadful monster, which the very wise and exclusive patriots of 1811 are endeavoring to represent it to the American people. And the construction given to the grant of powers in the Articles of Confederation by the Congress of 1781, is strong evidence of our right to establish a bank under a grant of powers much more ample, and with money concerns vastly more extensive and complicated.

The next evidence I shall adduce for the consideration of the Senate, is the opinion of the late General Hamilton, appointed by President Washington, the first Secretary of the Treasury; whose province and duty it was to superintend the national finances. His attention was therefore particularly directed to the subject, and, in a very able report to the first Congress, assembled under the new Constitution, he recommended a National Bank. Although opinions have been imputed to this gentleman, very foreign to my feelings and notions about Government, yet he has ever been acknowledged, by the candid and liberal of all parties, one of the first American statesmen. For reasons, which it is unnecessary for me to assign, I will not press his opinion upon the attention of the Senate, but will introduce other and perhaps less exceptionable testimony. The Congress of 1791, which incorporated the present bank, merits the highest regard. It was composed of the most enlightened and distinguished men in America, many of whom had been members of the convention, and were fully apprized of the defects of the old and the objects of the new Government. A large majority of both branches voted in favor of the bank. They were not divided on the question by party. Many who have continued with the Republican party under every Administration voted in favor of this bank. Although different speculative or abstract political opinions were then entertained, yet the spirit and passion of party had not diffused itself so generally through the nation as at a subsequent period. The next authority in favor of this bank, and one which must at all times and on all occasions command the highest respect, is no less than our immortal Washington. He was President of the United States in 1791, when this bank law passed. After it had received the sanction of both branches of the Legislature, with that circumspection and prudence which regulated his conduct through life, he consulted the able men who composed his Cabinet Council on the Constitutional question; they differed in opinion; he heard their arguments for and against the measure; and, after full consideration, approved the law. I cannot yet, sir, take leave of this very important testimony in favor of the bank. The opinion of our Washington has the strongest claim to our confidence. Let us pause before we disregard his solemn advice. This is the hero who led our armies to victory; this is the Washington, who, at the close of our Revolutionary war, disbanded a disciplined army in the bosom of the Republic, and voluntarily exchanged the splendid robes and ensigns of military power for the plain, humble garb of a private citizen. This Washington, who continued an American, a Republican in heart and in sentiment, until summoned to the mansions of bliss; yes, sir, this illustrious departed hero, this practical statesman, has solemnly declared to the American people that a National Bank is a necessary and proper auxiliary to the execution of the national powers. The last authority I shall particularly notice in support of this institution, is the opinion of the present Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Gallatin. If this gentleman cannot boast of the military laurels which have adorned the brows of the patriots I have mentioned; as a statesman and faithful public servant, he stands inferior to none. Mr. Gallatin, from his first appearance on the theatre of public life, has been considered by all parties an able financier. At a very early period the finances of the United States became the subject of his particular attention and inquiry; the result of which was a treatise, published in 1796, called "Gallatin on the finances of the United States," in which he gives a decided opinion in favor of this bank. I rely much on his opinion at that period, because it must have been the result of conviction, and not of any party feeling or consideration, as he was then in the minority, and continued in it until the Administration changed. His report to the Senate during the last session of Mr. Jefferson's Administration, and his letter to the committee, show, that time and experience, so far from changing, have confirmed him in the opinion he first formed on the subject; to which I might add every Administration and almost every man practically acquainted with our money concerns. Is not this mass of evidence sufficient to substantiate the facts upon the existence or non-existence of which the constitutionality of this measure depends? I put the question to the candor and good sense of gentlemen, whether they are not satisfied, in the language of the Constitution, that a National Bank is necessary and proper to effectuate the legitimate powers of the National Government? If they answer in the negative, I can only say, he who will neither regard the suggestions of experience, nor believe the report of the great political disciples who have gone before us, would not believe though one were to rise from the dead. And what is the answer to all this out of doors? Why, that we are not to be governed by the information or opinion of others, however well acquainted with the subject; we are so self-sufficient as to disregard the best lights which can be presented to us. The cry is up to the hub, down with the bank, huzza for the party! So long, Mr. President, as I shall be honored with a seat in the Senate of the Union, I am determined to respect my station and my own feelings and character too much to be driven along by any such idle, ridiculous clamor.

To all the high authority I have mentioned in support of a National Bank, may be opposed the names of some great men of Virginia, who have long since, I hope, got rid of their errors and prejudices; among others will probably be mentioned the name of the present President, who voted against the present bank in 1791, and against the Bank of North America in 1781; no man has a higher respect than myself for his virtues and wisdom, but I believe it is not pretended that he ever was a practical financier. No State can boast of more genius, eloquence, and talents than Virginia; it will, however, be conceded, that no people are more deficient in practical knowledge of finance and the nature of moneyed institutions. Indeed they were, a few years since, frightened at the very name of a bank—as soon as they heard of one, they began to write books, make speeches, and pass resolutions, to lay this ghost of tyranny. It required all the eloquence of my honorable friend from that State, (Mr. BRENT,) to persuade the Legislature that the little Bank of Alexandria would not sweep away their liberties. The talents and boldness with which he on that occasion assailed the prejudices of Virginia, instead of injuring him, inspired the people with the highest confidence in his integrity and firmness; since, however, they have become acquainted with this bank animal, they find it perfectly harmless, and no people in the Union are more disposed to foster them.

The people, in framing this instrument, have avowed the objects for which it was created. They say in the preamble, "We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare, and to secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America." After declaring by whom and in what manner the legislative power shall be exercised, the qualifications of the electors and elected, the terms, &c., for which the Senators and Representatives shall be respectively chosen, and making various other provisions relative to the legislative department, they proceed to enumerate the principal cardinal powers granted to Congress: among others, that the "Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States; but all duties, imposts, and excises, shall be uniform throughout the United States; to borrow money on the credit of the United States; to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and with the Indian tribes; to establish a uniform rule of naturalization, &c.; to coin money; regulate the value thereof; to declare war, &c.; to raise and support armies, &c.; to raise and maintain a navy."

At the close of this catalogue, of what I shall call cardinal powers, they have inserted the general provision before noticed. "To make all laws necessary and proper for carrying into effect the foregoing powers and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof." This provision contains a general authority as to the means necessary to carry into effect the national powers. The Convention could not foresee or define what laws in the progress of the Government the varying circumstances of the nation might require, and therefore wisely submitted them to the discretion of Congress, to be exercised on facts and circumstances, as they occurred. It has been said this discretion may be used, and so may every other power given to Congress—the security of the people against the abuse of this or any other power is their own virtue and intelligence, and the responsibility of their public servants. The question on every law bottomed on this clause of the Constitution must be, whether it is necessary and proper, or, in other words, fairly suited to, and well calculated for, legitimate national objects; and if it can be fairly considered necessary and proper, and is not prohibited, then it is certainly within the pale of the Constitution.

The Constitution may with propriety be compared to a ship finished as to all the substantial parts before she is put to sea. The people have built the national vessel, directed in what manner the commanders are to be chosen, and made it their duty to provide sails, rigging, seastores, &c., necessary and proper to enable her to perform the voyages for which she was destined; and those appointed to navigate her are not only bound to provide what is necessary and proper for those seas where temperate and gentle breezes are to be met with, but fit her to encounter the most tempestuous seasons.

As I heard much said about absolute, indispensable necessity, I may be pardoned for giving what I consider the sound interpretation of the words "necessary and proper" in the Constitution. This idea of absolute, indispensable, &c., must have originated in an excessive jealousy of power or a decided hostility to the Federal Union. This instrument was framed by and for the people of the United States, and, in the language used, was certainly intended to be understood in that sense in which it is used and understood by them generally. If you ask a plain man what are the necessities of life, he will answer, something below luxury and extravagance, what is calculated to afford him reasonable comfort. Neither a house nor a bed is absolutely or indispensably necessary to a man's existence; he could live in a camp and sleep on boards, or on the ground, yet, the common sense of mankind would respond, they are necessary and proper. If a man had a journey to make, either to Richmond, in Virginia, or Lexington, in Kentucky, although every person would pronounce a coach and six superfluous and unnecessary, all reasonable men would say, he ought to have a horse or a hack, but it will not be pretended that either are indispensable, because he could perform it on foot. If a gentleman from Baltimore gives his agent instructions to provide everything necessary for an East India voyage, what would he expect? Certainly that he should avoid unnecessary expense, but would consider him acting within the pale of his authority if he procured only what was reasonably necessary and proper, or, in other words, what was fairly suited to the master and crew, and well calculated to enable the vessel to reach her port of destination. That interpretation is correct which best accords with the common sense and understanding of mankind. It must, therefore, be evident that the only question as regards the constitutionality of the measure to be decided is a question of fact, and that is, whether a National Bank is reasonably necessary and proper, or fairly suited to, and calculated for, the collection of our revenue and the management of our money concerns. And this fact appears to be admitted by the gentlemen opposed to the bill, for their arguments are predicated upon the probability that the State banks will answer the national purposes. This is a complete surrender of the Constitutional objection; for, if banks be necessary and proper, it follows that we have a Constitutional power to create them, and it will be a mere question of expediency whether we will use State banks or a National Bank. My colleague (Mr. CLAY) has asked for the congeniality between a bank and the collection of our revenue? The argument in favor of using State banks shows it, but let the use hitherto made of the bank answer the question. Is not a bank a proper place for the deposit and safe-keeping of money—more so than the custom-house? Is it not a convenient agent for paying and receiving money? Through the agency of this bank our revenue, or the greater part of it, has been collected, our financial transactions done, and public money transmitted to such places as the necessities of the Government required. The revenue collected at Boston, Baltimore, or any other port, is paid, if required, at New Orleans, Natchez, St. Louis, or any other place, without risk or expense. The money in the bank and its branches is payable at such of them as the convenience of the Government may require, and, by this arrangement, we can command the whole of the public money in any quarter of the Union without risk or expense. The operations of this institution have been confined to the seaboard. The principal bank is at Philadelphia, with a branch at New York, Boston, Baltimore, Washington, Norfolk, Charleston, Savannah, and New Orleans. At all which places, the Government has considerable revenue to collect. No branches have been extended into the interior. It has been connected with our fiscal arrangements at all the places to which it has been extended, and may be fairly deemed a convenient, necessary, and appropriate auxiliary to the management of the national concerns. It is said that the revenue is collected at many ports where none of these branches are placed. This is true; the bank and branches are fixed only at the principal seaports, where a large amount of revenue is collected.

Every one draws into its vaults, subject to the demands of Government, the revenue collected at the less important ports in the same quarter of the country. Boston being the commercial emporium of New England, the Government, by the agency of the branch bank there, is enabled to draw to that point most of the revenue received at the numerous ports in that quarter of the Union. The repeated sanctions this bank has received from the different Administrations, and especially from Mr. Jefferson and the Republican party, by authorizing the extension of a branch to New Orleans, and selling one million of the stock, the property of the United States, to British subjects, for four hundred thousand dollars more than the nominal amount is indeed strangely accounted for; gentlemen say the Government were bound to fulfil their engagements, and that the charter, being in the nature of a contract, was sacred. I had thought the fashionable doctrine was, that an unconstitutional law was wholly null and void. It has been held, by some of the States. However plausible the answer to the argument of acquiescence, it furnishes no apology for a positive confirmation. Permit me to assimilate a common case between individuals to the case before us: a man in Washington executes a joint power to five trustees in Kentucky to collect his debts, settle his land business, &c., and authorizes them to take all steps necessary and proper to effectuate the trust or power; in the progress of the business a measure is suggested as necessary, about which there is a diversity of opinion among the trustees. A majority, however, decide that it is within their authority; the principal is informed of it, does not complain or disavow, but positively and by the strongest implication assents to the construction given by his agents. In such a case there would be but one opinion. In 1791 a National Bank is proposed to Congress; they differ as to the constitutionality, a large majority decide in favor of it; the people and the States are informed of the measure, the States do not protest, nor do the people complain; many of the States pass laws to protect the institution, it receives the confirmation of three or four different Administrations, and particularly of the one composed of men originally opposed to it; it violates no positive provision of the Constitution; no mischiefs have been produced, but great convenience and advantage has been experienced by the Government and community. I ask whether, under such circumstances, the question ought not to be considered settled? Is no respect due to the opinions of our predecessors? Is a question of construction never to be at rest? Why is a judge, sworn to support the laws and Constitution of the country, bound by a train of decisions contrary to his own opinions? Because, the good, the peace, and tranquillity of society require it. The conduct of a court, as well as every department of Government, must be regulated in its course in some measure by a regard for the public weal. It is worthy of remark that, notwithstanding all the fuss about implied and incidental powers—if you except the sedition law, which was supposed to violate a positive provision of the Constitution—the same practical construction has been given to this instrument by every Administration of the Government. Indeed, the sphere of national legislation has been more enlarged under Mr. Jefferson's than any other Administration. All parties have found that the national vessel could not be navigated without sails, rigging, and everything necessary and proper. Whence was derived a power to pass a law laying an embargo without limitation? There is nothing in the Constitution about embargoes. Whence did we derive a power to purchase Louisiana, and incorporate it with the good old United States? There is no express delegation of power to purchase new territory. On these subjects the Constitution is silent. I have approved both. No State can lay an embargo, or acquire new territory. Our power to perform these acts results from the nature of the national sovereignty created by this Constitution. The Republican Administrations have no pretensions to the approbation of the people on the ground of having restrained any latitude or liberality of construction. Their claim to the public confidence is founded on very different considerations. They have repealed the internal taxes, paid a large part of the public debt, purchased Louisiana, and preserved to the nation the blessings of peace. For these acts, they have, I believe, the thanks of the nation. They have mine, most sincerely.

Great stress is placed on the twelfth article of the amendments to the Constitution, which declares the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people. I must confess that I cannot discover what influence this can have on the bill under consideration, or any other measure which may be proposed. It appears to me to have been adopted rather to quiet State jealousies and popular fears than with a view to produce any positive effect, for the inquiry must ever be, Is the power given? And if granted, it is not retained. The supporters of this bill do not pretend to usurp any power retained by the States or the people, but contend that the power to pass the bill is expressly delegated, if the facts assumed are true.

It is not pretended that our fiscal concerns can be managed with gold and silver. If our territory was of no greater extent than Rhode Island, Delaware, or the city of Philadelphia, gold and silver would answer the purposes of the Government, but it would require a number of pack horses and wagons to transport the public money in gold and silver, over this immense country, to the different places where it is wanting. Our extensive commerce, and the great extent of this empire, renders a paper medium necessary. Is the power to create this paper medium, or national currency, an attribute of State or national sovereignty? I put the question to the candor of gentlemen, and solicit a serious answer! The argument of my honorable friend from Georgia against the power of the States to authorize the emission of bank paper, founded on that part of the Constitution which declares that "No State shall emit bills of credit," acquires great additional force, when these bills of credit are made to assume the character of money, for national purposes. In the same article the power to coin money is expressly prohibited to the States, and in the catalogue of cardinal powers granted to this Government, is that to coin money. It will, perhaps, be contended that this only applies to gold and silver, but if that be admitted to be the literal meaning of the words, still it is evident that what shall be the national currency, whether specie or paper, is a proper subject of national legislation. No gentleman will be so absurd as to insist that any State or States ought to coin the current money of the United States. That the power of the States to establish banks may be questioned with at least great plausibility, is perfectly clear, but as this banking power has been so long exercised, as the National and State banks have conducted their operations very harmoniously, as no serious evils call for national interference, I am not for disturbing the existing state of things; it is better, perhaps, that the banking power should be divided between the States and the United States. That bank paper, if good, is in fact money, although not made a legal tender, cannot be denied. The currency of this bank paper of the United States, although made by law receivable in payment of revenue, rests upon a much better foundation than an act of Congress. Its national character, the extended operations of this bank from Boston to New Orleans, have given it credit with the people of every part of the empire, more than the bank paper of any particular State can be expected to have; so that, by common consent, this money coined by the national bank has become the current money of the United States. I hope we shall never be driven to the necessity of compelling our citizens by law to receive our paper. We should so guard and regulate our banking operations as to make the national paper at least equal to gold and silver, in every quarter of the Union.

If this bank is removed, the Secretary of the Treasury must nationalize the bank paper of the great importing States; for, I presume, Congress will never decide what State paper shall be used by the officers of the General Government. Most of the public money is now collected and deposited in the Bank of the United States; if that is destroyed, the Secretary of the Treasury is to deposit in the State banks, and with him is the power of selection—a power and patronage greater than any ever exercised by any officer in this nation. The deposits of the public money are sought after with great avidity, by all the State institutions. He can deposit the whole in one, or divide it between two, or three, or all the banks in any one place. He can change them at pleasure. He may, with great apparent fairness and propriety, make it a condition with every bank where deposits are made that they shall ad-point a certain portion of the directors of his nomination, and through them he can reach the credit of any man who may have accommodations in it. It is true we have now a man at the head of the Treasury who may not be disposed to abuse this power, but we may not always have such an officer. This immense power and influence may be exercised in an invisible manner, and, of course, without responsibility. Is this republican? It was not a few years ago. I have always understood that one of the strongest and most popular objections to the Federal Administration was their disposition to increase Executive patronage.

We are told that our remittances to foreign countries and to different parts of the United States can be made in bills of exchange. This, to be sure, is possible, but this mode is less convenient and more hazardous. I believe the Government has sustained no loss in the remittances made to Europe through the agency of this institution. They are able, through the medium of their several branches, to ascertain the credit and solvency of every commercial house in the United States, and thereby to purchase bills for foreign remittances with safety. The great punctuality secured to the Government in the payment of their revenue by their agency, is also an object of some consequence.

Much alarm and delusion have been artfully spread through the country about a violation of the Constitution and a consequent destruction of our republican institutions. I fear the people are unfortunately led to believe that the security of their liberty depends too much upon paper barriers, and too little upon their own virtue and intelligence. It appears to me that the Constitution is occasionally made a mere stalking horse, to serve the purposes of unprincipled demagogues and pretended lovers of the people, to get into power to the exclusion of honest men. They, with great address, distract and inflame the public mind about some nice Constitutional question, or abstract proposition, and thereby bring the people to decide, not which candidate is the most entitled to their confidence, but who rides the finest electioneering hobby. We are misled very much, I believe, by theories and terms more applicable to other Governments than our own. In Great Britain, they speak with great propriety of the Government and people, because there is in that country an immense power independent of the people. But here, where every public functionary is responsible to, and the Government in the hands of a majority of the people, those terms do not appear to me applicable in the sense in which they are used in other countries. My reflections and practical observations on the Government incline me to the opinion that, with regard to measures of general policy, not assailing individual liberty or right, or the independence of any State, there is not that danger to be apprehended from a liberal construction of the Constitution which gentlemen seem to imagine. So long as the Government is in the hands of the people, measures affecting the whole nation, if oppressive or inconvenient, will be resisted, and corrected by the public feeling and opinion. This is not mere theory. Look at the State of Connecticut, one of the best regulated democracies in ancient or modern times, whose Legislature is as omnipotent as the British Parliament. What people enjoy more real liberty and independence? In what country is to be found more practical, intelligent republicanism? Those principles which secure the rights of the citizen and the responsibility of their public servants are held sacred, but the Legislature is, I believe, unrestricted with regard to measures of general policy. It is a truth which ought to be deeply impressed on the American mind, that the preservation of this republican system depends more upon the virtue and intelligence of the people, and the responsibility of their public servants, than paper restrictions. It is unfortunate that every measure calculated to advance the national prosperity is arrested by some Constitutional difficulty. The bills respecting the Ohio and Delaware canals, which passed the Senate, have been opposed in the other House by the same Constitutional obstacles urged against this bank. I may be asked if I am opposed to any limitation on the powers of the Government? to which, I answer no. I think the nature of the powers to be exercised by the General Government ought to be defined with as much precision as the imperfection of human language and foresight are capable of. The convention acted wisely in giving no more latitude than was necessary to the success of the experiment. Not because I think them so essential to the security of the rights of the people as to prevent unpleasant and dangerous collisions of authority between the National and State governments. In the application of this instrument, by the different men and parties, to the ground supposed to be embraced by it, some trivial variation from what may be deemed by many the true political meridian was to be expected, and a small allowance is, perhaps, due to human fallibility. It will be some time before the boundary line will be plainly marked by usage and practical construction. So far as it has been ascertained, and any question of power settled by common consent, every consideration connected with the good of our country forbids us to disturb it. Gentlemen endeavor to alarm us with a thousand imaginary dangers. They say, suppose Congress were to do this, that, and the other monstrous thing. You may suppose anything, and make what deductions you please. Suppose the people were to destroy their own liberties, what then? Their liberties would be destroyed. Suppose they were all to collect on the bank of the Potomac, plunge into the stream, and drown themselves; why, to be sure, they would be drowned, but, does it follow that there is any danger of their doing either? All this supposing seems to accord better with a sentiment advanced by a celebrated Senator a few years since, "that the people's worst enemies are themselves," than the generally received opinion respecting the nature of this Government.

This bill, probably, is opposed by many under an expectation of a new national bank. As this question will, at least, appear to be decided on Constitutional ground, their expectations will hardly be realized. Indeed, it is questionable whether either foreigners or our own citizens will again vest money in a national bank. The fall of this will throw a large portion of the banking capital into the banks of the great commercial States, whose influence and hostility will be increased against a new national institution. But why put down one national bank to raise up another? How are the people to be benefited by it? I shall be told, perhaps, that the direction ought to be changed. And what will be this change? Why, merely putting out one set of moneyed men to put in another, who will very soon be the same. If this be the object, I will only observe,

"Strange there should such difference be
"Twixt tweedledum and tweedledee."

It is but the difference between Hopkins and Sternhold, and Sternhold and Hopkins. A new national bank, with an increased capital, would, to be sure, open a new field of speculation and increase that influence of which gentlemen pretend to complain; for, if moneyed men retain their confidence in our institutions, the same motives which induced foreigners to purchase seven millions of the present stock, will induce them to purchase the stock of the new bank. I hear, with some astonishment, gentlemen opposed to this bill, and particularly my friend from Tennessee, (Mr. ANDERSON,) declaim with such apparent earnestness about the danger of this institution with a capital of only ten millions of dollars, when I recollect the partiality they manifested for a bill before us last year, which proposed to create a national bank with a capital of thirty millions. On the motion to postpone that bill till the first Monday in December last, in substance a motion to reject, it will be found by reference to the Journals that most of those opposed to this voted against the postponement. If this bank of ten millions is such a viper, a thirty million bank would, indeed, be a monster. Gentlemen may say that, although they voted against postponement, they intended, ultimately, to vote against the passage of the bill. Let this be conceded, and still their votes evince a decided preference of the new to the present institution. I voted for the postponement because I was not entirely convinced of its constitutionality, nor was I satisfied with the details. The banking operations of the present institution are confined to the seaboard, and may be considered a necessary and proper mean subordinate to the end of aiding the finances, but the bill I have mentioned, contemplated an extension of branches into every part of the country, to places where the General Government had no revenue to collect, and the creation of it might, perhaps, be deemed the exercise of an independent, original power, transcending the limit of an auxiliary measure. I do not design to give a decided opinion of the constitutionality of it at this time. Other substantial objections to that bill will suffice to justify my vote, if necessary. If the object of gentlemen was to eradicate the banking system from the country, I might, in obedience to my former prejudices, be more disposed to join them. But this is not even pretended. The sole object in the death of this, is, to generate more of these vipers, under State or federal authority.

The people of the United States, through the medium of the National Government, have within their control that portion of the moneyed capital vested in this bank, which is not only a convenient agent, in the management of the finances, but furnishes loans to the Government, to answer occasional deficiencies in the revenue. If we relinquish entirely our power over the moneyed capital, will not the influence of the interior States be diminished, and that of the commercial States increased? The importing States will have the moneyed capital; the greater part of our revenue will be collected by their banks, and we shall not only be dependent on them for loans, but they can at any time withhold our revenue, without the interposition of force.

The sum required to be paid by the stockholders, is strongly objected to. And why, sir? Is there any thing unreasonable in this provision? The privileges and benefits, to be enjoyed by them, they will derive from the people of the United States; for which, justice requires them to pay the people an equitable equivalent. This sum is demanded in the nature of a tax on the privilege granted. The premium contemplated with the probable advance on the five millions of stock, authorized to be subscribed by the United States, will amount to about three millions of dollars. They are to pay three per cent on the public deposits, which will, I suppose, without pretending to have made an accurate estimate, amount to several millions more during the term of incorporation; so that this bill, if passed into a law, will bring into the national treasury five or six millions of dollars, for the benefit of the people of the United States; and what are we about to do! Why, sir, give it up to the large States on the seaboard, in whose banks, we are told by gentlemen on the other side, this very dangerous foreign capital will be vested, and our revenue deposited. Well may those States clamor about State rights and State interests, but how the interest or importance of Kentucky in the Union, or of any State where none of the national revenue is collected, is to be advanced by the destruction of this institution, I am not conjurer enough to discover.

It might be contended with some plausibility, that this Government is under an implied obligation to continue this bank upon equitable terms, and with reasonable modifications. The present stockholders, both citizens and foreigners, have paid for every 100 dollars they own from 140 to 150 dollars. The Government sold at about that advance a few years ago. When the Congress of 1791 passed the law declaring that there should be a national bank, did they intend it to be a temporary institution? In the numerous transfers of stock which have taken place, was it so understood? Could it have been expected that a Government, which declared a national bank necessary and proper, the first twenty years of its existence, would dispense with it afterwards? The limitation of the corporation to that period was very proper. It is highly expedient that these charters should return occasionally into the power of the people, to afford them an opportunity of revising and correcting them; besides, such a limitation, by increasing their dependence, gives some security to the community against abuses. Has not the conduct of the Government authorized an expectation, that this bank would be continued? And if it has, are they not bound by the rules of morality to fulfil that expectation, unless the Constitution or public good clearly forbid it?

Although this subject has received much false coloring through the country, by charges of British influence, &c., I did not expect to hear it from an honorable Senator of the United States—it has not indeed been positively asserted, but hinted in such a manner as to make an impression on the community. Some stale circumstances connected with the British treaty have been very unnecessarily lugged in to increase the prejudices against this bill. It has been insinuated, that British influence, operating through this institution, has prevented the Government from taking strong measures against Great Britain; but in what manner this has been effected, gentlemen have not been good enough to explain. Did it prevent Mr. Jefferson from taking a war course? For I believe it is generally understood that he was opposed to a war. Has it operated upon the present Executive? Such a suggestion will not be made. I have, during my service here, given a fair and faithful support to the Administration, and I have certainly voted for stronger measures than they were willing to accept. It is due to the 10th and 11th Congresses, who have been so much abused, to state, that their course, as regards the question of peace or war, has been in perfect unison with the views of the late and present Presidents. Let it not be inferred that I am disposed to find fault; I believe when we consider the very extraordinary state of the foreign world, and retrospect the embarrassing circumstances which have surrounded us, the course pursued by them ought to be deemed substantially correct, certainly so as respects their leading object, which has been to avoid making this country a party in the present war. If I was disposed to censure, it would be for not making an effort to chastise some of the British armed vessels which lay in our waters after the affair of the Chesapeake, in open contempt of the President's proclamation; if a single vessel had been driven out or compelled to strike her colors, it would have healed the wound inflicted on the national pride and feeling, committed by the Leopard.

That this Government should have an influence with foreign Governments proportioned to the interest their subjects have in our funds, is probable, but how this interest gives them an influence here I am at a loss to perceive: foreigners cannot even vote in the appointment of directors. If there is any reality in this idea of foreign influence through this institution, why did gentlemen permit the present stockholders to be incorporated into the bill introduced last year? And why was not a provision inserted to prevent foreigners from purchasing additional stock?

We are told too of their partiality in discounts. I might answer this argument, by asking, what bank or what administration has not been partial? What member of this Senate has never used his influence in favor of his friends against men, perhaps, of more merit? If partial evils or small improprieties are to authorize a war of extermination against our institutions, none would prove so immaculate as to escape the general catastrophe. By the bill reported, an odious feature in the present charter, granting an exclusive privilege, is expressly repealed, and the Government authorized to subscribe stock and appoint directors. This will give us a sufficient control to guard against all the evils, real or imaginary, which have been complained of. I have heard no gentleman advocate a simple renewal of the charter. This charge of partiality on the score of party, at least for the last twelve years, has been completely repelled by the deputation of five from the mechanics and manufacturers of Philadelphia, and let it be remembered, too, that these men are republicans of the first water. We are arraigned, sir, for the great attention and respect shown to the two deputations from Philadelphia, one in behalf of the mercantile, the other of the manufacturing interest; from the latter we received the most of the facts which have been detailed to the Senate. They did not come armed with any political resolutions to influence our deliberations; no, they were sent to represent the embarrassments of the commercial and manufacturing classes in Philadelphia, arising from the apprehended dissolution of the bank. And was it improper in the committee to hear them? Their candor and respectability were not doubted by those of the committee most opposed to the bank. Is anything more common in England than for Parliament to hear witnesses, and even counsel, in behalf of any class of men whose interest is supposed to be affected by a measure depending before them? And shall we deny to American citizens privileges enjoyed by British subjects?

Gentlemen say the embarrassments in Philadelphia could not have been occasioned by the Bank of the United States, because they continue to discount as usual. If I recollect the evidence—and I hope to be corrected if I mistake it—it was this—that the calling in of ten per cent. on their debts occasioned such a pressure, that they were prevailed upon to extend their discounts until the ultimate decision of Congress should be known. I have heard it seriously urged that the evils and inconveniences to be experienced from its dissolution, prove it to be a dangerous institution; the same argument would prove that the Government ought to be destroyed. Nothing, indeed, seems too absurd for the human mind to seize upon, when under the influence of passion or misguided zeal.

I must omit, Mr. President, many of the remarks I intended to offer to the Senate on this bill—I owe it to other gentlemen who wish to express their views. Before I sit down, I beg leave to say a few words about the liberty or tyranny of the press. Tyranny is to me, sir, a hideous fiend in every possible form. A press well conducted is invaluable; but this palladium of our rights may, if permitted to exercise an undue influence, be made the instrument to entomb the liberties of this people. With what indignation would an attempt through the medium of the press, to intimidate a court or jury in relation to a controversy while pending, be viewed; and what course would be taken? I need not answer the question. And is it not equally important that our deliberations should be free from an improper and irresponsible influence? After I have given my vote, I am ready to meet investigation; but this system of abusing and denouncing members who may speak or vote for or against a measure depending before Congress, is a monstrous outrage upon the independence of the National Legislature; and every attempt of editors to influence their decision by assailing or exciting unfounded prejudices against them respecting a subject upon which they are deliberating ought to be reprobated and resisted by every friend to his country.

If it is once understood that Congress are controlled by the dictatorial arrogance of the press, what will be the consequence? However pure the press may now be, if it should become an object with a foreign nation to give a direction to our measures, or of a junto of assassins behind the curtain to proscribe every honest, independent man from the confidence of the people, a sufficient number of them will be purchased at any price, and through this medium, if well combined and organized, an unseen power will guide our Councils.

My honorable friend from Georgia has been reminded of the Macedonian phalanx. I trust, sir, we shall ever be found associated with a phalanx American, Republican, in heart and sentiment. I will not sacrifice the interests of my constituents for fear of being called hard names. The epithets of quidism, quadroonism, or any other ism which malice or policy may suggest, shall not drive me from the course called for by the public good. I am proud that I represent a people just, generous and independent, not to be carried away by unmeaning clamor. Before they discard a public servant, they will view him both on the political theatre, and in the walks of private life. They know, too well, that those are not always the best Christians who sing hallelujahs on the house top, nor have they forgotten the celebrated Sempronius, who, on the approach of Cæsar, thundered war in the Roman Senate, and at the same time was secretly co-operating with the traitor to overthrow the liberties of the Roman people.

Deeply impressed, Mr. President, with the opinion, that the rejection of this bill will give at least a temporary check to the prosperity of the rising State from which I come, I shall give my negative to the motion to strike out the first section. Yes, sir, not only the interest, but importance of that State in the Union is about to be sacrificed. When I look beyond the mountains, and remember that Kentucky has nurtured me almost from my cradle, that she has bestowed on me her choicest honors, my bosom is filled with emotions of gratitude, which impel me to say on this, as on all other occasions, Kentucky, I am only thine!

SATURDAY, February 16.

Mr. CUTTS, from the committee, reported the bill to enable the Georgetown Potomac Bridge Company to levy money for the object of its incorporation, correctly engrossed; and the bill was read the third time as amended, and passed.

The bill, entitled "An act authorizing the Secretary of State to cause a general index to the laws of the United States to be made, printed, and distributed," was read the second time, and referred to a select committee to consider and report thereon; and Messrs. FRANKLIN, GILMAN, and REED, were appointed the committee.

The bill, entitled "An act for establishing trading houses with the Indian tribes, was read the second time, and referred to a select committee to consider and report thereon; and Messrs. SMITH, of Maryland, FRANKLIN, and BRADLEY, were appointed the committee.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate and House of

Representatives of the United States:

I now lay before Congress the treaty concluded on the 10th of November, 1807, on the part of the United States, with the Great and Little Osage tribes of Indians, with a view to such legal provision as may be deemed proper for fulfilling its stipulations.

FEB. 16, 1811.

JAMES MADISON.

The Message was read, and laid on the table.

The PRESIDENT communicated a letter from the Governor of the State of Ohio, enclosing a resolution of that Legislature, approving the measures of the General Government; which were read.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to amend and continue in force an act, entitled "An act to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States, passed on the 25th day of April, 1791;" the motion to strike out the first section being under consideration.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland said, that in seconding the motion to strike out the first section of the bill, he had pursued a course which in his opinion was the most correct. When I first took a seat in Congress (said he) the course of proceeding was to fix the principle by resolution, and, that once fixed, to send it to a committee to report a bill. By a motion to strike out the first section the principle will be tried, and the Senate, if the motion fails, will go into a discussion of the provisions of the bill. This I conceive a better course, than for the Senate to go into discussion of the details of a subject which would probably be ultimately rejected on the general ground of principle.

The gentleman who introduced this subject spoke with great animation and with great feeling against the press or presses which have undertaken to give their opinions upon this great and important question. He spoke with much warmth, and said that whoever knew him would not believe that he would permit himself to be driven out of his opinion by any man or set of men. There is no man, sir, the least acquainted with the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. CRAWFORD) but will believe his declaration. But another result may be apprehended, that those who feel so great an offence at the freedom the press has taken, may be driven into the opposite course by the irritation of their feelings. Certainly those feelings must have been extremely strong with the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. POPE) to have induced him to terminate his speech with an oration hostile to the press. Are the gentlemen from Georgia and Kentucky the only Senators who have had their feelings wounded by the conduct of the press upon this subject? Sir, if the gentleman's opinions and sentiments have been censured by one description of presses, he may find consolation in having been greatly eulogized in others. For more than a year those on the same side of this question with myself have had their opinions tortured into every shape to destroy them in the estimation of the people; not only in this session but during the last. Sir, there are some presses in the Union which could not exist, whose papers would not be read, but for the discussion of individual character. Is any advantage to be derived from complaining of this? It results from the nature and temper of our Government, and the best way I have ever found to treat it, is with silent contempt. He who does otherwise engages in the contest at a great disadvantage, and will seldom come out the victor. In the same presses of which those gentlemen complain, I have seen them both eulogized, and properly, for their conduct on the subject of the embargo and West Florida questions.

If the press be an evil in this respect, we must submit to it; those gentlemen who take a high and prominent stand must expect to be noticed. Sometimes gentlemen will be put down by the press, but, their conduct being correct, will more frequently be written up by its abuse.

It has been objected that this question is discussed on the ground of party; and the gentleman from Georgia, as I understood him, said, that this had been made a party question elsewhere, and might be so here. [Mr. CRAWFORD said he had mentioned no place, but had said that this might be made a party question.] I understood the gentleman to say, said Mr. S., that this may again be made a party question. But for this observation of the gentleman the subject of party would probably not have been introduced at all; and we must indeed shut our eyes or we cannot avoid seeing that this is made a party question, at least on one side. Do you see one gentleman, one solitary gentleman of one party, discriminated generally as Federal, who does not vote for this measure throughout? Do you see one public body in Philadelphia or New York which has a majority of Federal directors or agents, which has not come before you with memorials drawn up with the ingenuity of lawyers, to impose on your judgment? Have not the same party prepared memorials and got the subscription of every one of their caste, bringing forward nearly the same number of petitioners as they have of Federal voters? Have they not done so in Baltimore? Of that city I would say as little as may be, for being a manufacturing as well as a commercial city it has stirred up an animosity in some gentlemen against it not easily accounted for. In Baltimore, on a warmly contested election, the Federal party mustered eight hundred and fourteen votes, all they could parade with their every exertion. To the petition for the renewal of the charter of the bank, there are eight hundred and forty-odd signatures! They have gained some few since the latest contest. Is this coincidence of members, this exclusively Federal petitioning, no mark of party? They have also got one public body in Baltimore to memorialize in favor of the bank; the rest were not to be intimidated by the threats of the Bank of the United States. What, sir, have the other party done? Have they disturbed the quiet of either House? Have they brought forward the mass of their voters as signers to petitions? No, sir, they have trusted the subject to their Representatives, confiding in their disposition and ability to speak their sentiments. The representation of New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Norfolk, and Charleston, in the other House, have opposed the renewal of the charter. Every city high in estimation as a commercial city is opposed to the renewal of the charter, except Boston. This speaks with a strong voice what are the feelings of the people; stronger evidence cannot be presented to the human mind. Far be it from me, sir, to endeavor to work up the feelings of party spirit on this occasion; but the thing itself was one of the first causes which created the present parties and separated man from man, and brother from brother. This measure was originally brought forward and adopted when the representation in Congress was not bottomed on an actual supposed census of the people of the United States. Sixty-five members composed Congress then, which was a representation taken by accident. If a proportionate representation had been given to the States according to their population, the law probably would not have passed. The States of North Carolina and South Carolina had each five Representatives, being thus placed on an exact equality. Now North Carolina has twelve. South Carolina only eight. What was the vote then? Out of sixty-five members thirty-nine voted for the bill. It was not, as my friend from Kentucky said, a subject fully discussed or carried by a tremendous majority.

The bank having been formed, it may not be improper for me to take some view of its beginning and its operation. At first its operations were confined to Philadelphia; it extended its branches some time afterwards to Boston, New York, Baltimore, and Charleston. Wherever it extended its influence, dissension commenced; wherever it placed its foot, it became absolutely necessary for the States to erect another bank to counterbalance its pecuniary and political influence. In Philadelphia it began to oppose certain people and turn down their paper. The State of Pennsylvania, in defence of its own citizens, created the Bank of Pennsylvania. Here was a check upon its pecuniary and political operations. I believe I am not mistaken when I say that soon after it commenced in Boston a new bank was established there, from what cause I know not. In Baltimore, sir, it soon taught us a lesson, and we met the lesson as other States had done. Charleston and New York acted in a similar way. Operating as the bank did on the politics of the country before its effects were neutralized by competition, man being man, place him where you will, those concerned in the direction of the bank felt power and exercised it. When the British treaty was pending before Congress the president and directors (as I am informed) themselves carried about a memorial to Congress in its favor, with what view and with what effect may easily be conceived. In Baltimore (until we were able to check them by other banks) its political influence was great. Prior to the great struggle between the parties, in 1793, they did permit one democrat to be within the walls of the sanctuary, (as a director,) a gentleman of as much respectability and independence of character as any one of the direction. He was however (immediately after daring to give his vote in favor of a democratic candidate) put out; and since that time no man of democratic principles has been permitted to enter its walls as a director. Men must shut their eyes to the fact of this being a party institution, when they see that no democrat has been admitted to the direction of the bank but in this city, and New York, where the collector was admitted a director for the purpose of protecting the public money at the instance (it is said) of the Secretary of the Treasury. Can we shut our eyes so as not to see that men hostile to the democratic party, and of course to the success of the administration of the Government, are not the most proper persons to have charge of its pecuniary concerns? I would have been very unwilling to have gone into this part of the subject; but when the gentleman from Kentucky, scarcely able to restrain his rage, cried out, party! party! I was bound to show that it was not those with whom I act who had any agency in pressing the subject of party into the present discussion.

The gentleman from Kentucky reprobrates the system of petty mischievous intrigue for the purpose of carrying measures through Congress.

No man, sir, despises or contemns such conduct more than I do. But on whose side has this intrigue been? It is necessary to put the saddle on the proper horse. Have we gone to insurance companies or corporations of one kind or another? Have we intrigued with the people, to induce them to take sides with us? No, sir, we have been tranquil, we wanted no aid of that kind. Have we sent persons here to intrigue with members, or a deputy to remain here the whole of the last and present session, to explain to Congress the effect of putting down the bank, and threaten them with destruction and ruin to the United States if they passed the measure? No, sir, we have had no one here. Have we stirred up the people into town meetings to aid us by memorials? No such thing, sir. Have we called meetings and induced honest mechanics to come here to influence Congress by idle fears, impressed upon them by those who are interested, to tell a tale that shall answer our purposes? No, sir, we have pursued no such course.

Respectable merchants, I observe, form a part of the bank deputies—for what? To represent the late fall of the price of flour as a consequence of the danger of the bank charter not being renewed, and thereby to alarm the minds of members. I am sorry that men of such respectable character did permit themselves to come here on such an errand. I think I have seen in the papers that one of the manufacturers (now here) on being asked to sign a petition for the renewal of the charter for twenty years, said, he would rather cut off his right hand than sign it; he wished only a renewal for a short time to give the bank an opportunity to wind up its affairs. If this statement be true, and of its truth I have no cause to doubt, it shows the depth of that intrigue which sent this gentleman here, through the instrumentality of his excellent character, to get a renewal of the charter for a period which he never contemplated. These are intrigues for which men ought to blush, and from which, I thank God, we are exempt. At the time these deputies arrived, there were three mechanics of Baltimore here, of character inferior to none, and of wealth inferior to few in Philadelphia, and who would have given a different view of the subject, if they had been asked to appear before the committee. I thought it unnecessary—I wanted no assistance of that kind, no species of intrigue. They did, however, declare, sir, that granting this charter would be a death-blow to the politics of the State of Maryland. They did believe the renewal would be injurious to them, for neither they nor many of the manufacturers of Baltimore had received much advantage from the branch bank; they had their own banks, from which they generally received accommodation. Another species of intrigue is carried on, to wit, by pamphleteering. The press is groaning with pamphlets—for what? To teach the minds of members on this question, the necessity of renewal and probability of destruction to the nation, if their demands are not complied with. Our tables are covered with pamphlets of that tendency. Has there been anything of the kind on our part?

I will now take a view of a part of the subject, into which, permit me to say, I have been pressed by other gentlemen, to wit: What has been the operation of the bank in regard to the collection of duties prior to 1800? Prior to the institution of the bank, the collectors took the bonds of the merchants for duties, received the money, and deposited it for safe-keeping in the State banks, where there were any. After the bank was erected, it had, for some time, but two branches; still the revenue was well collected, I am informed, where the branch banks of the United States were not as where they were, and yet, it is said, we cannot have that reliance or confidence in the banks of the States as we can on the branches of the Bank of the United States. The gentleman from Massachusetts told us that in five New England States there was but one solitary branch bank; and I could not find from anything that the gentleman said, that he apprehended any distress would overtake the New England States. The gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. POPE) told us that, in Boston, the branch was the great bank of deposit; that in the trifling out-ports it was not of so much consequence to have branches, the whole collections being drawn into the branch bank at Boston. In order to show that there is an absolute necessity for these branch banks in the collection of the revenue, the gentleman (Mr. POPE) ought to show that the company can place a bank wherever money is to be collected, without enlarging the present capital; for, if it were extended beyond its present amount, his conscience would be pricked; for, if I understood him, he does not advocate the constitutionality of the bank, if its capital was extended beyond what he supposes to be necessary.

[Mr. POPE said his idea was, that a bank of thirty millions must extend its branches where there was no necessity for them, and where banks of another description were competent to all the ordinary purposes of society.]

And, of course said Mr. S., if the capital extended beyond the limits of the gentleman's idea of necessity, it would be doubtful whether it was Constitutional or not. Can a ten million bank extend itself, as the gentleman contemplates, to every place where the United States have monies to collect? In the State of Massachusetts there are twenty-three collection districts: Boston owns eighty-three thousand tons of shipping; the only branch of the United States' Bank in the State is in Boston, whilst the other ports of that State own two hundred thousand tons of shipping, and have no branch in any of them. The gentleman from Kentucky erred extremely, when he supposed that those towns in Massachusetts which had no branch were of little importance. In the town of Salem, where there is no branch bank, there is, perhaps, more East India trade than from any town in the United States: the town of Nantucket, also, is a great trading place; the town of Portland is a great trading town, and there are a number of other towns of great commerce in Massachusetts, none of which have a branch bank, and yet I am informed from high authority that there are no towns in the Union where the revenue is better collected than in those towns. The branch bank at Boston, then, may be considered as a treasury chest, and has nothing to do with the collections; an office where the Secretary of the Treasury keeps an account to know whether the State banks transmit the money properly to Boston or not. I have been informed, sir, by the Comptroller of the Treasury, that nowhere are collections better made than where there is no branch bank. It is among the most ridiculous of all ideas, to say that the bank has any influence on the payer of the bond. The influence on the payer, is this, and this only, that, if the merchant does not pay his bond when due, he has no longer credit at the custom-house; he is compelled thereafter, and until his bond is paid, to pay the cash for all duties, and in that way only does he suffer. I agree with the Secretary of the Treasury that the creation of banks has contributed to produce greater punctuality of payment; but this arises as well from the State banks as from those of the United States. A note given to an individual now must be paid, or the credit of the signer is lost; but that has no operation as to the collection of the revenue. In case of non-payments of bonds, what course does the bank pursue in relation to custom-house bonds? The same as with ordinary notes. If the bond be not paid when due, the cashier returns it to the collector, who puts it in suit. The bank is a mere place of deposit for the safe-keeping of the bond, and has no farther interest in or discretion over it after its payment is refused. There are in the United States, including the Territories, ten banks, emanating from and including the mother Bank of the United States; and without these banks we are told the revenue cannot be collected. This does appear to me to be one of the most extraordinary arguments that ever entered the mind of man. Let us examine it. In the State of Massachusetts there is but one bank to collect from twenty-three ports, possessing, independent of Boston, one-fifth of the whole tonnage of the United States. There is no bank of the United States in Connecticut, and yet Connecticut pays her duties as punctually as any State in the Union. There is no branch in Rhode Island, and who ever heard that Rhode Island did not pay her duties punctually? Maryland has eight ports and but one branch. Virginia has eleven ports and no branch, but a little one at Norfolk, whose operation is confined within the limits of that town. Where there are no branch banks of the United States in the ports of that State, (Richmond and Petersburg, for instance,) the duties are better paid than where there is a branch—I am authorized to say so. In North Carolina there is no branch bank, and yet there is no difficulty whatever in the collection of the revenue. South Carolina has a branch bank. Georgia, in four ports, has but one branch. My object, it will be observed, is to show that the revenue has been as well collected where there were no branch banks, as where they have existed. Let me tell the gentleman, (Mr. POPE,) that the banks of the United States afford no facility in the collection of the revenue that it is possible for them to avoid. I state this, as deducible from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury. He states that there is in the Bank of Manhattan one hundred and eighty-eight thousand dollars of the public money. From what cause did it get there? The truth, it appears, was, that the branch bank of the United States in New York refused to receive Connecticut or Rhode Island paper, and the Secretary of the Treasury was compelled to deposit it in the Manhattan Bank, which bank agreed to receive that paper. Here, then, sir, we see that a State bank, although it gains no advantage from the deposit of New York, yet has accommodated the Treasury by taking and accounting for the bank paper of Connecticut and Rhode Island and placing it in a situation in which it can be made use of with facility. Again, we find that, in Georgetown, the Bank of Columbia has a deposit of $115,000 of public money. How did it get there? The Secretary informs us in his report; "that the deposits in the Bank of Columbia arise from occasional drafts on some collectors in Virginia, and from the receipt of moneys, 'paid at the Treasury for lands, patents, &c., in bank notes not receivable at the office of discount and deposite, Washington.'" That is, sir, the branch bank of Washington refused to receive Virginia paper from those collectors, and refused to give any aid or assistance in the collection of the revenue, except that which went to their own emolument. Not so with the Bank of Columbia; it opened its vaults to all, and if any man desires it he may deposit in the Bank of Columbia the paper of Virginia, Maryland, or Pennsylvania, and the cashier will give him a check on some of the banks of those States for the amount. This they will not do in the branch bank. Do gentlemen suppose that the notes of the United States' Bank pervade the whole United States? No, sir, they do not. Does a gentleman, representing Ohio, bring bank notes of other States to pay for his constituents for land bought of the United States, or debts due in Philadelphia? Can he go to the branch bank and pay them? No, they are not bank notes of the United States, but of the individual States, and the branch bank at Washington will refuse to receive them. The Bank of Columbia, on the contrary, will receive them, and will, if he wishes, pay the money in Baltimore, Philadelphia, or New York, or will pay it here into the Treasury. What bank is it that collects the revenue derived from the sales of Western lands? Not that of the United States, which is represented as indispensably necessary for the collection of the revenue. No, sir, the collection is made by the Bank of Pennsylvania, which bank established a branch at Pittsburg, and collects the money due the United States from the purchasers of public lands, as stated in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury.

There has been one great mistake entertained by a gentleman (Mr. LLOYD) with respect to New Orleans. He supposes that there is no Territorial bank in that city, and asks how the collection of duties will be made without one. The Bank of the United States there has a capital of only $300,000, that of the Territory has $600,000, as good a bank too as any in the United States. And, notwithstanding what has been said, the banks of New Orleans are in as good credit, and have more specie, in proportion to the population of the city, than any banks in the United States. If we should be fortunate enough to obtain a majority for destroying this bill the gentleman need be under no apprehension for any injurious result arising at New Orleans. The public money will be as safe there as in any bank, and we shall find as honorable men directors of the Territorial bank as in that of the branch bank of the United States established in that city.

There is scarcely an evil which has not been attributed to the embargo, and which is not now, with as little justice, attributed to the expected non-renewal of the bank charter. Great failures have lately taken place at New York; bills of exchange on London, to a large amount, have returned protested, and the drawers are not able to pay the holders, and to the present critical situation of the bank some gentlemen attribute the distress brought upon those who have suffered by these failures and protests. But, Mr. President, what is the real cause of those failures? They are confined principally to New York, and may be attributed to the following causes: It is natural for men born in Great Britain to entertain predilections favorable to a commerce with that country, their connexions, as well commercial as of family, are there; their credit is there; and, from those causes, the house which has failed, and carried so many others with it in its fall, has probably directed the principal part of its commerce to England; they have, no doubt, shipped cotton and tobacco, the trade in which being in a great measure confined to Great Britain, the natural consequence has been, that the markets of England were completely glutted; tobacco, except the very fine Virginia, scarcely paid the charges of freight and commission, and the loss on cotton must have been nearly fifty per cent. The consignees, under those circumstances, refused to pay the bills drawn upon shipments of those articles. The bills returned protested, and ruin to the American shipper has been the consequence. At any other time the English merchants would have accepted the bills, and held the cargoes for a better market; but, at that time, ruin stared every man in the face. No man in London knew who to trust, and very few would enter into engagements which they saw any difficulty in meeting. No censure ought to be attached to the American shipper, for, by the usage of trade between the United States and Europe, the American merchant is entitled to draw for two-thirds the amount of his cargo on transmitting invoices and bills of lading with orders for insurance. Other causes have existed to cause the present distress in New York and elsewhere, to wit: the seizure, detention and confiscation of property in Denmark, Prussia, and France, of ships and cargoes to the amount of many millions, on the proceeds of which cargoes merchants calculated to meet their engagements at home, and to meet their bills drawn on London. For, sir, the merchants who make large shipments to the Continent, order the greatest proportion of their proceeds to be remitted from thence to London, and, on the expectation thereof, draw bills on their friends there. Disappointment has been the consequence of such seizures and losses; protests of such bills and ruin has followed. But, Mr. President, we might with as much propriety attribute the late great failures in England and on the Continent to the expected non-renewal of the bank charter, as those which have happened in New York, or the present distress of the merchants in the United States. The returns of the bills protested, to so large an amount, of course destroyed the merchant's credit at bank; he failed, and, by his fall, has caused the ruin of others. When a great house fails, it is like a game of nine pins; knock one down and it will probably carry with it four or five others.

When the honorable gentleman, who was up yesterday, made an observation on the remarks of my friend from Tennessee, (Mr. ANDERSON,) he certainly was not warranted in what he said. He supposed that my friend from Tennessee gave a vote at the last session different from that which he should give now. I can only say for him that he (Mr. ANDERSON) then said, uniformly, "make your bill as good as you can, but I shall vote against it on Constitutional grounds." He wished the bill perfect, if it should pass, though he was fully determined to vote against it.

We have been told, Mr. President, in case the charter should not be renewed, that we shall find in future great difficulty in obtaining loans. What loans, I ask, have Government ever received from the Bank of the United States? I recollect, when I first entered Congress, that Government were indebted for loans made from the bank, but I also recollect that the bank complained of the loans as an inconvenience, and that Congress took the earliest measure in their power to pay them off, and have, since that period, made no new loan from the bank until that made payable the first of January last. I will not inquire whether even that loan was necessary, but I will venture to promise, sir, and will give any security that may be required, that the State banks will give a similar accommodation, to wit: If the Secretary of the Treasury will deposit with the State banks two millions five hundred thousand dollars of the public money, (the amount of the late loan,) they will lend Government to the same amount, and thus do as the Bank of the United States has done, lend you your own money, and very kindly receive from you an interest of six per cent. therefore. We are told that the bank has lately lessened the discounts of individuals ten per cent., and that the merchants are thereby greatly distressed. Is that a fact? If it is, and great distress has ensued therefrom, what will be the distress of the merchants if the bill now before you shall pass; and if, agreeably to its provisions, Congress should (at any time hereafter) call on the bank for the loan of four millions promised by the bill? If, sir, a lessening of their discounts one-tenth per cent. creates distress, what will be the consequence, when, by a loan of four millions, called for from the bank, the bank shall be compelled to lessen the discounts four-tenths?

But, sir, the promise to lend four millions from a bank of ten millions is idle; it is worse, it is deception on the face of it. The loan, if made, would not be from the bank but from the merchants, whose discounts would thereby be lessened, and whose ruin would follow.

We are told that, if the charter of this bank be not renewed, and the funds of the United States be deposited in the State banks, it will be extremely unsafe, because, it is said, we can have no control over them. And, I wish to know, sir, what control we have over the Bank of the United States? None, but the same as we may have over the State banks. We cannot check the operations of the Bank of the United States, and if they obtain this charter, they will know that they can have their charter renewed whenever they please; so that, the fear of a non-renewal of their charter will have no operation on them in future. You will have a much greater control over the State banks, because you are under no obligation to put money in them, and you can change them whenever you think proper; the danger of losing the public deposits will always be a sufficient control over their conduct. The security of the State banks is doubted, however; and we are told, very gravely, indeed, that there is much more security in the mother bank, and her nine children, than in ten independent banks. This I must deny. I should, as a merchant, place more confidence in ten independent houses than in one with nine branches.

At this point, Mr. SMITH—being unwell—gave way for an adjournment.

MONDAY, February 18.

Mr. LEIB presented the memorial of Ralph Edwos, stating that he has a considerable quantity of merchandise imported in the ship George Washington, whereof Luderic Krumbhaar is owner, and which is now under detention, as having arrived subsequent to the revival of the non-intercourse law, and praying relief, for reasons stated at large in the memorial; which was read, and referred to the committee to whom was referred, on the 7th of December, so much of the Message of the President of the United States as concerns the relations between the United States and France and Great Britain, to consider and report thereon, by bill or otherwise.

On motion, by Mr. ANDERSON, the bill for the relief of David Porter, a commander in the Navy of the United States, was recommitted to a select committee, further to consider and report thereon; and Messrs. ANDERSON, FRANKLIN, and GREGG, were appointed the committee.

The Senate resumed the consideration of their amendments, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, to the bill, entitled "An act providing for the removal of the land office established at Nashville, in the State of Tennessee, and Canton, in the State of Ohio; and to authorize the Register and Receiver of Public Moneys to superintend the public sales of land in the district east of Pearl river."

Resolved, That the Senate recede from their amendments, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, to the said bill.

Mr. FRANKLIN, from the committee to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act authorizing the Secretary of State to cause a general index to the laws of the United States to be made, printed, and distributed," reported it without amendment.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Richard Tervin, William Coleman, Edwin Lewis, Samuel Mims, Joseph Wilson, and the Baptist Church at Salem Meeting-house, in the Mississippi Territory, and the bill was ordered to the third reading.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to amend and continue in force an act, entitled "An act to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States, passed on the 25th day of February, 1791."

Mr. S. SMITH said he was not in the habit of asking the indulgence of the Senate, but on the day when he spoke last he had been very unwell. He then had occasion to observe, in answer to the arguments of gentlemen, on the course of proceedings by the bank on its first establishment. It has been observed, said he, by an honorable gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. POPE,) "that the question on the Bank of the United States was not originally a party question, and had not excited much sensibility at the time." When first this question came before Congress, sir, it excited not a little sensation. The doings of the convention having been recent, were then fresh in the minds of such of the members of Congress as had been in that body. To them it was well known that an unsuccessful attempt had been made in that convention to give the power of creating charters. The subject, it is well known, was very fully and amply discussed on the passage of the charter. The honorable gentleman from Georgia has, in the course of his argument, disclaimed all authority, and depends (as every gentleman should) on a fair construction of the instrument itself. Not so with my friend from Kentucky, (Mr. POPE;) he bottomed himself on authority, and called in to his aid the great name of WASHINGTON. He told us also of the able support that measure received from a gentleman for whose virtues and talents he always had the highest respect, although generally differing from him in politics; he meant General Hamilton. He also called in to his aid the opinions of the present Secretary of the Treasury. These, sir, are powerful authorities. General WASHINGTON, it is true, signed the charter, and gave it the sanction of his name and authority. But let it be recollected, sir, that General WASHINGTON demurred on the bank bill till the last hour of the ten days, and that he signed it reluctantly at last. He took the opinion of the then Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Hamilton, on the subject; it was an able one, and he being at the head of the Treasury Department, it had in consequence a powerful effect on the mind of General WASHINGTON. It was as ably resisted in point of argument by the late President of the United States; and however high may be my opinion of the talents of General Hamilton, I must venture to believe, that in point of a discriminating mind, Mr. Jefferson was no wise his inferior. The charter, also, was opposed by the then Attorney General of the United States, (Edmund Randolph,) a man inferior to few in point of legal knowledge; and but for the impression made on General WASHINGTON by General Hamilton, (whose being at the head of the Treasury Department added great weight to his opinion,) he probably never would have signed it. In the discussion of that question a very able part was taken by Mr. Madison. The name of that gentleman as President of the United States has been made use of by the gentleman from Kentucky; I am not certain that we are entirely in order when we undertake to bring into debate the name and opinions of the President of the United States. It having, however, been done, I should presume that I shall not be out of order in pursuing the same course. The arguments of that gentleman on that occasion add another wreath to his fame. Neither was its rejection less ably advocated on that day by my friend from Virginia (Mr. GILES.) In point of authority I produce these, as at least equal to those brought forward by my friend from Kentucky. We are therefore left, as we ought, to exercise our own judgments on this instrument itself, the authorities being counterpoised.

I have already, sir, taken a short view of the course of the proceedings by the bank for the collection of the revenue. Permit me to pursue that point. Prior to the establishment of any branch bank in the United States, the collectors, as I have already stated, did collect each for himself; and, after the money had been so collected, they paid it over into the banks, either of the States or the United States, where it was deposited for safe-keeping, the banks being accountable to the Treasury for the amount. There was no difficulty at that time that I ever heard of in conveying the public money wherever the exigencies of the country might require. After the branch banks were extended, no use was made of them but as places of safe-keeping for the public money. They had no instrumentality whatever in the collection of the revenue prior to the year 1800, simply treasure boxes (if you please) in which the public money was deposited. This was the course of business for nine or ten years after the charter of the Bank of the United States had been created. No use, I repeat, whatever (for nine years of its existence) was ever made of the bank or its branches for the collection of the revenue; they were mere places of safe deposit. If they were necessary and all-essential, why were they not necessary and equally essential at all times? Was not the revenue equally as well collected for the first nine years of their existence as it has been since, and with as little loss to the public? In one thousand and eight hundred, a bill was brought in and passed. If my recollection serves me, I was the author of it. My object, whether I was the author of it or not, was not to aid the collection of the revenue. Such an idea never entered my mind. I knew the collection of the revenue was then well made. What, then, induced me to bring in or advocate that bill? It was this: the collectors gave bond and security when they entered the office; I feared that they might aid those gentlemen who became their securities, and from time to time lend to them (for their private uses) the public money. It appeared to me that it was to the private interest of the collectors, as well as the public interest, to deposite the bonds taken for the revenue in the great towns within the banks of the United States. Prior to 1800, the collectors took the bonds themselves and kept them in their offices. To put it out of their power (if they were so disposed) to lend their friends the public money, I was induced to support that bill; and I have no doubt that it did save the public money in some instances from the effects of the failures in 1798. The bonds in the six great towns were, after that, as the law of 1800 directed, deposited in the bank and its branches, and collected by a short notice being sent from the bank to the merchant, to wit: that his bond became due on a certain day, and the bonds were ever after paid into those banks. The banks had no instrumentality whatever in obtaining (except in that way) payment of those bonds. Compulsory process was not found in the Bank of the United States, but in the revenue laws; if the debtor did not pay the bond when it became due, he lost all credit at the custom-house, and must thereafter pay cash; he is put under the ban. This is a lien on his punctuality, and it is such a lien as secures to Government the punctual payment of the revenue. However unable the merchant may be to pay the debts due to individuals, every exertion will be used by him to pay the debts due to the United States for his bonds. I trust that from this practical exposition of the operation of the banks, (and as far as my information goes, I am bold to say it is a correct one,) that no gentleman will doubt that State banks will be as efficacious in the collection of the revenue as those of the United States have been.

But in the event of a non-renewal, we are asked, how are we to pay the Army and Navy, and the public officers? Precisely in the manner we have always paid them, through the instrumentality of the banks. At New Orleans (where a greater part of our Army now is) the public money will be deposited in the bank of that Territory, consisting of a capital of $600,000—a bank as well and as honorably conducted as that of the United States. For a draft of the Paymaster of the Army of the United States on that bank, the deputy paymasters will have the option to take either paper or hard dollars. I may add, that the Territorial bank paper is as well received and in as good credit as the paper of the branch bank at New Orleans. How is your Navy generally paid off? By a Treasury warrant on the Bank of Columbia, (which is not a branch bank,) and which is paid in branch or other paper at the option of the holder. Would this paper by such means be made a coin of the United States? No, sir, it would have no such effect. If, however, the purser of the Navy should ask specie for his Treasury warrants, the Bank of Columbia would give it to him; it is at his option to take the one or the other. In like manner your public officers will be paid.

In what paper, the gentleman asked, will your duties be collected? In that kind of paper which the collectors or the Secretary of the Treasury will think as secure as that of the United States. If a merchant offers to pay his bond with paper not approved of by the cashier of the State bank, (where the bonds are deposited,) he will refuse to receive such paper. What will be the consequence? The merchant must pay approved paper or specie, or his credit will be lost at the custom-house; the consequence I have already stated. As I have observed, sir, let the gentleman look into the respective States, among the farmers, merchants, and planters, of the interior, and see what proportion of the paper in circulation is that of the United States—I venture to say not one for ten; and it arises from this circumstance, that the agents and factors of the farmers and planters do business principally with the State banks.

But, Mr. President, some kind of inconvenience, it is thought, will result from the dissolution of the bank, because its paper is an universal medium. Sir, there will be an understanding between the banks of the different States; and the Secretary of the Treasury tells you that arrangements are nearly completed to attain that object; the Secretary does not complain of the inconvenience that some gentlemen appear to apprehend. I am of opinion that the more accounts the Treasury opens with the State banks the easier will be the transmission of the public money. What is the present mode of making remittances by individuals from New York to Richmond? A merchant in New York wishes to purchase five hundred hogsheads of tobacco in Richmond. If he applies to the branch bank, and says he wishes to make a remittance for the purpose of purchasing tobacco at Richmond, the branch bank will not, cannot aid him; but if he applies to the Manhattan, Farmers, or Mechanics' Bank, they will take his money and give him a check on Richmond to enable him to make his purchase. Here then is a convenience not afforded by the United States' Bank and its branches. In the same way will the State banks act in relation to the funds of the Government. The Government wants $100,000 at New York. They have it not there, but have it however at Richmond. All the Secretary of the Treasury will have to do, will be to direct the cashier of the Virginia Bank to send $100,000 to New York. It is done every day for individuals, and no inconvenience is experienced. Suppose a merchant in New York wants to buy a cargo in Baltimore; he applies to the branch bank in New York, takes out their notes and sends them to Baltimore to buy his cargo; he will apply to the branch bank of Baltimore, and say, "here are notes of the branch bank of New York, give me money for them?" No, sir, the cashier will not receive them, the branch bank will not take the paper even of the mother bank. They may do it to oblige particular gentlemen, but they are not obliged to do it. I have said that the paper of the mother bank is not a payment to the branches; nor are the bank notes of the branches to the mother bank. Each branch is bound only to receive its own paper, and not that either of the bank or any of its branches. For instance, lately (as I am informed) the branch bank of Baltimore being called on by the mother bank for specie, applied to the Union Bank for specie, for a debt due by that bank of $50,000. Assigning as a reason that they were called upon for specie by the mother bank. The cashier of the Union Bank said, as was natural, we have notes of that bank to the amount of $100,000, we will pay you in them; her own paper will certainly be as good a payment to her as specie. No, was the answer; you must give the specie; and the specie was paid. The Union Bank was in consequence compelled to send to Philadelphia at its expense, for payment of the notes which it held of that very bank. A similar transaction (I have been told) took place between the Mechanics' Bank of New York and the branch bank of that city. I state these cases to show that the paper of the mother bank is not a universal medium, not even payment to her own branches; whereas, in the understanding which exists from Richmond to the Bank of Columbia, from the Bank of Columbia to the bank in Baltimore, and thence to New York, the paper of each will be received by each, and when too great a balance exists against either, its paper is sent to the debtor bank, for which it returns specie. I cannot believe that any gentleman can seriously suppose that bank paper can be considered as coin. It is true that by your law all the paper of the mother bank and its branches, is receivable in payment for duties; but it is not a currency in all cases, because it is not a tender in any, except for duties, and if I owe a note at the branch bank of Baltimore, and offer to pay mother bank paper, it is optional with the branch whether it will receive it or not. I have no way of compelling them to receive it, because no paper is a tender to it, but that of its own branch, except, as I have said, for public dues.

I have been referred by my honorable friend from Georgia (Mr. C.) to the late letter of the Secretary of the Treasury. I have been told by my friend from Kentucky, (Mr. Pope) that he is willing to place his faith on the great talents of the head of the Treasury. I am not going to contest the talents of the Secretary of the Treasury. Nor have I the smallest objection to his letter on this subject as respects the information it has given. I respect it as that of one of the high officers of our Government, and hope I never shall be found (from any fortuitous circumstances) to doubt its due authority. I shall treat it as I would all the reports from the heads of departments, with respect; but I will not be bound by the report or pin my faith (as my friend from Kentucky, Mr. P. proposes to do) on the sleeve of any man breathing. I did not object to this letter, but I had an objection to bringing in by committee a support of this kind, which is to have the preponderating force of a report of the head of a department, to the aid of gentlemen on that side of the question. I did state, and now repeat it, that in 1793 and 1794, so powerful an instrument did such reports become, in support of improper measures, that the House was offended; and the Secretary of the Treasury (Mr. Hamilton) was compelled to confine himself ever after to the handing in reports stating facts, without being allowed to give opinions and to use arguments in support of them. An intimation was given by a resolution of the House, and we had afterwards no arguments sent to us by the Treasury. We received facts, statements, and documents, and were permitted to form our own opinions. A course however has been latterly taken in our proceedings which fully justifies the honorable gentleman from Georgia in the course that he has pursued as chairman, and will also justify the Secretary of the Treasury in the greater part of his letter. I am not to be understood as having (on a former occasion) cast censure on the Secretary of the Treasury for writing the letter; it became his duty to answer the inquiries of the chairman of the committee; he did so. But the letter is now before us, and having been referred to by the gentleman from Kentucky, I will take it up in its parts, and in doing so I have no disposition to inflict the least wound on the feelings of the Secretary of the Treasury. He begins with saying, "Having already in a report to the Senate of March 20, 1809, expressed my opinion in favor of a renewal of the charter of the Bank of the United States, an opinion which remains unchanged, I can only add a few explanatory remarks in answer to the inquiries of the committee, as stated in your letter of yesterday." Here then, sir, he bottoms himself and his opinions on the report of 1809, for a national bank—a bank truly national, not of the limited capital of the United States' Bank, which is scarcely enough for the pocket expense of the merchants in a single city—not a ten million bank, which was adequate to all the purposes for which it was intended twenty years ago; but not now, when we have grown up to a state of comparative grandeur. The Secretary of the Treasury wants a bank, I presume, something similar to that which was proposed at the last session; to which, if I recollect right, my friend from Kentucky was opposed. If the letter of the Secretary be the authority on which my friend wishes to bottom himself, he ought to take the whole of it. The Secretary does not mean by that paragraph to advocate a simple renewal of the charter, but a national bank, capable of extending its ramifications into every State, and placing branches in every State and town where large collections of public money are made. That being the view of the Secretary of the Treasury, I wish we had known how at the last session to have drawn out his aid in support of his own measure. Again, the Secretary says, "The banking system is now firmly established, and in its ramifications extends to every part of the United States. Under that system the assistance of banks appears to me necessary for the punctual collection of the revenue, and for the safe keeping and transmission of public moneys." Here the Secretary says, the banking system has extended its ramifications in every part of the United States. True, sir, but it is not the banking system of the United States; that system only affects a few cities. What then are the ramifications he alludes to? The State banks, through whose instrumentality collections have been made with as much honor, punctuality, and correctness, as by the Bank of the United States, and with more facility to the Government, because those banks will receive the paper of other banks in payment; whereas the branch banks will not.

"That the punctuality of payment is principally due to banks is a fact generally acknowledged." That is, sir, that the banking system has introduced punctuality between man and man, which has created a regularity in all pecuniary transactions. The Secretary, however, certainly cannot mean to attribute that punctuality to the Bank of the United States, but to the general system of banking. The sentence is, however, ambiguous.

"Its punctuality is to a certain degree enforced by the refusal of credit at the custom-house, so long as a former revenue bond, actually due, remains unpaid." Here, sir, I disagree with the Secretary. Punctuality in payment is not in a certain degree enforced by a refusal of credit at the custom-house, but by that alone. The refusal of credit at the custom-house is alone the real enforcing cause. It was not therefore wise or correct in the Secretary to insinuate that it was only in a certain degree. The loss of credit at the custom-house will always compel the merchants to pay their bonds to the United States, however they may deal with individuals.

The Secretary then goes on to state that, "he thinks nevertheless that in order to insure that precision in the collection, on which depends a corresponding discharge of the public engagements, it would, if no use was made of banks, be found necessary to abolish altogether the credit now given on the payment of duties." If no use was made of banks, credit he thinks should be abolished at the custom-house; and gentlemen who read this cursorily will be apt to apply the remark to the Bank of the United States. Not so the Secretary of the Treasury; the sentence is ambiguous, but he must mean that if there were no banks of any kind, punctuality between man and man would not be so assured, and the merchants would not be so competent to meet their engagements, as they would if aided by banks.

"State banks may be used," (says this report:) "and must, in case of a non-renewal of the charter, be used by the Treasury. Preparatory arrangements have already been made to that effect; and it is believed that the ordinary business will be transacted through their medium, with less convenience, and in some respects with perhaps less safety than at present, but without any insuperable difficulty; nor will the United States have any other control over the manner in which the business of the banks may be conducted than what may result from the power of withdrawing the public deposits."

What inconvenience can there be? None that I can imagine, nor will there be any. The safety will be the same, for let me again repeat, that the Treasury has no more control over the Bank of the United States, under the law as it now exists, than it will have over the State banks. What control (it may be asked) will the Treasury have over the State banks? A powerful one, in my opinion. If it do not appear that they are conducting your and their affairs safely, the Secretary will take the public deposits from such and place them in others: you can thus operate powerfully on the interests of those with whom the public deposits are made. Have you more control now over the Bank of the United States? No, sir, not so much, for the law compels the Secretary to deposit the public bonds with the Bank of the United States and its branches, and he has no power to withhold them.

I am bold to say, sir, that the State banks are conducted with as much prudence and as much security in the large towns as that of the United States. In Virginia, as I have already stated, there is a trifling branch of the Bank of the United States, of $300,000 dollars capital. That branch is in a corner of the State, with which the people of Virginia have very little intercourse. Their great intercourse is with the banks of Richmond and Fredericksburg. What is the state of the specie of the Bank of Virginia? It is superior to that of the Bank of the United States. I believe the capital of the Bank of Virginia is one and a half millions of dollars; it has near two millions of dollars in its vaults at present—it generally divides eight per cent.—the last dividend was ten. Here then is a dividend greater than that of the Bank of the United States; and the Bank of Virginia has none of that check from the United States' Bank which is deemed by my friend from Georgia so necessary to the regularity of State banks. [Mr. CRAWFORD explained, "that those who gave testimony against themselves certainly might be believed; and the State banks had themselves stated that they were kept in a salutary check by the Bank of the United States."] Mr. S. continued. I am happy to learn, sir, whence the gentleman drew his conclusion that the Bank of the United States was necessary to keep the State banks in check. I do not know what species of directors they can be who tell us that it is absolutely necessary that we should have the United States' Bank to check them and keep them from injuring themselves. It is the old doctrine of Mr. Morris revived in a new form, that the people are their own worst enemies. Can it be believed that the directors of any bank would state that the Bank of the United States was necessary to check them? If it be so in Philadelphia, it is certainly not so in Richmond, where they have not this check. So far from the branch in Virginia keeping the State banks in check, the Bank of Virginia always keeps the branch at Norfolk in check. The Secretary does not give his positive opinion on the competency of State banks to the transmission of revenue, &c. but says, "it may be added, that even for ordinary business of receiving and transmitting public moneys, the use of a State bank may be forbidden by the State, and that loans to the United States are by many of the charters forbidden, without a special permission from the State." If there be any such charters, the Secretary of the Treasury need not make use of the banks which have them; he may find enough of banks that can give ample security. As for the ordinary and extraordinary business of the Treasury with the banks, I have already shown that for the ordinary business the State banks can do it as effectually and with as much security as has heretofore been afforded by the branches. The Secretary then goes on, sir, to give his opinion in direct contradiction to the bill before you, and shows that whatever reliance gentlemen may have placed on his authority, they have not reported a bill in conformity to it—

"It does not seem necessary to advert to the particular objections made against the present charter, as those may easily be obviated by proper alterations. What has been called a National Bank, or, in other words, a new Bank of the United States, instead of the existing one, may be obtained by such alterations. The capital may be extended and more equally distributed; new stockholders may be substituted to the foreigners, as had been suggested in the report of 2d March, 1809; and any other modifications, which may be thought expedient, may be introduced, without interrupting the operations of the institution now in force, and without disturbing all the commercial concerns of the country."

This project, sir, was tried at the last session. We unfortunately did not get the aid of my friend from Kentucky. It was then agreed to merge the whole capital of the Bank of the United States in a National Bank, but rejected by the bank agent—a bank of thirty millions, which would have been found capable to extend its ramifications wherever banks might be wanted. The Secretary's letter speaks of the plan of the National Bank and not of the one contained in the bill presented to us. The Secretary continues, "without dwelling on the inconveniences of repaying at this time to Europe a capital of seven millions," &c. The Secretary, Mr. President, is considered by his friends a very great man in fiscal operations—in commercial matters, I may be permitted to have opinions of my own, and to differ from him (without offence to my friend from Georgia) on a question simply and exclusively commercial. Now, sir, where is the difficulty of sending these seven millions (owned by foreigners) to Europe? There is no more difficulty, I answer, than for the merchant who owes seven thousand dollars in England to remit it. This seven millions will not be taken out in silver or gold to send to England, as is feared by gentlemen. No, sir, men do not carry political enmities to the extent to injure their own interests. The foreign stockholders will not remit specie, because, if they do, it will cost them from five to seven per cent. If they do not remit in specie, how will their funds be conveyed to England? By the most plain and simple mode that can be. The agents of the British stockholders will do one of two things; they will vest the funds in the State banks, or funds of the United States; or direct their agents to remit the amount in bills of exchange—and how will that be done? By buying bills of exchange, which, for every ninety pounds paid here, will yield them one hundred pounds in England, because bills of exchange are ten per cent. below par, and there is no chance of their rising. As they can make this gain by bills, does any man conceive that they will not thus remit their money, if remitted at all? Well, sir, gentlemen will perhaps again ask—can we spare this money from the United States, and will it not injure the young industrious mechanics and ruin the agricultural interest? Those are idle fears; an exchange of property will take place. The American merchants have at this time more than double the amount (of these seven millions) now in, or which soon will be in, the hands of the English merchants, which they will be glad to transfer by bills to the British stockholder for his funds in the stock of the Bank of the United States, and thus the English stockholder will receive the amount of his stock without one dollar of specie being sent out of our country, and the funds of our merchants now in England will thus replace the funds of the English stockholders.

Here follows an apprehension of the Secretary founded on false premises. He says: "And without adverting to other possible dangers of a more general nature, it appears sufficient to state, that the same body of men who owe fourteen millions of dollars to the bank, owe also ten or twelve to the United States, on which the receipts into the Treasury for this year altogether depend; and that, exclusively of absolute failures, it is improbable that both debts can be punctually paid at the same time." Permit me here to observe, that I differ with the Secretary on the question of fact. I cannot believe that the ten or twelve millions due by the merchants for duties to the United States are due by the same individuals who are indebted to the Bank of the United States, the fourteen millions stated by the Secretary; because I know that the great body of the merchants who owe for duties, do their business with the State banks, and of course cannot be those who are stated as debtors to the Bank of the United States. Some of my friends, for whose opinions and persons I have an unbounded respect, are still apprehensive that great distress will result for want of the usual discounts to the merchants of the United States in case of a non-renewal of the bank charter. The fear is an idle one; it will be precisely the old story of the green ass. It will be remembered nine days, and not much longer. The course of proceedings will be this: The Secretary tells you that arrangements have already been made to transfer the money from the Bank of the United States to the State banks. I believe they are in full operation. He will take three millions of dollars (the public money now deposited) from out of the Bank of the United States, and put it into the State banks. Add thereto above four millions of deposits, the property of the merchants, which will also be taken out of the Bank of the United States and put into the State banks. That is, seven millions of dollars will be immediately drawn from the Bank of the United States and placed in the State banks. Upon this money the State banks will feel themselves justified in going into larger discounts, and, upon such funds, will be able to take up all good paper thrown out by the United States' bank in consequence of the non-renewal of its charter. Were I a negotiator in the Bank of the United States, and had I great discounts in that bank, and were the moneys transferred, as I have suggested, I should have no apprehension, and should put my paper in the State banks, into which the deposits are removed, with a full confidence that it would be discounted. This, then, is an idle phantom, raised to deceive gentlemen who are not particularly acquainted with the business. What is the reason, sir, that none of those fears, those horrible terrors (presented to our imagination) are felt in Baltimore? The merchants there, generally, are of the Republican party, and feel none of those fears. And yet, sir, we are told of the great distress, and almost led to believe that universal ruin will ensue. The distress will not be felt sixty days after the 3d of March. If felt by any, it will be by those who can now pay five shillings in the pound, and who, if they go on three months longer, would not pay sixpence. We are told that this bank has been honorably, correctly, impartially, and fairly conducted. The honorable gentleman who made this declaration assured us that he was not versed in the subject of banking; and this was at once giving a most convincing reason against his opinion. He receives the opinions of the gentlemen who are most friendly to the institution, probably from gentlemen that never felt a partiality for any other. Let the gentleman apply to merchants on the other side of the question, and he will receive very different information indeed. In Boston, the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts told us that the bank has for its President a gentleman of high talents, great integrity, and respectability, and he did not depict him too highly. I know him well, and am bound to believe the information the gentleman has given as to the well-managing of the branch bank there. By the well-management of a moneyed institution, we understand an attention to the advantage of the stockholders. In that point of view, no doubt, the bank has been well managed. I have a letter, which goes to prove, to my satisfaction, that the branch at New York has not been managed with all that impartiality and correctness which has been stated by the deputies from Philadelphia. I will read an extract therefrom; the writer is a gentleman whom I highly respect, of mild manners, good sense, and great respectability. He says: "I can speak from experience to this fact, impartiality. I have employed a capital of between two and three hundred thousand dollars in trade here (New York) for several years, and from being considerably engaged in navigation, my bonds for duties to the United States have amounted to many thousands a year; yet I can aver that the branch bank has never aided me in the payment by discounts, or otherwise, while the Manhattan Bank has freely discounted the paper which the branch rejected, merely by reason of the contamination of passing through Republican hands." I know nothing, Mr. President, but from such information, as to the partiality or impartiality of the bank at New York, except from common fame, who is sometimes said to be a common liar; still some confidence is due to general report. In Philadelphia, it is said that the bank has been impartially and honorably conducted; and I will not doubt the gentleman's words. I do not know what it has done lately, but, some years ago, I heard such a detail of its conduct as was no proof of the allegation. In Norfolk, I will venture to say, that the conduct of the bank never was considered impartial; and I had a letter last year from a highly respectable merchant in that place, which, if now in my possession, would have proved the contrary. In Baltimore, sir, we have heard it said in another place, that the bank discounted as much for Republicans as for Federalists. I cannot contradict this; I cannot, because I have not seen their books; but I believe there is not one Republican in Baltimore who will give his assent to that information. If it were the case, I could not well have failed to know it. We ought not, sir, to place entire reliance on the information of interested men. We were told, but a few days ago, and the information was derived, I believe, from the same identical letter as the stated information, "that the Union Bank of Maryland was the first bank which refused to receive foreign gold." I have inquired into that fact, sir, and find that the Union Bank never refused it, except in one instance, until the House of Representatives rejected the bill from the Senate on the subject of foreign coin. I have a letter from the cashier of that bank in my hand. He writes: "that the first information I had respecting foreign gold was from the cashier of the Bank of Baltimore, (Mr. Cox,) who handed me the proceedings of the banks in Philadelphia on that subject. It is impossible for me to say

SENATE.

Bank of the United States.

' which was the first bank that refused to take it ;
' and can only state, for ourselves, that we contin' ued to receive and pay it, at its usual value,
' (with one or two exceptions,) the amount not ' exceeding $200 or $300 difference, until the ' House of Representatives refused to agree to ' your resolution on that subject in the Senate.
' On the 30th of October last, we received from the ' Bank of Maryland, $10,000, without deduction, ' as you will see by the enclosed certificate." I state this fact, sir, at this time, only to show how cautious gentlemen ought to be in placing reliance on information of this kind. It is impossible for me, living as I do in Baltimore, to believe that the Republicans have experienced impartial conduct from that bank.

We have been told, sir, that the high improvement in the agricultural State of Pennsylvania is to be attributed, in a great measure, to banks, particularly to the Bank of the United States.

The gentleman (Mr. POPE) called upon us to remark the difference in the improvement of cultivation between that State and others, and to see what the State owed to the institution of banks.
I have no doubt, sir, that the institution of banks has contributed as well to the prosperity of agriculture as of commerce ; but this effect has been much more produced by the State banks than by the Bank of the United States. Has Connecticut any branch of the United States? None ; and yet the honorable gentleman from Kentucky, when he travelled through that country, could not have failed to see as high a state of cultivation there as in Pennsylvania. Now, sir, on the other hand, the State of Maryland, which has the enviable advantage of a branch bank of the United States, in addition to her immense capital in State banks, has not as yet progressed to that high state of cultivation witnessed in Pennsylvania. This, more probably, proceeds from the temper, habits, and climate, of her population, than from the cause assigned by Mr. P.

We are told, Mr. President, there is a prodigious scarcity of money in the great cities. Money,
Mr. President, like every other commodity, will go where it finds its best market ; and if, in the State of Virginia, there be a better market than in Philadelphia, there will it go, and there it has gone. In Virginia they have what will command money, wheat and tobacco ; and the merchants from the great cities were obliged to go there for those products, where they could buy cheaper than they could at home. What was the consequence? Money went where it found the best market, and that was in Virginia ; the fact is proved from the quantity of specie in their bank.
There is no scarcity of money in South Carolina, where merchants were obliged to carry their money for the article of cotton. A scarcity of money results from a scarcity of means of acquiring it. From the large cities we have exported all, or a great proportion of our means, and we cannot get back the money for want of the usual sale of bills of exchange ; and thence results the great scarcity of money in those cities. It is in vain to tell me, as I have heard in the course of the discussion, that United States paper is the only universal medium. In the interior we find the paper of the State banks, and of the State banks alone, in circulation.

In the animadversions of the gentleman from Massachusetts, in order to enforce his argument and to show the danger which will result to State banks, he brought forward an example very strong in point, viz : that an agent of one of those banks sent here for the purpose of obtaining those deposits had decamped from this city on hearing of the failure of a great broker, which endangered the bank, of which he was a director, to such a degree as to depreciate the value of its stock twenty per cent. [Mr. LLOYD said he had stated it as a rumor, for the authenticity of which he would not vouch.] I was going to say (observed Mr. S.) that, from the high opinion I entertained of the delicacy of that honorable gentleman on every subject touching the credit of a bank, I was convinced that, unless he had proofs as strong as those of Holy Writ, he would not vouch in such a case ; that he would be cautious in giving such a thing as truth, unless he knew it of his own knowledge. As to the statement which he made, there must have been some mistake. One week before the gentleman in question left this city, he gave notice that he should go away on Thursday. He did go on that day, and had previously applied to the Secretary of the Treasury for a share of the deposits of the Government, and produced a report from his bank to show the substantial character of the Mechanics' Bank. The account of the failure of the broker, Mr. Judah, did not arrive until two days after the gentleman alluded to had left this city.
He could not, therefore, have returned to New York on that account. What is really the fact?
The Mechanics' Bank of New York stands on as substantial a foundation as any bank in the United States, and has, in proportion to its stock, more specie in its vaults than any bank I know, except that of Virginia. Mr. Judah did fail ; but the stock of the bank did not experience a more unusual fall than that of other banks. The great failures at that time staggered every man for his own safety. The banks looked around with caution. The value of the stock in every bank experienced a depression. At that moment the Mechanics' Bank paid its dividend of  $4\frac{1}{2}$  per cent., and the stock which was worth 20 per cent. above par did go down to  $15\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. What was the loss, at any rate, sustained by this great broker? The Mechanics' Bank, I understand, will not lose two thousand dollars by all the failures ; by Mr. Judah not a dollar. On the contrary, they have money to pay him. I mention this fact to show that we should be extremely cautious indeed in placing reliance on facts of this kind, from sources over which we have no control.

We are called upon, sir, to believe that the borrowers at New Orleans are less safe than elsewhere. I had thought they were more safe, because they have more valuable produce to export ; because they have more specie among them than in any other part of the Union; and because the people of the whole Western country send their products there for sale, and do not press the merchants too much in return. One reason has been assigned (by Mr. LLOYD) why we should renew this charter, that, in this city, loans have been made to the amount of $400,000, which are expended in canals, houses, bridges, and improvements; and we must renew the charter to enable those people to go on. That reasoning, sir, has no influence with me. There has been one prodigious mistake in all this business. It is taken for granted that the merchants cannot pay their notes at bank, unless they obtain new discounts. This would be to say that they were carrying on trade without any other than bank capital. The loans in Baltimore on made paper are a mere drop in the bucket compared with the extensive trade of that city. A great proportion of the notes which the bank reports as payable are on bona fide sales. The borrower does not depend on any loans from banks to meet them, but draws on his own means to pay such notes. But there are in all banks what is called negotiable paper. We borrow from the bank a stipulated sum, and understand that, unless the bank is hard pressed, it will continue the renewal of notes to take up that stipulated sum. A note is signed by A, and endorsed by B, for which no property is paid; it is a mere note of accommodation. That note, when it comes due, is not expected to be paid, unless by a renewal with the same endorser, or, if the endorser becomes bad, a good one. Thus, a director of the bank will have discounts to the amount of $37,000 renewable at bank. He cannot get more unless on real paper. Our banks do not dare to discount beyond their means, because they are obliged to pay cash for every legal demand. The gentleman from Kentucky has told us that two or three importing States may be benefited by the dissolution of the bank. I will not answer the argument; it is such a one as can go only to disunite, to create envy and jealousy. I would not resort to that kind of argument, and I will not permit myself to answer it.

We are called upon, in a manner extremely impressive indeed, by the gentleman from Massachusetts, to hearken to the information received from the committee of mechanics and merchants now here from Philadelphia. I am well informed, sir, that both those committees were composed of very respectable men, some of them Republicans; and it is said that they complained of a very great scarcity of money, and that trade was not brisk. I will ask them, sir, if they ever knew trade brisk in January or February? It is precisely the same at Baltimore as at Philadelphia; when the rivers are frozen, we wind up our books and do not expect to do business.

One of those gentlemen stated that he always found a convenience in having his notes discounted in the Bank of the United States; and if he could not get it there, he applied to a friend who discounted notes that had a longer time than two months to run. It is a possible case that these persons may have been very much employed in building houses for one of the directors of that bank. It may have been the case that that director accommodated him by discounting his paper at a longer time than sixty days. This kind of employment between man and man has a wonderful influence on the mind of man; and he who receives a benefit is willing to return it in some way or other. Mr. Grice appears to be a very worthy mechanic; but I am sorry that he should be obliged to say that those who contracted with him were afraid that they could not comply with the contract on account of the difficulty occasioned by the non-renewal of the charter; and yet he told us that the Bank of the United States still discounted its usual quantity of paper. I am sorry to see that the merchants of Philadelphia, great and respectable merchants as they are, make contracts for ships and tell the shipbuilder that they are obliged to depend on discounts for payment for the ships. I did not expect this was the case there; and will venture to say it is not the case in many other places.

One of those gentlemen tells us he had to pay one and a half per cent. per month for money. Sir, he got the money very cheap. When one gets into the hands of the shavers, or what the gentleman calls only discounters, if he gets out for  $1\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. per month, he is not coarsely shaved. It is not an uncommon price. Money is worth what it will sell for, and in Philadelphia, shaving and discounting is considered as honest and fair as any other commercial transaction; that is, to pay and receive more than legal interest. It is not there considered as dishonorable or improper, whatever it may be in Baltimore.

It is the belief of this committee of merchants that in consequence of the non-renewal of the charter, flour fell to  $$7\frac{1}{2}$  in Philadelphia. Now this, sir, is one of those good strokes, those excellent things, that the friends of the bank use to deceive and influence the agricultural interest with. It is, therefore, brought home to the farmers in Congress. I state this, to show how cautious gentlemen ought to be in suffering their minds to be impressed with these statements. The fact in this case is not as stated. The moment at which flour fell was on the receipt of an account from Liverpool of its having fallen to 56s. per barrel; and that there was no demand for consumption. What was the consequence? Fifty-six shillings a barrel will not allow more than  $$7\frac{1}{2}$  to be given here; so the price of flour fell. These gentlemen also informed our minds further; that a demand from a British house for Lisbon was not executed by a house in Philadelphia from the want of funds. This may be true; but a great portion of that very order has been actually executed at Baltimore, at ten dollars per barrel, payable in bills of exchange at a fair discount of ten per cent. The ramifications of commerce are such that no one who is not daily conversant with them can know them. There was no occasion for a fall of flour, because the ports of Cadiz and Lisbon were still open; but there was a momentary apprehension that Massena had got into Lisbon, and commercial men were for a moment afraid to let their property go to that market. This lasted but two or three days; it lasted just as long as the terror of the non-renewal of the charter of the Bank of the United States will last. The gentlemen who were sent on here happened to come at a favorable moment to scare us with the depression of flour. But before the question is taken we learn its rapid rise again to the former prices.

Our minds have been alarmed by a representation of the immense influence which the Secretary of the Treasury will have over the banks to whom deposits are given. I should have no objection whatever as to myself, that the collector of every port should be ex officio a director of the bank in which deposits are made; and as to the argument that such a power would enable a Secretary of the Treasury, if he were a bad man, to injure individuals, it is not worthy consideration. No Secretary would dare to take such a course; the thing would be proclaimed here in such a voice as would make the offender decamp with precipitation from his office.

The report of Mr. Orr, one of the mechanics, I had like to have forgotten. He says, all confidence between man and man is destroyed. My letters, sir, say that all confidence is not destroyed, but in those whose rashness has been the cause of their forfeiting all title to it. In order to strengthen Mr. Orr's argument, we are told that the price of hemp is fallen. That is true; but what does the fact prove? Not that the approaching dissolution of the Bank of the United States has caused it; the reason is, that the arrivals from Russia are more numerous than ever before recollected. Every vessel that comes from Russia brings hemp. Again, our good friends to the westward and in Virginia have commenced the culture of hemp, and carried its production to an extent nearly equal to our consumption. Add to that cause, that the demand is much lessened by the destruction of our shipping. We build few ships now. We ought not to rely on these facts; they result not from the dissolution of the Bank of the United States, but from the course of trade.

I have before taken occasion to remark that certain mechanics were here, respectable men, who would have come forward if I had wished them; they would have told you that they did not rely on the Bank of the United States at all, but on the State Banks, for accommodation. I stated that one of those gentlemen thought the renewal of the charter would have an unfortunate effect on the politics of the State of Maryland. The party to which they belonged had twenty years ago declared the charter of the United States' Bank to be unconstitutional; they were in earnest when they declared so. From these circumstances, a renewal of the charter at this time would go to convince the people that the struggle of parties was nothing but a business of ins and outs, and not depending on principle. For myself, sir, the question never came before me on a Constitutional argument before; and I do confess, as my friend from Kentucky says, that I was not very squeamish on the subject. But the able arguments of my friends from Kentucky, Tennessee, and Virginia, have made a very serious impression on me indeed, and have almost brought me to think that if there were no other objection I should vote against the bill on the Constitutional question alone. But my mind has received a wonderful impression indeed from the arguments of the gentleman last up (Mr. POPE.) He carried his doctrine of construction so far that it appeared to me that he regarded no other part of the Constitution as binding but the preamble. In support of his doctrine he brought forward the example of the State of Connecticut, which State has no written constitution. It appeared to me, sir, that the gentleman's arguments, if valid, reduced us precisely to the situation of Great Britain, to look for our Constitution in laws, precedents, and parliamentary construction, to have no written guide. My mind became alarmed; and hereafter I shall be very much afraid to give my consent to those kind of constructions about which I have not heretofore been very squeamish.

I have taken up the time of the Senate to an extent at least equal to anything I had intended, and beyond that which many gentlemen no doubt think I ought to have occupied. I have not wished to prolong my discussion to an unreasonable length, and shall, therefore, leave untouched some points I had intended to have noticed. I am unwilling to trespass on the patience of the Senate; because I am well aware that unless this bill passes speedily, it cannot pass at all. Aware of that, I was willing for one, and so were all the gentlemen with whom I act, to take a silent vote on the principle, so as to have given full time to gentlemen who brought forward the bill, to have gone through with its provisions. But another course, that of discussion, has been thought proper to be pursued, and I have deemed it proper to express my sentiments.

Mr. S. concluded with hoping that he had not said anything to wound the feelings of gentlemen in opposition to him, for whom he had great respect. If anything he had said had hurt the feelings of any one, he hoped to be believed when he assured them that such was not his intention.

Mr. POPE.—Mr. President, instead of interrupting the gentleman from Maryland, I preferred to correct him after he had finished his speech. I have examined the Journal, and cannot find that any question about extending a branch to Kentucky was made; but I have a very perfect recollection of my views and impressions in relation to the bill. That bill provided that six millions of the capital should be divided among the States, to be subscribed and paid by the States within a given period. I was aware that the rich moneyed States on the seaboard would subscribe, but did not believe the new States would tax the people to raise the money. In order, therefore, to diffuse the interest and influence concentrated in this moneyed institution, and thereby preserve to each State, if the bill passed, her due weight in the Federal Union, I proposed an amendment to this effect: that the capital should be limited to twenty millions—that is, ten millions in addition to the present stock—four of which, as provided in the bill, to be subscribed by the United States, and six millions to be divided among the States, and paid out of the national Treasury. If my plan had been adopted, and a branch extended to Kentucky, the dividends made on the capital employed there would have gone into the treasury of the State. It has been a favorite policy with me to produce a unity or consolidation of interest in this nation. With that view, I have advocated the encouragement of manufactures, and the appropriation of a portion of our funds for the improvement of the interior by roads and canals. Upon the same principle, if the bank bill had been permitted to assume the shape I proposed to give it, I should not have been hostile to its passage. A consolidation of interest is necessary, perhaps indispensable, to give strength and permanency to this confederated Republic, and free it from the dangers and evils consequent upon a consolidation of power. I have several times expressed my opinion on this floor in relation to a consolidation of power. We ought to guard against it. Under this impression, I have been opposed to extending the coercive agency of this Government upon the people of the interior. Upon the same principle, I have approved the repeal of the internal taxes, not so much on account of the sums demanded from the people, but because I think it difficult, if not impossible, to have such a system, requiring so much Federal agency, well managed by one Government over this immense country.

Mr. BRENT said he had not the vanity to believe, after the subject had been so fully discussed, that he should be able to shed any new light on it; but having been instructed, by the Legislature of the State which he had the honor to represent, to vote on Constitutional principles against the bill under consideration, and as he was reduced to the painful necessity of going counter to those instructions, it seemed to him to be indispensably necessary that he should submit to the Senate the grounds on which he acted. It is (said he) a most painful situation in which I stand in relation to the Legislature of Virginia, in being compelled to vote in opposition to their will, more especially as it is a prevalent opinion with many whose opinions are entitled to great respect, that instructions are obligatory on a Senator. This question is one which has never been settled, or even fully deliberated on. Instructions, when heretofore given to Senators, have generally been in accordance with the sentiments of the Senators, and only given to add the greater weight to their opinions. If called upon definitely to pronounce with regard to instructions on questions of expediency, I might be under some difficulty as to what course to pursue; because, although here is no clause in the Constitution to that effect, I am under a strong impression that, according to the principles of our Government, there is much reason to believe that the respective State Legislatures should have such a right; but on a Constitutional question (whatever may be the right of the State Legislatures in other instances) the right of instruction may be denied, in my judgment—that is, so far as to be imperative on the Senator. To give a vote in such a manner as in his estimation to inflict a vital wound on the Constitution, is more than the Legislature of Virginia, or any other State Legislature in the Union, can compel me or any other Senator of the United States to do. The resolution of Virginia is bottomed, not on the ground of inexpediency, but on the principle that the Constitution prohibited Congress from granting the bank charter in the first instance; that it now prohibited it, and therefore, because it was unconstitutional, the Legislature have instructed their Senators in Congress to oppose it. Now, sir, although I shall not immediately and directly violate the Constitution by voting against the bank, yet, if I vote against it when I believe it Constitutional and necessary, it must be known that I vote in conformity to the instructions of the Virginia Legislature; and so far as my vote goes, it will warrant and sanction that interpretation of the Constitution which the Legislature of Virginia has given—which interpretation, in conscience, I believe to be erroneous. Therefore, though in ordinary cases the instructions of a Legislature may be imperative, (I will not determine that question,) I conclude that they cannot be so when they require of a Senator to commit either a positive or implied breach of the Constitution, or to vote in such a manner as to warrant such interpretation of the Constitution as will deprive it of an essential attribute. Virginia has the physical force, but has she a moral right to violate the Constitution of the United States? If she has it not, can she give it to her Legislature? If her Legislature possess it not, can they give it to a Senator? Can the Legislature give me a moral right to violate the Constitution of the United States, which I have sworn to support? I believe not, sir; and that, in the situation in which I stand, their instructions ought to have no operation on the vote I am to give on the subject under consideration.

To illustrate this question more fully, let me inquire if a State Legislature should instruct its Senators to vote for a law to take away the trial by jury in a criminal prosecution, would a Senator, thus instructed, who has sworn to support the Constitution of the United States, consider himself conscientiously authorized to vote for such an unconstitutional measure? When a Senator is elected, he is entitled to hold his seat for six years. Suppose that, immediately after he is elected, the State from which he is sent gets into a state of direct opposition to, and insurrection against, the General Government, and should continue so for the whole six years for which the Senator is elected, does this vacate his seat? Will he not still remain in the Senate of the United States, and, if he does his duty, vote for all measures that may be necessary to restrain the unconstitutional acts and insurrection committed by his State? Either instructions on Constitutional questions to a Senator are imperative, or they are not. We admit that a Senator retains his seat in the Senate, even while his State is engaged in actual insurrection and rebellion, and consequently in the continued violation of the Constitution of the United States. While a Senator engages in the deliberations of this, the highest Council of the nation, is he to obey the instructions of a State Legislature who are in the daily violation of the Constitution of the United States, and are endeavoring wholly to destroy it by open and declared insurrection; and which Legislature will, consequently, instruct their Senators to pursue such a course as will best accomplish the object it has in view? In this dilemma, if instructions are imperative, which, if obeyed, violate the Constitution, a Senator will retain his seat in the Senate of the United States for the express purpose of using every means in his power to destroy that Constitution which he has sworn to support. Can it be imagined that it was intended, in any state of things, that a Senator should hold his seat in the Senate of the United States for the sole purpose of doing all he could to overthrow the Constitution? Since so absurd, monstrous, and dangerous a principle would result from admitting the mandatory influence of instructions, when they touch Constitutional questions, I deem it my duty not to give my acquiescence to, or by my example sanction, a doctrine so hostile to the general spirit, and so unfavorable to the preservation, of the Constitution of the United States.

Much therefore as I respect the sentiments of the Legislature of Virginia, and much as it distresses me to go in opposition to them, I believe I shall do so on the present occasion. With respect to the alarm expressed by some gentlemen, from the large States coming forward and instructing Congress, I am satisfied that no such insidious motives are justly attributable to the Legislature of the State which I have the honor to represent; I am satisfied that its motives were honorable, pure, and patriotic, and this measure is a testimony of the consistency of character of the State. When the charter of the Bank of the United States was first granted, the general sentiment of Virginia was, that this law was contrary to the Constitution of the United States. Under a different state of things, and under the domination of a different political party than at the present time rules the affairs of this country, she preserves a consistency of character. Believing the bank to be unconstitutional then, she now entertains the same sentiment as when in the minority, and, with an honorable consistency of character and anxiety to preserve the Constitution inviolate, she had sent forward instructions to her Senators in Congress. Whilst therefore I appreciate the motive which gave existence to these instructions, and highly respect the source whence they come and the high consideration to which they are entitled generally, I do not on the present occasion consider them obligatory as to the vote I am about to give.

In considering this question, I will take it in a three-fold view:

1st. Whether, on the first promulgation of the Constitution of the United States a right did appertain to Congress to establish a bank.

2dly. As respects the Constitutional question, whether, on an adjudged case and one long practised on, it has the same weight as if original?

3d. Whether, admitting that at first the bank was improper, because not necessary, it be not now proper, if it can be proved almost indispensably necessary?

The first question, whether the General Government, when it first came into operation, did not possess the power of creating a National Bank, is the primary object of investigation. In objection to this it has been said, that to carry into effect an enumerated power is one thing, and the right to incorporate a bank is a distinct power. Those who take this ground say that the creation of a National Bank is an original, independent, and substantive power. It is not sufficient, say they, to show that it is a convenient instrument to carry into effect an enumerated power, because it is an independent authority of itself, and the genius of our Government prohibits the derivation of any powers by implication with scrupulous limitation. It is true, sir, that our Government, being an emanation from the existing State governments, the rational construction is, that all power not given away is retained to them or to the people. If that construction does not result, then a positive amendment, which has been made to the Constitution, has infused this principle into it. I therefore admit in its fullest latitude the construction that all powers not given away are still retained; yet I still contend that even in a Government like ours, there are some resulting powers. Or by what right do we create a military school? We have a right to raise armies; but we can have an army without a military school. Yet it is Constitutional to create such an institution, because every given power implies rights inferior appertaining to the powers granted. We lay an embargo—is there any clause in the Constitution authorizing us to lay embargoes? No, sir; we have a right to regulate trade, and we have a right to lay embargoes to protect it. We have a right to provide for arming and disciplining the militia. Under this authority we build armories. Is there any provision in the Constitution directing it? We have erected forges and even purchased ore banks. These are inferior powers, necessarily resulting from the greater powers granted. But here gentlemen find the great difficulty. The creation of a corporation, say they, is an act of sovereignty; it cannot be used as a mean, because it is a sovereign act. Why, Mr. President, every law passed is quo ad hoc a sovereign act. A law incorporating a military school is as much an act of sovereignty, as to the particular subject to which it relates, as an act incorporating a bank. We create a military school—for what purpose? Because the sovereign authority has power to establish an army, and the power to create a military school is inseparably connected with and necessarily appertains to it. We establish a navy—we also establish a marine corps. There is no clause in the Constitution giving that power, but we take it as inseparable from the power to create a navy, because the exercise of the greater implies every subordinate power necessarily connected with it. The great stumbling block, however, is, that this is one of those independent, original, and substantive powers, which cannot be given by implication. Blackstone says, “municipal law, thus understood, is properly defined to bear rule of civil conduct, prescribed by the ‘supreme power in a State, commanding what is ‘right and prohibiting what is wrong.’” Agreeably to this definition, every law passed by a deliberative body is an act of sovereignty as to the subject to which it relates. The establishment of a marine corps is as much an act of sovereignty as an act incorporating the Bank of the United States. The only question is, whether it be necessarily incident to the enumerated powers given to the General Government. Those who criticise most accurately on the Constitution and most unwillingly concede resulting powers, will admit them to a certain extent even in our Government. The only question is the immediate and necessary connexion of the means used with the object intended to be attained.

In inquiring then, sir, whether or not, at the first promulgation of the Constitution, when it came into existence, it was intended that Congress should possess the power of incorporating the Bank of the United States, let us inquire whether there was any possibility of carrying into effect with any tolerable convenience and advantage the several provisions of the Constitution, unless this power exists. It is said that you do not possess the power, because it is attempted to be derived by different gentlemen from so many different parts of the Constitution. Now, Mr. President, I have never before understood that a capacity to derive a title from several different sources gives you less title than if derived from one source alone. I derive the power from the whole context of the Constitution, although gentlemen seem to think that the title is invalidated in proportion to the number of sections in the Constitution from whence we derive it. In order to avoid confusion of argument in examining this question, I will derive it from only one source at present, though I believe others equally give it by a necessary construction. At the time the Constitution came into existence, I believe there were but three banks in the United States; none south of Philadelphia, and all of very limited capital. The Constitution of the United States gives the power to levy and collect taxes. Is it possible to imagine any system so convenient for the collection of this revenue, and sending it to the seat of Government, as that of the agency of banks? I am not inquiring whether the State banks can do it; but I say that the framers of the Constitution must have had under consideration the state of things at the time when the Constitution came into existence. At that time there was not one bank south of Philadelphia, and the banks which existed were very limited in their capital, and their paper had limited circulation. Congress, in such a state of things, then, has the power of levying and collecting taxes conferred on it, and yet Congress has not the power to create banks to aid in the collection of its taxes, notwithstanding a clause to make all laws necessary and proper for that purpose is contained in the Constitution. No gentleman will say that the agency of banks is not necessary in some way or other in collecting the revenue. I admit without them you could have carried on our fiscal arrangements in an awkward and cumbrous form, but was that the intention of the Constitution? When the power to collect taxes was given, it was intended to give all the means necessary to carry this power into execution. It was not to execute this power in a cumbrous form, but with the greatest facility with which the power is susceptible of being wielded. Now, is it possible that the Constitution contemplated that the revenue should be collected and transmitted here, subject to all the risks and accidents and inconveniences that attend the transportation of specie? It is impossible. But all this doubt has arisen from its being a separate and independent power, although it is no more of that character than any other law passed to execute the enumerated powers of Congress.

In a word, Mr. President, it is admitted by all who have spoken on this question, whether for or against the bill under consideration, that the agency of a bank or of banks affords the greatest facility and security of any plan that can be devised for the collection of a revenue, and for its transmission to your Treasury.

It is admitted that no bank or banks of a capital or of sufficient circulating paper throughout the United States adequate to this object, did exist when the Constitution was first formed, promulgated, or adopted. It is admitted that to levy and collect taxes is one of the enumerated powers of Congress. It is admitted that Congress has all power necessary and convenient to carry its enumerated powers into execution.

It is admitted there is no express clause in the Constitution prohibiting the establishment of a National Bank.

If these principles and facts are admitted, does it not demonstrate, beyond the possibility of doubt, this unquestionable result, to wit: that as Congress is to levy and collect revenue; that as the agency of banks affords the most certain, speedy, and convenient means by which a revenue can be collected; that as neither, at the period when the Constitution was made, promulgated, or adopted, banks of sufficient capital, or with paper of sufficient circulation, existed for the collection of the revenue, and its transmission to your Treasury; that as there was no positive clause prohibiting a National Bank in the Constitution; that as Congress was to have all power necessary to carry its enumerated powers into execution; that as the convention who framed, and the people who adopted the Constitution, must have had in view our then existing institutions, and the then general state of society, it was the intention of the convention who formed the Constitution, and the people who adopted it, to give to Congress the power of establishing a National Bank. If at the time of adopting the Constitution it was necessary and proper that Congress should possess it, for the exercise of any of its enumerated powers; if the foregoing result is undeniable, and I think it is, I would interrogate, if Congress, on the adoption of the Constitution, possessed a power to establish a National Bank, what has since deprived that body of the power? I, Mr. President, can discover nothing which has. One argument, much confided in by gentlemen who have opposed the present bill, is, not that banks are not necessary to the collection of the revenue, but that State banks will answer. In return, I insist that no State banks did exist when the Constitution was first formed, therefore the power to create a National Bank is necessarily given in the power to levy and collect taxes. To this it is replied that to create a National Bank is to legislate by implication; it is a separate, substantive, and independent power; to levy a tax is one thing, to make a bank another. I answer, to levy a tax is one thing, to create an officer for its collection another. By this kind of chop-logic we may prove anything unconstitutional. I ask, when you levy a tax, if you do not provide officers for collecting it. I levy a tax and create a bank through whose instrumentality I mean to collect it; from the same authority by which I appoint a collector, I have a right to create a bank through whose instrumentality I mean to receive and transmit it. There is no clause in the Constitution saying you may appoint officers for the collection of the revenue specifically; but the right to appoint officers to collect revenue is derived from the power of levying a tax, from which also may be derived the power of establishing a bank, if it be the best mode of collecting the revenue. It is said you may collect this tax by means of the State banks. Very well, sir, I say you may collect the revenue by means of State officers, and upon the principle that you cannot establish a bank to collect the revenue, because the State banks can collect it, I say that the State officers can collect our taxes, and if your argument is just, you cannot appoint any other officers. The Constitution authorizes the President to appoint persons to fill all offices established by law, but says not a word about appointing officers to collect the tax you levy specifically. Upon the construction gentlemen contend for, they might say, because no power is expressly given to appoint officers of the customs, or for your taxes, and it is possible to collect the revenue by the agency of the State governments, and nothing should be done by the United States authorities which can be done by the States, therefore these collectors of the customs or revenue should be such as are appointed by the States for State purposes. This kind of reasoning, sir, cannot be admissible, and is in hostility with a most manifest principle of the Constitution, as it is evidently a prominent feature of that instrument that the General Government should have within itself all those powers necessary and convenient for the execution of its enumerated trusts, entirely free and independent of the interference and agency of the States, their officers, or ministers.

It has been triumphantly demanded by some, whether we could create a trading company. I have not a doubt on the subject. If it can be demonstrated to me that commerce would be benefited by the incorporation of a mercantile company, that it is indispensably necessary to do it to regulate trade to advantage; under such circumstances I have no doubt we can create a company, for the creation of a company is no more the exercise of a separate independent authority than any law which we make when legislating under our enumerated powers. If it be inquired whether or no we could incorporate a company to cut canals through the States, I answer that there is in the Constitution a clause authorizing Congress to regulate trade between the States, and under this clause we could do it with the consent of the States. We could not do it without, and I derive this construction from the Constitution itself. It is a fair mode of construction laid down by professional men, that where there is intricacy or difficulty in the construction of any legal instrument, you must take the context together; one part of the instrument must be used to elucidate another; the different parts must be compared, and the true construction thereby obtained. In the 8th section of the first article, a power is given to Congress "to exercise exclusive legislation, &c. over all places purchased by the consent of the Legislature of the State in which the same shall be, for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dockyards, and other needful buildings." I discover here that the Constitution, in order to preserve the sovereignty of the State governments, has been exceedingly vigilant in guarding their territorial rights. Therefore, where a power is given to the General Government interfering with the territorial rights of the States, there is a clause in the Constitution saving territorial rights, and requiring the consent of the States to its exercise. If, therefore, Government, in the exercise of its enumerated powers, is restrained from acting, where their acts affect State territory, unless with the consent of the States, I infer that we have not a right to incorporate canal companies without the consent of the States through which the canal is to go. With this limitation I have little hesitation in saying that we have a right to incorporate canal companies.

It is said that the corporation, which it is proposed to recharter, independent of the facility it affords to Government in the collection of the revenue, has also particular advantages given to it; that it is a monopoly; and what right, it is asked, has Congress to grant a monopoly? I will ask, in return, when an officer is appointed to collect the customs, has he not a salary and emoluments? Is not every office in law called a franchise or a particular privilege? If the officer who has these emoluments, privileges, or franchises, (call them what you will,) receives these in consideration for his services, have you not the power to hold out inducements to associated bodies of men to form an institution from which the public may derive benefit, not with a view exclusively to their monopoly and benefit, but on account of the advantages to be derived from it by the public?

If it is urged that instead of this incorporated company, you might appoint officers in the different ports of the States in which the greatest duties are collected, and issue notes, or bills of credit, which are made current, without creating a bank authorized to make discounts, I admit we might; but if we believe it not so convenient and safe a way of collecting our revenue as through the agency of a bank, we have the right to associate men in a banking company for this purpose, and give them particular privileges, upon the same principles that we give privileges or franchises to every officer we appoint; and although we thus confer in both instances privileges, it is done for the public good, because the object to be effected can be accomplished by no other means so effectually. If you want an association of men in a particular manner, to make them subservient to some political use, you have authority to give to those associating men whatever privilege may be sufficient to induce them to associate for this purpose. You do not give them this privilege for their own individual advantage, but as the lure, the bonus for association, by which association the public object is effected. I would ask whether Congress could not to-morrow pass a law authorizing the President to open a negotiation with Hope and Co., saying, we have full confidence in you, and you shall be the United States' bankers? This may be said to be a monopoly; but, if Congress were convinced that this was the safest means of collecting the revenue, I ask where is the clause of the Constitution which, in substance or words, prohibits Congress from adopting such a measure? If there be no clause to prohibit this, there is no prohibition to the passage of a law for incorporating individuals in an association from which the greatest possible facility in the collection of the revenue is expected. In a word, sir, it appears to me that the only rule in an instance of this kind is, to take care that the means used have a necessary reference to the object of the power. When legislating on the enumerated powers of Congress, the only limitation is an inquiry whether the means we are about to use necessarily relate to the effectuation of the object in view. For instance, I should consider it a violation of the Constitution, if Congress, under the power "to make rules for the government of the land and naval forces," should pass a law regulating military testamentary devises; because the incident is too remote, it is too great a stretch of power, the constitutionality or unconstitutionality being regulated by the relation of the means to the object to be effected. If this reasoning be just, then, this question is not soluble by the mere determination of the question whether or not this is the best system by which our revenue can be collected; we must, to insure its rejection on Constitutional grounds, prove that the power of establishing a bank is so remote from the object of collecting the revenue, as to have no connexion with it. Admit that a better system of collecting the revenue can be devised, than by the establishment of a bank; it does not follow that the bank is unconstitutional. The only question is, whether it is so remote, as that by no satisfactory process of reasoning you can prove its analogy to the collection of the revenue. If it be shown that a better system could be adopted, it only proves that this is inexpedient; not that it is unconstitutional; and, sir, it has been a matter of astonishment to me, that, notwithstanding it was so universally believed some time since that the agency of the bank was excessively conducive to the prompt and regular collection of the revenue, it is now discovered that its agency is unnecessary. The gentlemen who are now of this opinion thought otherwise formerly, and the Secretary of the Treasury, who is best enabled to decide the question, is of a different opinion from them.

In answer to those, sir, who say that State banks afford the facility necessary to the collection of the revenue, I would ask, is the General Government to be dependent on the State banks for the collection of the revenue? Or do gentlemen believe they would be as secure and responsible as the Bank of the United States? As to the remark that in those States where there are no banks the revenue is collected with as much facility as where there are banks, I would reply that where there are no banks there is nevertheless bank currency in circulation. Where the States have no banks of their own, the notes of the Bank of the United States are in circulation and the customs paid in those notes. A National Bank, I am under a strong conviction, is, if not indispensable, highly conducive to a convenient collection of the revenue; and if this bank be put down to-day, before a long interval of time we shall have another bank. In my estimation there ought to be a bank whose paper circulates freely throughout the States; other paper will answer the same purpose. I recollect to have been travelling where I had in my pocket-book five hundred dollars in good bank notes; and yet I was compelled to trespass on another gentleman in company with me to bear my expenses. If the notes I had with me had been notes of the Bank of the United States, they would have circulated freely, because the merchants gladly receive them from the planters for the purpose of remittance, &c., but it always will be otherwise with State banks. From their nature they cannot give that general circulation which is derived from a general bank.

enormous evil and the danger to our liberties that is to be anticipated from giving the power to erect corporations, which he says is an original power, and has given being to institutions which have swelled to an enormous magnitude. The example of the East India Company and the South Sea Company were spoken of in an alarming, impressive, and ingenious manner. But, I ask, sir, if the State governments do not possess this gigantic power? I see nothing to restrain them more than the General Government. I see that the only supervisors as to the State governments are the people themselves, who are also the supervisors of Congress, who have also the invidious jealous eyes of the State governments constantly upon them, as is illustrated in the conduct of some of the States on this very question, and who combined would guard this power from abuse by the General Government much more than the people alone will guard against abuses by the States. It is a visionary mode of reasoning to argue against the possession of power from the abuse of it. The gentleman may as well tell us that we may raise armies to so monstrous an extent as to crush our liberties; and, therefore, we ought not on any emergency to raise an army. He may as well say the creation of a military school, which is as much and no more a resulting power than the one in question, is giving to Congress a great substantive independent power to create a vast engine, under the name of a military school, which may swell to such an immense importance to make it an instrument to swallow all the liberties of the country. So as respects sites for forts and armories, and ore banks, powers exercised by implication, the gentleman, from the unlimited indulgence he gives to a gloomy and foreboding imagination, may say, you may purchase the territorial rights of the States until you destroy their sovereignty. There is no end to the extent of such reasoning. We must rely in some degree on ourselves, on the vigilance of the State governments, and on the discretion of the people. When the whole body politic is so corrupt that there are no eyes on our rulers to see when they transcend the powers of the Constitution, all is lost, and no paper reservations can save us.

From this reasoning, sir, I again reiterate that I conclude that when the Constitution was formed and promulgated, it was the intention of the framers of the Constitution and of those who adopted it, in the powers they gave to the Congress of the United States, to include that power, and establish a bank if such an institution was considered convenient, necessary, and proper to carry into execution any one of the enumerated powers conceded to the General Government; and, if it was Constitutional then, it is equally so now.

In the course of the very elaborate and able speech delivered by my colleague a few days past on this subject, he stated these two positions; that a right to grant charters of incorporation is not of a description of character similar to, and has no analogy with, any of the enumerated powers of Congress.

2d. That the right to grant charters of incorporation was a distinct and sovereign power, equal in itself to any of the enumerated powers granted to Congress.

As to the first position, that the right of creating corporations or banks has no analogy to the enumerated powers of Congress, permit me to observe this is begging the question, or rather entirely evading it. If it is admitted by every one (and this has been admitted) that banks afford the greatest facility of collecting your revenue, and you have a right to avail yourself of the best means to carry into execution your enumerated powers, the right to create banks has an immediate connexion with and grows out of the power to levy and collect taxes, which brings this merely to a question of expediency.

His second position was, that the right to create corporations or banks was a distinct and sovereign power, equal in itself to any of the enumerated powers of Congress; that it wants that connexion, affiliation, and subserviency, to some enumerated power, which is necessary to give a power by implication. I know not that a law granting a charter of incorporation is more an act of sovereignty than a law passed on any other subject. That it is a power, original, independent, and of itself equal to any one of the enumerated powers, cannot be admitted, because it has not been contended by any that Congress possess the power of creating corporations at all times and in all instances. It is only contended to be proper and Constitutional when it is used in subserviency to the enumerated powers of Congress, as the means best calculated to carry any enumerated power into execution. The right of creating incorporations for this purpose only, and under this limitation, can never make it a power equal in character and magnitude to any one of our enumerated powers, because if it is used as a mere subservient instrument to them in that point of view—if it can be demonstrated that they are a convenient means to effect a legitimate object, my colleague must admit their constitutionality, because he has emphatically dwelt on that clause of the Constitution which gives to Congress the power to make all laws necessary and proper; and to those who apprehend that this power may be abused and Congress may attempt to exercise it in instances not within the pale of their legitimate authority, I answer they may also abuse any other power they possess. The only preservation is the virtue of our Legislature and the vigilance of our people.

The next point which remains to be investigated is, whether the constitutionality of the bill under consideration receives any support from its principles having been sanctioned by any former laws and measures of the Government.

Mr. President, I am ready to admit that where a measure obtains, that inflicts a violation on our Constitution that is unquestionable, palpable, and notorious, however frequently and however solemnly this measure had been sanctioned, however long it had been submitted to and endured, would not be considerations with me of any importance or create one moment of doubt. Error, however repeated and submitted to, is error still, and every occasion should be sought to get rid of it; but on an occasion in the origin of which the Constitutional question was doubtful, when men of the purest integrity and most illumined intelligence might pause and differ and doubt, I should imagine that such case once acted on should never again be touched, unless considerations of irresistible importance lead to such a measure; and I imagine that every man of candor and intelligence who weighs with due deliberation the question under consideration, will at least admit, if the measure is not certainly Constitutional, it is at least of that description of character I have last mentioned. In such an instance as this, will it be said that after this measure has been sanctioned by Congress on full deliberation and debate; after the bill establishing this bank had received the approbation of the President, who reserved his signature to it till the last moment permitted by the Constitution, and after he had viewed the question with all its bearings in every attitude it could be presented, after full consultation with his Cabinet Ministers and others of high intellectual character; after the law thus sanctioned by the Legislature and the President has been acquiesced in and practised on for the space of twenty years, when it has been considered inviolable, and corroborating laws passed during the administration and legislation of different dominant political parties; when those laws have been sanctioned by the solemn adjudication of all our judges, both of the General and State Governments; to suppose that all these considerations are to have no influence as to putting to rest a Constitutional question which was doubtful in its origin, is to be sceptical and scrupulous beyond all reasonable bounds. If Congress had no right to incorporate a bank, was it not an act of usurpation in the President and Congress to pass laws punishing individuals for the forgery of its paper? Nay, more, Mr. President, when we inflict death for the support of institutions Congress had no right to create, and for the violation of laws the Constitution prohibits that body from enacting—(and under the denomination of each of the political sects into which this country is divided, agreeable to the principles now contended for by gentlemen, such laws have been passed)—are not the Executive which sanctions, the Congress which passed, and the whole body of our Judiciary, both of the General and State Governments, which enforces such unconstitutional measures, and under their surreptitious authority inflicts death upon our citizens, worse than usurpers? Are they not murderers? Yes, Mr. President, I reiterate, are they not murderers? And are we prepared to pronounce so heavy a denunciation on our predecessors, on ourselves, and the other great Departments of our Government? Are we ready to inform the American people that this body and all their constituted authorities have sported with the lives and illegally shed the blood of our citizens? My colleague was foreman of the jury that pronounced sentence, or that found a verdict, on the famous or rather infamous Logwood, for forgery of the paper of the Bank of the United States. This verdict was confirmed by the judge of the court, and the criminal punished agreeably to the judgment. Is a measure of such weighty and awful import, so solemnly and deliberately acted on and decided, and multifarious other decisions of the same description, to have no influence on the decision we are about to give respecting the constitutionality of establishing a National Bank? If they are not, then gentlemen view the subject through a very different medium than that through which it is presented to my vision. Then, in my judgment, Mr. President, our situation is alarming indeed.

This vibrating, Constitutional doctrine, to-day one thing, to-morrow another, as the domination of one party or the other, or the passions of the moment shall prevail, will reduce our Constitution to nothing, or render it a mere instrument for depraved men, if such should get into power, to accomplish their wicked purposes, and to destroy the liberties and oppress the virtuous people of this country. It is a wise maxim of our municipal law that in novelty there is danger, but antiquity of law sanctifies error. If this principle is just, as it respects municipal law—and of this, in my judgment, there can be no doubt—it is infinitely more so when applied to fundamental and Constitutional principles, which, when once fixed, on all questions of a doubtful nature, should never again be agitated. The influence which the decision of the Judiciary may have on settling the constitutionality of the law incorporating the Bank of the United States, is not intended to be urged by me as an argument, which in my judgment ought to be relied on, because I conceive it the duty of the Judiciary merely to expound what is the law of Congress, and to determine between a law and the Constitution is assuming to the Judiciary a power not appertaining to it—a power inconsistent with the genius of our Constitution, and such a one as, if exercised by any judiciary, under a popular Government, will ultimately destroy the Government itself.

The inference, therefore, which is derived from the reasoning above insisted on, from the decisions of the Judiciary, is intended for those who insist that your Federal Judiciary have a right to decide on the constitutionality of any law passed by Congress which comes under its cognizance. The aid I myself derive from the source of precedent to support the constitutionality of this measure is solely from the reiterated acts of different Congresses, and the approbation of different Presidents, and the concurrence under them for the space of more than twenty years during the prevalence of different political parties. An attempt has been made by the honorable member from Tennessee, and others, to invalidate the accuracy of the inference drawn from this principle of precedency, by insisting that the bank law was in the nature of a contract with individuals, by which private rights became vested, and therefore the Government was bound to carry it into effect. The gentleman from Tennessee imagines that during the period of the republican Administration and majority in Congress, which acted upon this bank law, it was considered in the nature of a contract, and as such, Government determined to carry it into effect with good faith, and with that view passed the several corroborating laws which have been from time to time enacted. But this reasoning, sir, of the gentleman from Tennessee has been so fully refuted by my honorable colleague, in the very able speech he delivered on this question some days past, as to obviate the necessity of further commenting on it. I will only repeat one remark that was made by my colleague. If the bank law was unconstitutional at first, it could not give any legal corporate existence to any body of men to form a legal contract in a corporate character which had no such existence. Therefore, there existed no legal contract; the faith of Government was not pledged; it was like a contract with a married woman, or an idiot; it was ipso facto void.

To recapitulate: I derive the power to create a National Bank, when this Constitution came into existence, from the situation of society, and our legal institutions at that time, and the difficulty, as things existed, that the revenue could be collected with advantage in any other way than by the agency of a bank. If this reasoning be deemed erroneous, I insist that the Constitutional power of Congress to create a bank was in the first instance doubtful, and the principle having been recognised, and having received every sanction the Government could give, and practised on for more than twenty years, is not now to be called in question. Admitting that on both these points my views are erroneous; say that the establishment of the bank, at its commencement, was improper, still, if it be demonstrated that the existence or rechartering of the bank is indispensable, or highly expedient at present, to the due exercise of enumerated rights of Congress, that which was improper or even perhaps unconstitutional at first, because it was not necessary, becomes Constitutional and proper, because now expedient or essential. Congress is clothed by the Constitution with a variety of delegated rights. Now, admitting that the establishment of a bank in the first instance was not necessary for the due exercise of the legislative rights bestowed in any one of these enumerated powers, if our predecessors in office, by the creation of a bank, which at best was an improper institution, because not necessary, have placed our fiscal concerns in such a situation that it cannot be put down without great injury to the revenue, which Congress is bound to levy and collect, without injuring our commerce, without impairing our public credit, without lessening the public welfare, all of which Congress is bound to provide for and protect; if this can be demonstrated to be the probable result of pulling down the bank at this period, I would ask whether that institution, which was improper at first, because not necessary, does not become proper, because almost indispensable at present?

In construing the Constitution of the United States, when legislating on the enumerated powers of Congress, I lay down this rule of construction: that the only limitation to the power of Congress is either some positive or implied prohibition in the Constitution itself, or the exercise of an honest and sober discretion. If, therefore, there is any reason to believe, at the present period and existing state of things, that by putting down the bank your revenue will be greatly impaired, your commerce will be injured, the public credit lessened, all of which Congress is to protect; does not such a state of things make it proper that that bank, which ought not to have been created, because not necessary, now ought to be continued because indispensable? It may here be said, that I am varying the Constitution if I say that a thing is proper to-day which was not proper five and twenty years ago; that this vibration will always keep the Constitution in an uncertain state. I say, no. My doctrine is subject to no such accusation; the principles of the Constitution are uniform and unalterable. It is an uniform and unalterable principle, that Congress have the power to lay and collect taxes; they have the same positive, unchangeable right to exercise all the enumerated powers, the only rule of construction relating to them being that the means you use have a necessary relation to the power on which you legislate. If the means be not enumerated, you exercise discretion as to the means, having a regard to the existing state of things when you legislate concerning them. The same means may be necessary and proper now, which would not have been twenty years ago. You change the means to attain the end, but the end itself, the enumerated power in the Constitution, remains unchanged. As long as the Constitution exists, you must select the means most proper for executing the enumerated rights at the precise moment at which you legislate respecting them. If this be the true construction of the Constitution respecting the recharter of the bank, the question merely resolves itself into an inquiry how far such a measure is at present expedient. To determine at this moment whether or not it be Constitutional, or in other words expedient, to incorporate the Bank of the United States, I am to say whether, under existing circumstances, in the present state of society, situation of trade and revenue, the preservation and continuance of this institution is essentially necessary. If it be essentially necessary, we have a right to recharter the bank. I have been precise in stating this view of the subject, because it has not before been taken by any other gentleman.

With respect to the expediency of rechartering this institution, I am somewhat surprised that any doubt should be entertained. It appears to me that gentlemen have become incredulous beyond all possible bounds. I believe, sir, it was a wise saying of the sage Plato, that incredulity is the fountain of knowledge. But even to this maxim there must be some limit, as seems to be illustrated on the present occasion, when incredulity has been carried even beyond all reasonable bounds. When general distress is in view; when all around us is proof of the fact; when men in the best credit, men who have heretofore had the greatest command of money, now feel the want of it; when there is a general cry of distress from your large towns; when our table is loaded with petitions from all orders of people in our country, depicting in the most vivid colors their present sufferings and gloomy anticipations; when the surrounding banks are curtailing one-half of their accommodations; when our whole commerce is paralyzed by the various aggressions it has experienced, and by the shock which the agitation of this question has already given it, for gentlemen to shut their eyes to the effects of the dissolution of this institution is to me astonishing. In another point of view how can it be questioned? The honorable gentleman from Maryland, whose knowledge we have all benefited by and acknowledged on various occasions, has said, what is most unquestionably true, that money is like any other article of trade, valuable in proportion to its abundance or rarity. Then if you strike out of circulation the increased capital circulated by the Bank of the United States, is not a relative scarcity to be expected?

But it is not merely to the extent of the increased capital circulated by the Bank of the United States that money will be driven out of circulation. Those gentlemen who tell you that the State banks in this period of calamity and distress can afford sufficient accommodation, are in my estimation infinitely mistaken. The State banks will in the first instance frequently tend to increase the evil. The same men who have accommodation in the Bank of the United States, very frequently have it also in the State banks. The Bank of the United States, finding it necessary to settle the accounts, is anxiously employed in drawing into its vaults all the money it can to settle its affairs. The State banks, knowing there will be a run upon them, are also drawing in the money due them by the very individuals whom it is imagined they can accommodate by extended loans. Those State banks which were to relieve the merchants, &c. will join in the pressure; in order to secure themselves, they must produce the same curtailment to their customers which is used by the Bank of the United States. So that not only will the amount of the capital circulated by the Bank of the United States be driven out of circulation, but much also, for a time, of that paper which the State banks were in the habit of issuing to individuals. It is impossible to say to what extent the circulating medium will be diminished; that it will be to a great extent for a short time there can be no sort of doubt. And the depression of the price of flour at this period is proof that the present apprehensions have already produced this effect; for although I would yield much to the superiority of information of the gentleman from Maryland on mercantile affairs as on most others, yet in this instance his information is not, in my estimation, correct. It is a notorious fact that flour is now in as great demand as ever it has been in Cadiz, Lisbon, and Gibraltar. It is not long since I saw an account of flour having sold at twenty dollars at Gibraltar. Now, sir, if a merchant here knew he could get this price there, of from eighteen to twenty dollars, as is unquestionably the fact, would a temporary depression of the prices at Liverpool, as has been imagined by the gentleman from Maryland, have any effect here? None at all. If our merchants could get eighteen or twenty dollars at Lisbon, the depression of price at Liverpool would not have the least operation here; it is an unquestioned fact that the price in the ports I have mentioned is constantly kept up—and yet the price did fall at the moment the bank question was thought to be decided; I think, it fell two dollars immediately; and it was no doubt from the difficulty of obtaining money, which it was supposed would result from the dissolution of the Bank of the United States, that this article fell. When you diminish the quantity of money which is to represent the articles of trade brought to market, I do not want the gentleman's mercantile knowledge to inform me—it is a plain proposition—that such a measure goes to depress the price of the article brought to sale. That the destruction of the Bank of the United States, as it will lessen the circulating currency for a time, must go to depress the price of produce is unquestionable, and will also diminish for a time the circulation of the notes of other banks, because they must reduce their discounts. This effect may be but temporary, but will exist to a certain extent.

The gentleman from Maryland has observed that no apprehensions are entertained by the people of Baltimore on account of the dissolution of the United States' Bank. I think I have been informed that one of the most wealthy men in that town has said he had a vessel to load, and knew where he could send her so as to clear six dollars per barrel on flour; for that flour at this period could be purchased here at eight dollars and might be sold abroad for eighteen; but in consequence of the entire impossibility of obtaining money from the banks at present, from the fear entertained respecting the dissolution of the Bank of the United States, it was not in his power to load his vessel. Such, sir, I have been advised, is the situation of one of the wealthiest men of that town. The Bank of Columbia has at one stroke lessened its discounts fifty per cent., in consequence of the apprehension entertained respecting the dissolution of the Bank of the United States. What has the gentleman from Massachusetts told you? That $400,000 are loaned to the people of this District by the Bank of the United States. What will be the effect in this little District of drawing three or four hundred thousand dollars out of circulation? Sir, to tell me that the reduction of circulating medium will not produce (it may be but for a short time) a correspondent reduction of the prices of produce, is to tell me that I cannot see the noon-day sun. How long this reduction of the circulating medium and the consequent depression of prices may last, it is difficult to say.

SENATE.

Bank of the United States.

FEBRUARY, 1811.

When the numerous late failures and bankruptcies are spoken of, what is the reply? That they do not proceed from a want of bank accommodations, but from the protesting of bills abroad; that our merchants have much property abroad, but the difficulty of obtaining returns for it has been such as to embarrass our strongest houses. Is this a reason why we should accumulate difficulties on our merchants? Fifteen or twenty millions are said to be tied up in foreign countries, more especially in England, and such is the situation of England that we cannot get remittances from there. This is an admirable reason, sir, indeed, for selecting this particular moment for calling on the merchants to make an immediate payment to the amount of fourteen millions, which they owe this institution, and which, if put down, it is reasonable to believe will require immediate payment.

This is regulating trade with a witness. By the annihilation of the Bank of the United States a considerable portion of our circulating medium is destroyed. At the same period our merchants are called on to pay their debt to the United States' Bank to the amount of fourteen millions, and their revenue bonds amount to about twelve millions. This, too, at a period when the funds of our merchants to a great extent are in England, and cannot be withdrawn.

To me it appears that the situation of the country, as respects commerce, and everything else, makes it important, at this crisis, above all others, that this institution should be preserved.

But gentlemen, and very intelligent gentlemen tell us, this is a mere momentary pressure; that, the money in the Bank of the United States, and the revenue as collected, will be deposited in other banks, who will issue paper or specie in proportion to the additional capital in their banks; that there will be a mere temporary vacuum, which will soon be filled. If I am to be placed in an apartment from which all respirable air is exhausted, and for a very short time to remain there, but till all vitality is extinguished, it will truly be a delightful consolation previously to advise me that this vacuum is temporary, and, after I am destroyed, the equilibrium will be restored and fresh air admitted. Precisely of this nature is the consolation afforded to your ruined merchants and others. What avails it if the cause be momentary, but the effect as to them be permanent? This awful moment will bring permanent destruction to thousands. And for what purpose do we produce this destruction? To get rid of the foreign influence produced by the stock held by foreigners. Yet, sir, this foreign capital is one of the most beneficial consequences attending the bank institution.

In a new country, constantly developing new resources of every description, an increasing population, increasing commerce, agriculture, manufactures, and multiplied objects on which capital can be employed to great advantage to develop the wonderfully increasing energies and resources of our young country, we can afford to pay foreigners good interest for the use of their capital. This is one of the great reasons with me in favor of the bank. We are admonished that this foreign capital gives to foreigners a dreadful political influence. Admit the assertion, which however is not true. Who invited it here? The Government itself. We ourselves sold this stock to foreigners. Our Secretary of the Treasury, with the knowledge and consent of the Government, bargained and transferred great part of it. Is this good faith, is it honorable and just? After we have received a bonus for the transfer of the stock to individuals, under the idea that the charter was inviolable and secure, to destroy the institution to get rid of this foreign capital which we ourselves had invited here? If these moneyed banking institutions are these horrid engines of political influence and corruption some have contended for, the only way to obtain any good they afford, and yet avoid their deleterious effects, is to get foreigners to send their money here, and invest it in our funds. We get the benefit of their money, whilst we are so far removed from them that they can have no operation on us. For, sir, it is notorious to those who are informed on the subject, that we feel less inconvenience or political influence from foreigners who hold stock, than from natives who possess it. This inference must be obvious when I state, that foreigners who hold stock have no vote in the choice of directors.

Again, sir, is not the critical situation in which we stand in respect to our foreign relations a particular reason why we should not at this time make experiments which may injure the public revenue? If we enforce our non-intercourse law, and England attempts to resist it and force her imports into our country, by Florida and our southern frontiers on one side and Canada and Nova Scotia on the other, it is at least questionable whether our revenue will not be greatly diminished. In our present unsettled situation, with our merchants staggering under the weight of the non-intercourse, embargo, and foreign spoliation—is this a moment to try experiments that may have the effect of reducing our revenue, by crippling our mercantile enterprise, and forcing our merchants to withdraw their funds from commerce, in order to pay their bonded duties and bank debts? But will the destruction of this bank rid us of the dreaded influence of foreign capital? No; you get in its stead an influence infinitely worse; you encourage speculation, which will produce an evil of an infinitely more pestiferous kind. If this bank be put down, another ere long I have no doubt will be created, for that another bank must and will be created is avowed by many who vote against continuing this, and whenever this takes place a scene of stock-jobbing will ensue to an extent which cannot be now calculated. When a new bank and a new stock is created, although by prohibiting foreigners to be subscribers in the first instance it will at first be taken up by our own citizens, yet, if the European capitalist finds it to his advantage to have money here he comes and purchases our stock; our citizens, in the subscription to the new stock, engage in a scene of the most debasing speculation; our citizens afterwards sell this stock to foreigners whose foreign influence we wish to avoid, and after having gone this vicious circle we arrive precisely at the point where we started. The same foreigners who now have so much of this bank stock will reinvest their money in the stock of the new bank to be created. This dissolution of the bank, then, is trying wild visionary experiments, possibly in its consequences convulsing society to its centre, sporting with the feelings and happiness of the country, impairing mercantile credit and enterprise, injuring the tranquillity of many of our most meritorious citizens, who see ruin hovering over them from the measure we seem like to adopt; and after all this is done, we come round to the precise point from which we commenced.

It has either suggested itself to my mind upon reflection on the subject, or it is an idea suggested by some political writer, (and I think the latter is the case,) either Hume or Smith, or both, that a gradual, silent and almost imperceptible increase of money or circulating medium has the happiest effects on society, and operates as the most salutary stimulus to the exertions and industry of a nation, because it operates as a gradual though perhaps nominal premium to industry, by increasing the price of every article that is brought into market; and the influence which the discovery of the mines of South America had on the European world, by bringing into circulation an increased quantity of the precious metals, is instanced, as well as I recollect, by some of the economists, as an illustration of this observation; for the increase of industry, of the arts, and of all social comforts which soon followed this event has been remarked by several political writers. If this invisible increase of the circulating currency of a nation is from the causes abovementioned productive of such happy effects, will not the immediate extinguishment of a great National Bank, and the consequent diminution of the circulating currency of your country, have an immediate opposite and baneful operation upon society? Will it not produce a temporary depression of prices of many of the necessities and luxuries of life, and to a certain extent lessen and benumb the vigor and exertions of our citizens? It is true, this effect may be temporary, because new banks will remove the evil—but is there any reason to produce this evil even for a moment; or, in other words, should we produce this deleterious effect for one moment by the destruction of one bank, that we, or the States, by the erection of new banks, may remove the evil we ourselves have created? This seems to be producing a calamity that we may either remove or mitigate it.

The bank, it has been objected, has been used as an instrument of improper political influence.

Let it be remembered, Mr. President, that I am not advocating the mere renewal of the charter of the Bank of the United States. I am only for rechartering it on certain conditions, or, in other words, with a view that it may subscribe to the amount of its capital to a newly created bank on different principles, of larger extent of capital, and with a portion of the directors appointed by the Government. This, sir, will effectually prevent the directors from using the bank as a political engine against the Government itself, and obviates every objection on this head. Witness the Bank of Virginia—how effectually is such an operation guarded against there by such a provision.

I have no sympathy for the directors of this bank, who are said to have improperly exercised this political influence—all my sympathies are in opposition to them. It is not for the benefit of, or tenderness for these directors that I advocate the bill on your table. I know none of them, nor care anything about them, further than not to do them injustice. They may have conducted themselves exceedingly improperly—I believe they have done so many years past, on some occasions—but this is not the way to seek redress for their misconduct. Sir, I have heard of a man who, when irritated, in order to obtain satisfaction, would seat himself on a chafing-dish of hot coals. The mode which is proposed to punish the directors for their real or supposed misconduct is equally wise in this instance. I would not injure the public welfare and heap ruin on very many innocent men for injuries long since committed, if at all, by these directors, and which never can be revived. Besides, this evil is gradually correcting itself. When there was only the Bank of the United States, or very few others, the consequence was, that it was a species of favoritism to get into the banks, and a privilege extended only to particular friends.

But at the extent to which banks are carried at present in the Northern and Middle States, to which the operation of the Bank of the United States is principally confined, it is not a species of favoritism to obtain bank accommodation. In the city of Philadelphia, before the late alarm, produced by agitating the question we are now discussing, every man who could produce good paper might get as much accommodation as he pleased; and to this extent banks should always be carried if once commenced. This is a remedy for favoritism, and prevents the bank from being formidable as a political engine. If we go to banking at all, let it be so that all good paper can be accommodated. When the banks compete for paper, it is then not a system of favoritism. They rather seek for customers than select them. Such was the situation of Philadelphia. What is the consequence of a contrary system in Richmond? In consequence of the erection of a bank there with a little capital, the discounts got into the hands of a few favorites, and Richmond is stated by some to have almost become a nest of shavers. Those persons who are favorites go into the bank, get accommodated with large discounts, on the strength of which they shave the paper of others; but in Philadelphia the situation is essentially different, from the redundancy of banking capital; thus the evil of political oppression and intolerance, to which the Bank of the United States is said to be instrumental, is cured by the establishment of other banks; but it is possible that to a certain extent the undue influence of banks generally may be revived by putting down the Bank of the United States and creating a want of banking capital in the community. If there be a greater demand for discounts than can be met by the remaining banks after that of the United States is destroyed, then you revive with the remaining banks that power of political influence and favoritism which you are so anxious to avoid, and increase the calamity you deprecate by the very means you take to avoid it.

In a perfectly well regulated state of society, it seems to me things should be so ordered, if it can be effected, that every individual of the community should obtain loans of money, on reasonable interest, to any extent for which he can give ample security. In such a state of things, an opportunity is afforded to bring into action, and to develop all the resources of the nation, to improve its agriculture, its manufactures, its commerce, and all the social arts, to the greatest possible extent. Such was the state of Holland, such the state of England before the present disturbances in Europe; and mark the result. Each country polished and improved like a garden, their commerce extending over the world, and all the discoveries and arts which enrich and adorn social life carried almost to the utmost limit of perfection. This state of things can be effected in this country only by the agency of banks. As we are every day increasing our population, commerce, and agriculture, &c., and bringing into action an increased quantity of objects on which money can be advantageously employed, a proportionably increased quantity of circulating medium, or of banking capital, is necessary to keep pace with the improvements and progress of society. If this reasoning is just, it is surely improper to destroy our greatest moneyed institution, and consequently banish from circulation a portion of the circulating medium at a period when the state of the nation is capable of employing to useful purposes a larger capital than at a former period. If it is apprehended that, by affording this facility of borrowing money, to the extent I have insisted on, to every individual who can give security, incautious men will ruin themselves. I answer, they will do this in any state of things. To argue against the use of an institution from the possible abuse of it, is not a just mode of reasoning. A sensualist may destroy himself by excesses in the enjoyment of the table, yet more temperate men will eat their dinner. That society should be deprived of the use of an institution, from which its prudent members can obtain great advantage, because imprudent people will be ruined by it, is, to tax the valuable members of the community for the benefit of the unworthy. I am informed, Mr. President, that for some years past, in the State of Pennsylvania, any citizen of that State could obtain, on good security, from the banks as much money as he wanted. Sir, what astonishing progress has she made in every kind of improvement and in every species of wealth! Look at the State which I have the honor to represent, whose apprehensions about banking institutions have made her averse to the extension of such establishments. The result has been that, notwithstanding she is, perhaps, the greatest agricultural State in the Union, furnishing more copiously (and the most valuable) articles of export, and possessed of all the materials of commerce, she is destitute, in a comparative degree, of commerce itself. When cargoes of wheat, flour, or tobacco, are wanted in Europe, a merchant of Philadelphia is applied to to furnish these articles, though they are to be purchased in Virginia. But wherefore? Because, having no banks in Virginia that are adequate to the wants of society, our merchants cannot afford to advance the money, purchase the cargo, and draw for the amount. On the contrary hand, the Philadelphia merchant can go into a bank, get as much money as he wishes to purchase a cargo with, send it on to Virginia and make the purchase, and, after the vessel is loaded, draw on the owner for the amount of the cargo and his commission. Comparatively speaking, all mercantile profit is drawn from us; our produce is exported and our imports imported by the merchants of other States, who derive all the profits of our commerce, which, in a different state of things, would remain with us and constantly increase the wealth and resources of the State. I have been induced to enter into this train of reasoning and statement of facts, in order more clearly to illustrate this position, to wit: that in order to prevent a banking institution or its directors from having a political or other improper influence, it was not necessary to destroy an institution which was in itself useful, but to correct its abuses by extending the banking principle till all good paper could be accommodated. I have stated that in Pennsylvania, until the present alarm which this discussion has produced, any person deserving credit could obtain it to any extent he wished. The banks in such a situation compete for customers; and, in such a state of things, the bank, not being able to accommodate all, must select its favorites, which gives to them particular advantages which others do not possess, and enables them to apply to usurious purposes the money they get out of the bank, by lending it to others, who, if there was a sufficiency of banking capital, would themselves go into the bank and be accommodated with that very money for which they now pay an usurious interest. Such a bank is an evil, and in such a state of society, where there exists such a difficulty of loaning money, a man worth $20,000 may have his fortune sacrificed to pay $5,000. This statement will clearly illustrate the object I have in view, which is, to show that by extending the banking system to the proper extent, if you once commence it, you destroy its political influence and prevent it from being an instrument of either public or private oppression. Such is the situation of the Bank of the United States at present. Whatever may be the disposition of their directors, they are incompetent for all the purposes of influence.

Mr. GILES said it was with regret he interrupted his friend, but he seemed to suppose the banking capital at Richmond was so small as to convert that city into a society of shavers. This was not correct. He, Mr. G., had a conversation with the president of the bank, from whom he understood that the bank could do more paper than was offered to it.

Mr. BRENT said he had heard no positive information as to the fact he stated; but it was well known that men as good as any in the United States had not been able to get their paper accommodated. He knew the President of the bank, for whom he had a sincere veneration and affection. No blame attached to the bank. He said that the establishment of a bank anywhere, however pure, provided it was not adequate to the wants of society, would produce shaving.

Mr. B. said he had many other remarks which he wished to submit, but the hour was so far advanced he would not trespass further on the attention of the Senate at present. If a fit opportunity should hereafter occur, he might again take the liberty of making a few observations on this subject, but he would avail himself of this occasion to say that he did not mean to make any reflection on the Directors of the Bank of Virginia; they were not in the smallest degree censurable. He believed the affairs of the bank were ably and honorably conducted by them.

TUESDAY, February 19.

The credentials of JOHN CONDIT, appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the State of New Jersey, for the term of six years, commencing on the fourth day of March next; and of WILLIAM B. GILES, appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the State of Virginia, for the term of six years, commencing on the fourth day of March next; were severally read, and ordered to lie on file.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill, entitled "An act authorizing the Secretary of State to cause a general index to the laws of the United States to be made, printed, and distributed;" and the bill was ordered to the third reading.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill, entitled "An act providing for the sale of a tract of land lying in the State of Tennessee, and a tract in the Indiana Territory;" and the bill was ordered to the third reading.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill making further provisions for the disposal of the sections of land heretofore reserved for the future disposition of Congress, and for other purposes.

On motion to amend the bill, section 1, line, 21, after the word "acre," and strike out as follows:

"And that the whole of the purchase money shall be paid by the purchaser within three months from the day of sale, otherwise the sum deposited shall be forfeited, and the land revert to the United States, in the same manner as is provided by law in the case purchasers of public lands fail to complete their first instalments;"

It was determined in the affirmative—yeas 22, nays 2, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Bayard, Campbell, Condit, Crawford, Cutts, Franklin, Gaillard, Giles, Gilman, Goodrich, Gregg, Leib, Pickering, Reed, Smith of Maryland, Smith of New York, Tait, Taylor, Turner, Whiteside, and Worthington.

NAYS—Messrs. Bradley and Lambert.

The bill having been amended, the PRESIDENT reported it to the House accordingly.

On the question, Shall this bill be engrossed and read a third time as amended? it was determined in the affirmative.

Mr. CAMPBELL, from the committee to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act to authorize the election of sheriffs in the Indiana Territory," reported it with an amendment; which was read.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to amend and continue in force an act, entitled "An act to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States," passed on the 25th day of February, 1791.

Mr. TAYLOR.—Mr. President: Although much time has been consumed in the discussion of the subject before us, and the ground completely occupied by those who have gone before me, yet the importance of the subject, the immense magnitude of the unhappy consequences likely to result to the nation from the rejection of the bill on your table, compel me to offer to it all the support in my power. Indeed, sir, to this sense of duty to the nation is superadded a very sacred, and to me indispensable duty—my duty to the State which I have the honor in part to represent, as well as another duty, which, from the course the debate has taken, is not to be disregarded; I mean, sir, the duty which I owe to myself.

I cannot, as other gentlemen have boasted they can, put my hand into my drawer and pull out the instructions by which I am to be directed on this important subject.

The State of South Carolina is a very large stockholder in some of her State banks, and if a selfish policy, contracted to the narrow sphere of the unique advantage in dollars and cents of the government of that State—in contradiction and disregard of the great body of her own citizens, and the citizens of the rest of the States in the Union—could have weighed a moment with her Legislature, I too might have been instructed. Let me not be understood, Mr. President, as drawing any comparison between the conduct of the State of South Carolina and the conduct of the great and leading States who have acted otherwise; but I must and will tell of the things that I do know. I rejoice, sir, that the State which I come from has, in this instance, been actuated by that magnanimity and patriotism which on all former occasions has distinguished her conduct; that neither selfishness, nor party rage, nor a spirit of intolerance, has induced her to counteract or embarrass the National Legislature in its pursuit of the great object of its institution, the good of the whole.

I hope it will not be considered as savoring of egotism when I say that my appointment to the very honorable station I now hold was unsolicited by me. That my sentiments on the subject now under consideration had been by me unequivocally expressed at the last session of Congress, and were well known to those who appointed me. Nay, further, after my venerable and respected predecessor had resigned his seat here, and had declined, also, his appointment for the ensuing six years, pending the election of a successor to him, and when my name was held in nomination, a resolution was offered, similar to those which we have heard so much talk about, proposing to instruct the Senators of that State to oppose the renewal of the charter of the Bank of the United States. This resolution, as I am informed, lay on the Speaker's table when the election was gone into. I was elected, and the proposers of the resolution had not power nor influence enough to raise it from the table on which it lay, and it died stillborn at the end of the session; and if I were to make an inference at all on these transactions, I should suppose I was tacitly instructed to vote for the renewal of the bank charter. But I seek not the avoidance of responsibility. It is here, sir, in my own bosom, I have instructions paramount to all others. My beloved country has rested the matter here, and my gratitude is superadded to all other moral obligations operating on me to perform this trust, and to execute this duty with faithfulness. I find the authority of Congress to grant this charter in the same sections of the Constitution which the gentlemen who have gone before me have pointed out to you. In section seven, clause first, power is given to Congress "to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts, and provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States; but all duties shall be uniform throughout the United States."

Clause second gives power "to borrow money on the credit of the United States." And, in the last clause of said section, power is also given to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or any department or officer thereof.

Let us understand the meaning of the words necessary and proper, in the last quoted clause, for upon a correct knowledge of these depends, in my opinion, the correctness of our conclusions on this subject. The word necessary, in its technical and legal sense, in the meaning affixed to it in common parlance, established by usage, custom, reason, and the common law of the land, is different and distinct from the signification of the same adjective derived from the substantive ne*cessity*, as used by Hobbes, Hutchinson, Hume, and the other metaphysicians of the last century. It is well known that they used the substantive necessity as synonymous with the word fate, and which necessity, according to the opinions of one party, controlled omnipotence itself. This necessity was, supposed by them co-existent with the Deity itself, not prospective nor discretionary, bending in one way, and in one way only, all substance, all matter, and all spirit. This meaning of the word is only to be found with these metaphysicians and philosophers; but in our law books, in the daily and hourly use of the word in common conversation, it has no such meaning. When the old Congress passed the conditional charter—which I admit they had not a delegated power to grant, but which is fully in point, both as to the signification of the word and, also, of their opinion of the necessity, and even indispensableness of a bank for the administering the fiscal concerns of the nation—in the conclusion of the preamble they say that the exigencies of the United States render it indispensably necessary to pass the act, &c.; and in the laws passed during that period, when this Government was in the habit of following the English custom of beginning the laws by a preamble, you find the word necessary used as synonymous to expediency—practical expediency, (see Laws of the United States, vol 1, page 247; idem, page 276,) in fact, among frail mortals with fallible judgments like ours. With any beings endued with less than omniscience, the word necessary must be only applicable to the honest judgment we can make up concerning the subject to which we apply it; in other words, it is resolvable into that sound discretion with which, as moral agents, we are in the first instance intrusted by our Maker, and in the instance now before us, we are intrusted with by the Constitution and by the citizens who have sent us here to transact their business. But the rigid necessity which our opponents wish to enforce on us, this metaphysical necessity, must, from its very nature, be immutable; it must be unique, and could not exist in a greater or less degree; and, therefore, the word joined to it in the Constitution (proper) could have no meaning at all. The laws, to be passed, must be necessary, is the only one way given under heaven by which you are to effect the end desired; in other words, the law must be imposed by Fate. It is perfect nonsense to say that there is a latitude left with us to judge whether such a law is proper or improper. I have, I think, brought the meaning of the word necessary to the level and within the comprehension of frail human intellect. The signification of the word proper I take to contain the description of the measure or law to which it is applied, in the following respects: whether the law is in conformity to the letter, the spirit, and the meaning of the Constitution; whether it will produce the good end desired in the most ready, easy, and convenient mode, that we are acquainted with. Let us apply these definitions to the matter in hand.

Our opponents have admitted that banks are necessary to receive and take care of the revenue of the nation. They have, by their statements, shown that there is little more than one-half of the amount of specie in the country which the national revenue rises to annually, and the burden of the song is, that State banks will do.

Banks are, then, necessary and proper for the collecting, transmitting, and safe keeping of the revenue. Banks are created by law. Congress, by the Constitution, have the right of passing laws necessary and proper for the foregoing purposes. Banks are necessary and proper for these purposes; therefore, Congress have the right of passing a law to make a bank or banks. But, the power of granting charters and creating corporations is the exercise of the highest act of sovereignty say our opponents. I know no scale by which these acts of sovereignty are graduated. The power of legislation implies sovereignty, and the description of a high law and a low law is hardly to be found in any book I have yet met with. I will not dwell on this topic. The arguments of the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. BRENT) on this point are unanswerable. It is curious to observe the extremes to which some of our statesmen carried their doctrine twenty years ago, on this subject of charters and corporations; and I have recently met with some who deny that any Government has the right to grant them. Our little town corporations, and our city corporations, in the State I live in, have had to pass through the legal ordeal to satisfy the doubts of those who entertain this opinion. But now, all the States undoubtedly exercise it, or rather, they have continued to exercise it from their first existence. So have we, in legislating for this Territory. If this power is derived from the broad terms of the grant to pass laws for this District, in all cases whatsoever; and if the unlimited, unrestricted grant thus made, is supposed to dub us with the higher or quintessential sovereignty, I think it would not be a difficult matter to prove that this broad grant is, in fact, as much limited and restricted, according to its nature, as the grant of power in the concluding clause of the eighth section, which I have before cited.

Can Congress even pass a law respecting the Territory of Columbia, which, according to their opinions, shall not be necessary and proper? The well-being of its citizens, or the well-being of the citizens of the whole nation, (for even legislating the Territory into non-existence, if we could do so,) these would be the motives; in fact the Legislature must be non compos mentis, who could or would assign as a general reason, for any of its acts, one opposite to this one of its being necessary and proper.

Great stress is laid on that amendment of the Constitution, which says, that all power not expressly granted shall be retained, &c. Either the general clause I have relied on gives power or it does not; if it did not give power why was this amendment made? And if it did, and this power was offensive, why was it not stricken out when the amendment was made? But if it expressly gave power, which I contend, its being suffered to remain is proof that it was not the design of the amendment to take away the power given. Could not the Territory of Columbia have been governed without erecting a single corporation in it? I don't mean well governed. But was there that fatal necessity; that command from Jove,

"Ye fates fulfil it, and ye powers approve," to erect corporations? This legislation to erect corporations being, according to our opponents, sui generis, not of the ordinary kind, and only to be exercised where the express authority is given by the Constitution, I ask gentlemen to show the clause in the Constitution which expressly gives us the power to perform this sublimated act of legislation in this Territory any more than in any other part of the United States; and yet at this very session we have sent an armful of these high acts. The shelves of the office of the Secretary groan under the pile of charters we have granted.

I said it was easy to prove that the broad grant given to Congress to legislate for this Territory in all cases whatsoever, was restricted and paled in by the Constitution. Congress cannot make the duties here on imports less or greater than elsewhere in the United States—imports and taxes must be equal, &c.—nor deprive the citizens thereof of the right to a trial by jury, nor grant them titles of nobility; and yet the incidents here alluded to would come under the description in the clause "of all cases whatsoever." In truth, sir, there is not a scintilla of the spirit, nor a single word or letter of the Constitution, that loses its power and sanction upon our conduct in legislating in this particular. There is no more a power given us to legislate ad libitum on this Territory, nor to derive therefor powers by implication, than is given us in the laws we pass for the whole nation; and if this power, sui generis, of creating corporations, is properly defined by our opponents, they ought to go back to the works of yesterday, as well as to those of twenty years standing, in order to introduce their new order of things. I might here draw a comparison of the tried scheme of using the United States' Bank, and the untried scheme of using State banks in aid of the operations of the National Treasury; but I should only be saying with less force what has been so fully and so conclusively said by the gentlemen who have preceded me. Suffice it to say, that for safe-keeping, for transmission and payment of the funds to any part of the nation, and for enforcing the punctual payment by the debtors to the customs, by addressing to those debtors the arguments to the sense of honor and shame, and also to their interest, to wit: by denying them credit in the bank on failure in punctuality—all these have been afforded to the Government without its incurring therefor one cent's expense. Are we sure the State banks can or will do this? I beg pardon of the Senate for detaining them on topics not new. As this is made a case of conscience, I deemed it necessary to be thus particular. I have no hesitation in saying, we have the right to act on this subject, inasmuch as I think the bank is both necessary and proper for the purposes above referred to.

To me it appears that this power is expressly granted; we derive it not by implication; but our opponents, in fact, are pressed to the necessity of using implication to come at the denial they set up against the exercise by Congress of this power.

I say, further, that this institution is necessary and proper for carrying into effect another general power, viz: The power to borrow money on the credit of the United States.

I am one of those, Mr. President, who have always thought a superabundant Treasury was no national blessing. It is very easily to be demonstrated that as to the effect of accumulating national wealth, one dollar in the pockets of our citizens would add twice as much to the common stock as the same sum taken from them and lodged in the strong box of the Treasury. None but the nerve of a rigorous and miserly despot, such as was the father of Frederick the Great, of Prussia, could ever keep it together after it was collected. I fear that we Republicans are so generous in our natures, that in some way or other, for some favorite project of a fortification or fortifications, whether by land or water, we should let it go, and think, too, we were doing the greatest possible good with it. For sudden emergencies then, I conclude, while our Government lasts, we shall have to anticipate by loans, taking care, as I hope we always shall, and as we have done, to provide for the early release of the Government from such obligations, which the necessary or sudden emergencies are not to be suffered to accumulate. The Bank of the United States serves for effecting both objects—quick and reasonable loans. One clause of the bill compels the bank to loan to the United States the amount of half its capital; and the form of these loans, as heretofore practised by the Government, is by a mere entry in the bank books, and in the books of the Treasury of the United States, of the money borrowed, and the interest stated, which is payable thereon; in other words, there is no transferable stock delivered out, and which the Government cannot redeem whenever it pleases. I ask gentlemen, if the Government is not bound to provide the means necessary and proper of exercising this power of borrowing, and whether there can any way be devised, a more proper mode for the advantage of the nation, than the plan proposed; and will not this ready resource, which we have for five, six, or seven millions of dollars, serve to keep off the pressure and the combination of individual rapacity and of individual concert and cabal, with which your efforts to borrow may be met by the large capitalists, and give to Government time to borrow even from foreigners, if with them we can make a better bargain for the nation? I know some gentlemen talk largely of the vast sums of money which our citizens have ready to pour into the lap of the Government, if to them it should apply for a loan. The same boasting took place at the time this Government made its only experiment to borrow money from its citizens. Yes, sir, when there was a mighty rage against France, and the Government was urged into the expensive measures of that day, the experiment was made; and we had to give usury—sir, we had to give an interest of two per cent. more than the legal interest in the States where the loan was effected. The present crisis is an awful one. The system of non-importation is now in operation, which hermetically seals the lid of your Treasury box to the admission of revenue. It is known we shall have to borrow money. And after you put down this bank, where is the loaning capital of the nation to be found? I'll tell you where; it is under the management of the State banks, and those banks, at least in the largest money-holding State in the Union, (Pennsylvania,) are precluded from loaning to the United States, unless by consent of the Legislature. Will you go to those gentle and good souls, who give to the distressed the good bargains which the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. SMITH) told us of? Will you apply to the mercy and kindness and patriotism of those ravenous sharks and shavers, who are even considered as acting very moderately when they take from the distressed their one and an half per cent. per month, or eighteen per cent. per year, for the use of their money? I don't expect much patriotic support from such men as these; they would spurn you with contempt, if you offered them your pitiful and beggarly six per cent. But the State banks are the panacea for all difficulties—they may lend you the money you want, provided you get the consent of the State which granted their charters. But all the States have not restricted their banks from lending money to the United States. I am contemplating this not for a day only. Do you believe that New York or Maryland, after experiencing the effect which this controlling power of the State over the money of its citizens shall have on the General Government, will act so unwisely as to forego the advantage of influence in the Union derived from their dollars and eagles, and act so unjustly to themselves as not to follow the example? Why, sir, not for selfishness-sake, but for the sake of fair play, they ought and would do it. The States ought as little to disparage us in the exercise of our legitimate functions as we them—yet, by the operation of these State charters, millions of money are put out of our reach unless by their consent—when, by the Constitution, we are undeniably permitted to borrow money. Are we come to this—that this meagre and grim demon, this Dr. Snatchaway, who not only denies the powers derived incidentally, (although we have exercised them thousands of times,) but before whom withers and perishes the powers expressly granted; that this Devil Doctor is even now about to renew to us the distress of the honest Governor described by the inimitable Cervantes?

I beseech gentlemen, not to bring on a premature old age in this Government; I beseech them, not to disfranchise the Government of the necessary powers for carrying it into effect, and not to throw away the experience and the acquiescence of the nation for twenty years duration; and I most fervently beg that this power should not be surrendered to the great and leading States because they have inconsiderately asked for it; that Congress will not, in imitation of the good old Lear, yield to the members of our family what is wholesome and necessary for supporting our own household. Soon, very soon, the eyes or ears of one or more of the members of our family may be offended at the sight of our committees, our mendicant missions lounging about the lobbies and galleries of the State Legislatures, as some of us have been offended at the presence of the missionaries lounging about our galleries; we, who are now supplicated, will then be supplicators. While we succumb to the views or prejudices, or State policy of each particular State, from whence we implore the permission to borrow, we may succeed; but, act independently, run counter to their local feelings, they will not lend you a doit. Think you, sir, that the State of Pennsylvania would have consented to your making a loan from its banks at the period at which General Bright was in battle array against your authority? Think you, that Massachusetts would have treated your beggars kindly during the embargo ferment? Would the gentleman from Maryland, with his high standing in that State, the turn of whose politics, he says, may depend upon the continuing of this bank—could he, sir, with all his commercial knowledge and the eloquence he displays, have obtained the grant of a favor to the Government of the United States about two years ago? Ah no! sir. When civil broils, when political intolerance and party rage, shall pervade a Legislature, they will act as other men, and if excited only to the height which the newspapers seem anxious to excite them on the present occasion, there might be rashness enough found to induce them to use your messenger as was used the good old Kent, when supplicating in the cause of his houseless master. The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. GILES) has called the attention of the Senate to the 9th article of the amendments of the Constitution, viz: "the enumeration in the Constitution of certain rights shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people." Now Congress have the power to borrow money, and from plain and necessary implication, though not by express delegation, (such as is required by gentlemen in the instance before us,) we have the power to fix the rate of interest to be given; yet the State Legislatures have the power to fix the rate of interest which their citizens lending money shall receive, and have fixed and established that rate, and enforced the provisions on this subject by severe penalties. I know not how Mr. ADAMS found the States so much asleep to their rights when he tempted their citizens to become usurers, and this too in denial and disparagement of State powers actually exercised. If the present vigilance had then been exerted, I should suppose he was very lucky that he was not as much harassed as were some of the victims under his sedition law. Carry this doctrine of rigid construction in respect to this instance of collision of State and United States authorities to the extent contended for by the opposers of the bill—enforce to the fullest extent, according to its obvious meaning, the amendment last quoted, and we shall be surrounded with powers which we dare not use. We may borrow, but the citizens will not lend for the legal interest established by law—their States prohibit them lending at an usurer's interest, and impose heavy penalties if they do; or, to embarrass the General Government, the States or some of them holding the moneyed capital may prohibit individuals as they have prohibited the banks from lending to us, and thus benumb all our energies. In fact, sir, the doctrines and notions I have heard enforced here, seem calculated to place us in the situation of the miserable Tantalus; the limpid and wholesome stream is within our reach, but we dare not reach out our hands to take up a drop to cool our tongues, destined to the sufferance of eternal thirst. Let me now inquire how the destruction of this bank is to operate on the nation at large. By the minute detail of the honorable Senator from Maryland (Mr. SMITH) of the mode and manner, and by what commercial operations, the foreign capital in this bank is to find its way out of the country, I take it to be one of his motives for putting down this bank, that the foreign capital should be drawn out of the country. Indeed, if this were not his object, I cannot see why his heaviest artillery was brought to bear upon the foreign influence which he alleges this foreign capital brings into the country; and yet neither he nor any one who has cried aloud against this sin has produced a single instance of a foreign stockholder having exerted his influence against the Government of this country. (Baring's book on American affairs might be adduced as an instance of the opposite effect produced.)

The farthest that the assertions go, is that our own citizens, Federal bank directors, may have exerted their influence, and they and their money, which is not proposed to be annihilated by this bill, may, and probably will be brought to bear against us again and again; and the only remedy I see would be to kill them and take their money—this would effectually destroy their influence. To return, sir, to the grand object of drawing out seven millions and upwards of foreign capital from this country. I know that some have asserted with great confidence that the section of the Union North and East of this is saturated with a moneyed capital, domesticated, sufficient for all the purposes of its citizens. I cannot prove that this is incorrect, but from the anxiety shown by those people on the subject now before us, by the moderate 18 per cent. loans we have heard of, I should remain a perfect Thomas as to the correctness of this assertion. Let me speak of those States concerning which I am better informed—I begin with Virginia because it is nearest. This State is indented with the finest bays and rivers in the world, her shores are bold and her waters deep, affording ports and harbors in more abundance than are to be found in any State of the Union. Look at the weight of tonnage employed in carrying to the Old World the immense proceeds of this productive country; their citizens equal in intellect and enterprise to any in the world. What is the reason that they pay a transit duty annually to New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore, to more than double the amount of their State bank stock, in profits to the shipping merchants in those cities, in freights coastwise of the produce, and in the freight also coastwise of European supplies? Does this evidence no want of commercial moneyed capital within the reach of the citizens? Travel through it, compare it with the Northern States—at every step you see apparent the disadvantages it labors under in this respect. Why, sir, the circumstance of the basin at Richmond, with a fall of nearly one hundred feet, remaining for ten years a stagnant pool within the heart of her capital city, when with this power more machinery than is to be found in half the manufacturing towns of England might be propelled, tells the secret.

It is a well known fact that the trade of North Carolina, with the exception of a few vessels with naval stores and lumber, makes its humble attainment to the city of New York. South Carolina and Georgia have a small portion of their commerce direct with Europe; but the thousands of bags of cotton shipped from the ports of Philadelphia, New York, and Boston, the circumstance of there being eleven packets constantly trading to New York alone from Savannah, and as many or more from Charleston, show plainly that this transit duty is paid by us also. The French Emperor knows this as well as we do ourselves, and his provision for admitting cotton from New York is not because he did not know the article did not grow there; but because he knew the capital there acted like a loadstone and drew the article from the States in which it grew. I do not mention these things invidiously; I wish prosperity to those cities as well as to the whole Union—but protract not the growth of other parts of the United States by driving out the means from the country by which they have grown, and which, if let alone, might be extended to us also. No man who has attentively considered the rise, progress, and growth of these States, from their first colonization to the present period, can deny that foreign capital, ay, British capital, has been the pap on which we first fed, the strong aliment which supported and stimulated our exertions and industry even to the present day. The Southern people, although they have received the goods and sold their crops to British agents and British factors, whether in their own cities or those further north, are not the less republican, nor the less independent in their politics, nor the less free from foreign partialities. I will here mention a fact which I happen to remember, which, among ten thousand other instances, might be mentioned of the benefit derived to the country by the use of this detested foreign capital. In the progress of the digging of the Santee Canal, the greatest work of the kind in America, the expense so far exceeded the calculations of the company who had undertaken it, that many of the stockholders, like all sanguine calculators, were straitened in paying up their instalments as they became due—these obtained accommodation at the bank; but even then it was found difficult to progress, and at length the company actually borrowed of the branch bank the funds to complete it, and, unless it has very lately paid, the company still owes a very considerable sum to the Bank of the United States; and but for this accommodation it is more than probable that this great work, which is capable of facilitating to a most convenient degree the transportation of the products of nearly half the State of South Carolina, might never have been accomplished. We have heard much of parties and party spirit in this discussion. I'll tell you, sir, who will compose the parties in the immediate concussion about to be produced by the downfall of this bank—the withdrawal of fifteen millions circulating medium either in actual paper bills, or in bank credits, answering the full purpose of circulating medium, while the merchants are under distress from foreign aggression, and while the Government has commenced its restrictive system on mercantile operations; while it will make the money more scarce, will make it more dear, and, of course, will make property more cheap; produce will fall; it has fallen in consequence of the anticipations on this subject. The small trader, and the young, industrious, and enterprising mechanic and manufacturer, whose stock (and it is the best stock in the world) is his honesty and fair reputation, and on which the banks have advanced him money, must pay off at any and every loss, or perhaps buy his money at the moderate premium of 1½, 2, or 3 per cent. a month. These men, such as the worthy suppliants from Philadelphia represent, will be delivered over to be devoured by the sharks and shavers who are now prowling for their prey among the distresses and calamities you are about to inflict on that class of citizens, the most worthy the care of a wise Government. The parties are the rich cash-in-hand men on the one side, and the great agricultural and manufacturing interest and the small traders on the other. If I had only heard and not seen the gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. ANDERSON,) when delivering his oration in praise of republican simplicity, I should have thought we had another Diogenes preaching from his tub; but there needs no oratory to convince the mission in your gallery and their friends behind them, that, after the big fish have eaten the little ones, they will neither have motives or means for departing from the chaste frugality and republican simplicity of manners recommended by the words of the gentleman; it will be only those who have fattened upon the spoil who can indulge in the simple style and plain and humble habiliments of our modern Diogenes.

I have said I rejoiced in the prosperity of every part of our Union. But, either the gentleman or I have proceeded together upon very mistaken grounds. I thought the seizing of West Florida was, among other objects, to answer the purpose of giving an outlet for the products of Tennessee and the other Western States; I thought, too, the purchase of Louisiana at fifteen millions, to be paid by the whole nation, was for this object also; and I cannot suppose that the effecting of this object would tend to make the people poor, or preserve among them this republican simplicity of manners—on the contrary, I do hope and expect, that it will tend to promote the industry and enterprise of the citizens, and develop the vast resources of wealth, profit, and strength of our western brethren. Perhaps the resolution on our tables, for imposing additional duties on hemp and hempen manufactures, is also designed to promote the wise project of keeping our western brethren from growing too rich, and thereby preserving our republican simplicity.

I have not yet done treating this as a party subject. I did not, it is true, come here to legislate for a party or for any particular Administration—but where I think a measure is subversive of the interests of the nation, and subversive of the party to which I am attached, it is not unfair to take this latter aspect into view also. Let it be recollected that the present Administration have not a single leading (for they arrogate the term as well as the States) paper, republican nor federal, in the nation, except the paper edited here, (which is mild in its tone and not as yet disposed to rush into the fire to defend the powers that be;) I say let it be recollected that there is none of these irresponsible dictators to public opinion who lift a quill in our cause. The constant theme is the baseness and tergiversation of the tenth and eleventh Congress, and the wickedness and corruption of the servants of the public, and ever and anon their lash reaches beyond our shoulder and strikes the Executive also—but more is coming yet from them—they have shown their teeth. It is true we may follow those calling themselves republican in the vote which we are now about to give. But do you think for this act that they will come back to your aid—that they will take us for better for worse? No, sir; when the evils which will be produced by the rejection of this bill, when private distress and public embarrassment shall raise the outcry, they will ride on the winds and direct the storm, and will be the first to cry out there is no energy in us, and to join any intrigue to hurl us from our seats. It is easily to be demonstrated that by the details of the bill on your table, if its friends were suffered to perfect it, it would produce, say in the bonus, one and a fourth millions at least, perhaps two millions of dollars—premium on the five millions of stock to be created, two and half millions. In the whole, at the lowest calculation, three and three-fourths millions of dollars, which will be given up, lost and abandoned by us. Will gentlemen recollect that only half of this sum, taken from the people by the direct tax, hurried Mr. Adams and his friends to their political death? And the people are not such fools as not to see that what is taken away from the Treasury is taken from their pockets—you may disguise it as you will by procrastinating loans, it will not escape their detection.

And for whom is this mighty sacrifice to be made. If the ministering to the Treasury of the United States is worth to the Bank of the United States so much that it will accept the terms above-mentioned, and you resolve to employ others to do the same thing, is this office, worth so much to the Bank of the United States, worth less to them? This is the lever. Here the real parties are apparent. The nation—the great agricultural interest, the solid yeomanry of the country on one side, and the city influence, the London and Paris influence, on the other. The advantage palpable of nearly four millions of dollars wrested from the Government, and of course from the people, and sent to whom? To the great capitalists, monopolists of State banks, to the Leadenhall-street gentry, whose insatiate maws could not be glutted by the plundering of an empire. Do you believe, sir, that the great body of the people, who are actuated by the impulse of feeling, and who may not indulge in the nice distinctions we have drawn here about the Constitution, but who have experienced the convenience of a circulating medium current over the whole extent of the Union, and who have witnessed your numberless acquiescences to the legality of this institution, and read your laws for punishing those invading its rights, and your numerous laws for trusting, trading, borrowing, and receiving favors from this bank—will this, your recent discovery of its unconstitutionality, be an excuse for giving away twenty per cent. on all their produce, and for the giving away double the amount of that tax, for the imposing of which they condemned your predecessors? I fear for the safety of the Constitution itself. It has been denounced by those who have denounced us. The feeling is quickly transferred from the ministers under the Constitution to the Constitution itself. The clamor has gone forth that we want energy—that the Constitution wants energy—and a vast remedy has already been proposed by the Aurora itself—to give Congress the power to lay an export duty upon the productions of the country; more of your London and Paris influence—to lay the agricultural interest under the ban of the empire. Consolidation is the watchword. Preserve your Constitution without abandoning its legitimate powers, such as you have prospered in the exercise of, and I fear not this hobgoblin; but weaken it, place it to lean upon or revolve round any local State policy, and to obey the beck and call of any one or of all the leading States, and the rights and interests of the State I represent, and all the other smaller States in the Union, could not be very much affected by any change.

It is acknowledged on all hands that there is not specie enough in the nation, if applied solely to that purpose, to pay our annual impost. The operations of the Bank of Columbia in transferring the revenue derived from a part of Virginia (and of the land funds from the westward,) and of the Manhattan Bank, in performing the same office in respect to the collections in Connecticut, have been dwelt upon by the honorable Senator from Maryland (Mr. SMITH.) His arguments drawn from the facts would have been more conclusive if he could have instanced the same facilities afforded to the Government, between banks disconnected by the effect of that neighborhood circulation and of that course of trade very apparent in the instances he has produced. But it is not conclusive at any rate. There is a neighborhood medium of circulation (the State bank paper,) and there is a national medium (the United States paper.) The latter, under the present state of things, corrects the operations of distant banks and renders their transfers easy; but, deprived of this, would any of them, situated at four or five hundred miles, or at one thousand miles distance, agree to make these transfers for the Government free of expense? Could they, for instance, transfer the solid bullion belonging to the United States from Orleans to Boston or Philadelphia, without our affording compensation for freight, insurance, &c? I have witnessed the advantages of this national medium in the State I live in; and in the months of Autumn, when strangers are fearful of venturing to Charleston, our western friends, rather than carry the hard dollars, are in the habit of giving two or three per cent. for bills of the Bank of the United States. Destroy this national medium, you insulate the State banks, which are so far asunder as not to be within the influence of the neighborhood medium of circulation. The stroke of our dreadful wand disconnects the ligament by which they are bound together in their distant operations.

Gentlemen tell us we must use the State banks; and of consequence the State bank notes. Some of these notes happen to be worth nothing—Gloucester bank notes, for instance—and they are graduated in different parts of the continent from par down to twenty or twenty-five per cent. below par, and the market value is in some instances perpetually changing—our Treasurer must, if he can, separate the sheep from the goats—and this is to be perpetual labor. Even good notes at par when received may be useless to the public creditor who is to receive them. A Portland bill, for instance, would not get me a meal's victuals from this home, and an Augusta or Savannah or New Orleans bank bill would not have its value understood in New England. Indeed, Mr. President, this chaos—this confusion—about to be introduced in our Treasury, and the legitimate exercise of our Constitutional powers as a Government, is likely, too likely, again to exhibit to the world the distraction, and perhaps, dispersion, (which God forbid!) which the seed of Noah experienced at the Tower of Babel.

I have given candidly my honest views of the subject before us, meaning no uncharitableness to those honorable gentlemen in the Senate who differ with me; and infinitely rather would I, that after the trial and after long experience to come, all that I have said should be discovered to be founded in error, the effect of a heated imagination, than that my country should suffer a single pang, though in fulfilment of the things I have this day uttered.

Mr. PICKERING.—Mr. President: Having received, from the House of Representatives of Massachusetts, an instruction in the form of a request, "to oppose the renewal of the charter of the Bank of the United States," and some other members of the Senate having received from their respective States instructions to the same effect, I will make a few observations on the subject of instructions.

I was pleased to hear the gentleman from Virginia, over against me, (Mr. GILES,) after reading his instructions from that State, express his opinion decisively, that instructions from constituents were not binding on their Legislative Representatives. Concurring entirely in this opinion, I will offer some reasons to show, that they are erroneous in principle; that they infringe the rightful independence of representatives; and, in respect to members of Congress, that they violate the Constitution of the United States.

In a small community, where all its members can meet together and consult on the measures necessary and proper to promote their common interests, their decisions are the result of deliberation, of reasoning and of the interchange of sentiments. When the members become too numerous, or are too widely extended, to admit of their personal attendance in a general assembly, it seems to be a very natural provision to select a convenient number of them to meet together to manage their common concerns; in the same manner they were before conducted by the whole community. And thus, from the very nature of this institution, it becomes the duty of the persons composing the representative body, to consult, deliberate, and mutually communicate their reasons and opinions; and thereupon finally to decide on the measures requisite to be adopted for the welfare of the community. Hence it follows, that all peremptory instructions, or naked requests, designed to control or influence the votes of the representatives, are subversive of the fundamental principle of a representative Government.

Such instructions or requests, addressed to members of Congress, do also violate the Constitution of the United States. The first sentence in that Constitution is in these words: "All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives." Now, therefore, if State Legislatures undertake to dictate, by their instructions, or by requests which are intended to operate equally with instructions, what votes shall be given on any question, by their representatives in Congress, they so far assume the powers vested by the Constitution exclusively in Congress. And if their instructions or requests are obeyed, then the State Legislatures, and not Congress, enact laws for the United States.

SENATE.

If, indeed, a State Legislature should, in the form of instructions or requests, enter into a train of reasoning, and present arguments which should convince my understanding that any measure under consideration in Congress, was or was not consistent with the Constitution, and exhibit facts which proved its utility or injurious effects, then I should yield obedience accordingly; but to what? to instructions or requests? No; but to reason and to truth.

In another respect, such instructions and requests violate the Constitution, in regard to the members of this body. Senators are chosen for six years. This was intended by the framers of the Constitution, to give them that independence which should secure freedom in thinking and acting. But, if Senators were bound to obey the instructions of their respective State Legislatures, that independence would be wholly destroyed. Indeed, it would put Senators as absolutely in the power of their constituents, as if the State Legislatures had the right to recall and dismiss them at pleasure.

I will now, Mr. President, make some observations on the main question under consideration. Whether Congress have the power by the Constitution to renew the charter of the Bank of the United States?

It has been said that the power to incorporate a bank for the United States is a substantive and original, and not a derivative or implied power. This has been repeated, but I have heard no arguments in support of the position; it is naked assertion.

It has also been called "an act of sovereignty;" as if to alarm and deter us by its awful magnitude. But, sir, the sovereign power of Congress is sometimes exercised on subjects of comparatively little moment. A few days since we passed a bill to authorize the erection of a bridge; and another, to change the name of an individual, to enable him to inherit an estate. The power of Congress is sovereign to all the purposes of the Constitution. They can lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises; borrow money, regulate commerce, and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory and other property of the United States. And they have the power to make all laws necessary and proper to carry the foregoing and all other Constitutional powers into execution. When proposing to exercise this general power, in any case not expressly mentioned, we have to consider whether it be "necessary and proper." It has been said that "necessary" here means indispensable; something without which a particular power expressly granted cannot be carried into execution. But, sir, I see no ground for this interpretation. In the affairs of a nation, or other community, whatever the public good requires to be done, is necessary and proper to be done. It is a moral, not an absolute necessity. It is necessary for me to be here, in my place, because it is my duty to be here. Necessary and proper are opposed to unnecessary and improper. Congress should do no act unnecessary and improper; but, like State Legislatures, do whatever is necessary and proper to attain the objects for which they are respectively constituted.

In determining whether any proposed measure be necessary and proper to carry into execution any power expressly given to Congress, we have to consider whether that measure have a just or useful relation to the end. For instance, the Constitution having prescribed no mode of collecting the revenues, it rested in the discretion of Congress to adopt such a mode or such modes as should appear to them best adapted to that object. Instead of appointing custom-house officers in the large commercial cities and towns, where a banking establishment could be supported, Congress might there have erected banks, as the most certain, punctual, and cheap mode of collection. Suitable officers of a bank might have performed all the duties of entering and clearing vessels, and all other duties pertaining to the custom-house, without any charge to the public; the deposits of the public moneys so collected in those banks, upon which the usual banking operations might be carried on, yielding an adequate compensation for all the services so performed.

The public revenues, when collected, must also be safely kept. An experience has demonstrated that, of all depositaries, banks are the safest. And the same experience has shown that, as the public moneys are required to be frequently transferred, for the public expenditures, from one State to another, the Bank of the United States, with its branches, has furnished the best mode of transfer; it being effected with dispatch, with certainty, and without any risk or expense to the United States.

The gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. CLAY) asked, if banks are necessary for collecting the public revenues, why give them any other power? The answer is, that it is the essential nature of banks, which renders them so peculiarly fit to collect the revenues. The merchants, whose bonds are lodged in the banks for collection, are also borrowers of money from the banks; and if they fail of paying their bonds, as they become due, their credit will fail; they can obtain no more loans until their bonds are paid. This has just been presented to our view, in the most striking manner, by my colleague.

"To borrow money," is another of the great powers expressly vested in Congress. And in this, as in the power first considered, no mode of borrowing being prescribed in the Constitution, Congress are to devise and provide the means in their judgment most sure, expeditious, and ample, to obtain loans. And this was one of the great objects for which the Bank of the United States was originally incorporated. The gentleman from Virginia, near me, (Mr. BRENT,) and the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. TAYLOR,) have, in very forcible language, displayed the impolicy of depending on State banks or individuals for loans, in public emergencies. At such times, these banks and individuals may be most hardly pressed by their usual customers. To suffer the Bank of the United States to dissolve, and to have recourse to State banks, will be so far going back to the condition of the United States under the articles of Confederation, when our Union was but a rope of sand. When the pressure of the Revolutionary war was over, indeed, while that pressure remained, Congress in vain made requisitions on the individual States; no money, or none in any measure adequate to the public exigencies, could be obtained. After the war, when the public treasury was empty, Congress importuned—implored the States, individually, to grant the power to raise a revenue from commerce, to defray the current expenses of the General Government, and to fulfil the public obligations, but the power could not be obtained. States, deriving large revenues from commerce, chose to retain them for their own treasuries.

It was this helpless, forlorn condition of our country, which forcibly convinced the nation of the necessity of forming a new system of Government; and our present Government was the fruit of that necessity.

"To regulate commerce" is a third great power vested in Congress. And it is conceived that the exercise of any power well adapted to give safety, facility, and prosperity to commerce, must be comprised in the power to regulate it. Hence the erecting of light-houses has been mentioned as an instance in which an implied power, incidental to the regulating of commerce, has been exercised. But it has been said that this power is expressly given in another part of the Constitution; that by which Congress is vested with exclusive legislation over the district which is the seat of Government, and over places ceded to the United States "for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dock-yards, and other needful buildings." But if we had no commerce, no navigation, light-houses would not be "needful buildings," they would be of no use whatever. Hence it is clear that they have a direct relation to commerce and to nothing else; and, therefore, the erecting of them is properly adduced as an instance of the exercise of a power implied in the general express power to regulate commerce.

The safety and facility of commercial operations was also greatly to be promoted by means of a general currency which should have equal credit throughout the Union. This has been accomplished by the notes issued from the Bank of the United States, under the authority of Congress, exercising the power incidental to that of regulating commerce.

A fourth great power, which I mentioned to have been vested in Congress, is that of "making all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory and other property of the United States." This "other property" consists partly of money. And, as Congress have power to make any regulations concerning it which are needful, that is, which may, in their opinion, best promote the general welfare, this money may be (as some of it has been) vested in bank stock; and, with the truest regard to its safety and good management, in the stock of a bank erected by Congress, of which they may have a suitable inspection; and where it may safely deposite the public revenues, there to await the public demand; and, in the mean time, usefully aid those banking operations which give facility to commerce and to public loans.

But as an evidence that the constitutionality of the act to incorporate the Bank of the United States was at least doubtful, we have been told by the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. SMITH,) that President Washington doubted; that his mind was in suspense to the last moment, when the act was to be approved or disapproved. That while the then Secretary of the Treasury, (Mr. Hamilton,) a very great man, maintained the Constitutional power of Congress to erect that bank, another man (Mr. Jefferson) equally great, then Secretary of State, and the Attorney General, (Mr. Randolph,) a distinguished lawyer, maintained the contrary doctrine—that Congress had not that power. It is true, sir, that Washington, cautious and circumspect beyond any man I ever knew, did suspend his decision to the last day allowed him by the Constitution. The confidence with which the Secretary of State and the Attorney General supported their opinions on this question, was sufficient to excite in the President the greatest caution. Both were lawyers, and they raised many legal objections. The written opinions of these gentlemen were (as I have been well informed) put into the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury two days before it was necessary for the President to decide. And the reasoning of Mr. Hamilton, in his written argument, enabled the President to decide with satisfaction; with a full conviction of the constitutionality of the act.

The following are some of the objections offered by the Secretary of State. He said—"that the proposed incorporation (of the bank) undertakes to create certain capacities, properties, or attributes, which are against the laws of alienage, descents, escheat, and forfeiture, distribution, and monopoly. And that nothing but a necessity, invincible by other means, can justify such a prostration of laws which constitute the pillars of our whole system of jurisprudence, and are the foundation laws of the State governments." Washington, sir, was not a lawyer, and who can wonder that his fair mind was alarmed by such a solemn declaration? That it was kept in suspense by the assertion, that the act for establishing the bank would overturn the pillars of our whole system of jurisprudence, and the foundation laws of the State governments? But, sir, it required only the knowledge of a lawyer at once to overturn these objections. The following are some of the remarks of the Secretary of the Treasury: "If these are truly the foundation laws of the several States, then have most of them subverted their own foundations. For there is scarcely one of them which has not, since the establishment of its particular constitution, made material alterations in some of those branches of its jurisprudence, especially the law of descents. But it is not conceived how anything can be called the funda-

"To erect a corporation, is to substitute a legal or artificial for a natural person; and, where a number are concerned, to give them individuality. To that legal or artificial person, once created, the common law of every State, of itself, annexes all those incidents and attributes which are represented as a prostration of the main pillars of their jurisprudence. It is certainly not accurate to say, that the erection of a corporation is against those different heads of the State laws; because it is rather to create a kind of person, or entity, to which they are inapplicable, and to which the general rule of those laws assigns a different regimen. The laws of alienage cannot apply to an artificial person, because it can have no country. Those of descent cannot apply to it, because it can have no heirs. Those of escheat are foreign from it, for the same reason. Those of forfeiture, because it cannot commit a crime. Those of distribution, because, though it may be dissolved, it cannot die." Sir, I beg leave to add a few explanations. By the laws of most, perhaps of all the States, aliens are not permitted to hold real estate; but in all they are free to hold personal property of every kind, and particularly bank stock. The law of escheat relates to the property of a citizen who dies without heirs, near or remote, and without a will. In such case his property falls to the State. But instances of escheat do not occur perhaps twice in a century in any State, and, consequently, is of trifling moment. Although a corporation cannot commit a crime, it may violate the rules prescribed in the law for its establishment, and thus incur an immediate forfeiture of its charter. Or, if for such a violation of its fundamental law, or any mismanagement of the institution to the public injury, its charter be not forthwith taken away, the State may refuse to renew it. As to the law of distribution, that operates when a person dies intestate. But though a corporation cannot die, yet the individuals to whom its property belongs will die; and their bank property, equally with their other property, becomes liable to the law of distribution.

One gentleman has imagined, that if Congress have and exercise the power of erecting corporations, it will operate as a monopoly; and may, in the end, destroy all the powers belonging to the individual States. But there is here no ground for alarm. The act of Congress which established the Bank of the United States, did not and could not affect the rights of the States to erect banks. Accordingly we have seen, after the Bank of the United States had been erected, and the profitable operations of banks to their proprietors were known, that State banks sprang up in abundance.

It has been said, by more than one gentleman, that the greater portion (as far at least as seven-tenths of the whole) of the stock of the United States' Bank being owned by foreigners, and these chiefly Englishmen, there is danger of a foreign influence in the country, and that such an influence has been manifest. This, sir, appears to be an extraordinary remark. In what has this influence been manifested? Has the Government, have individuals, been in any degree restrained in the expression of their resentments against Great Britain—or in adopting any measure deemed advisable towards that country?

One of the injurious consequences of destroying the Bank of the United States has been stated to be, the withdrawing of seven millions of dollars from the active capital of the United States, and transmitting it to Europe, where that portion of the bank stock is owned. To this it has been answered, by the opposers of the bank, that these millions will not be withdrawn, but transferred from the United States' Bank to banks of the several States. How then, sir, shall we get rid of that dangerous influence of foreign stockholders which the same gentlemen urge as a reason for not renewing the charter of the Bank of the United States? Sir, it is well known that money in Europe is less valuable than in the United States. That moneyed men there are glad to loan their money at an interest of five per cent. or less, while in these States the legal interest is six per cent. And a multitude of our citizens find their account in employing that foreign capital, paying an interest of six per cent., by which, in the course of trade, they gain ten, fifteen, or twenty per cent.; that foreign capital, in the hands of our merchants, has resembled the five and the ten talents, wherewith they have gained other five and other ten talents.

The distresses which will follow the dissolution of the Bank of the United States, especially in the great commercial cities, have been forcibly described in the plain testimonies of the committee of mechanics and manufacturers from Philadelphia—a committee selected wholly from the democratic party; distresses which were sufficient to move a heart of stone. And why should this bank be dissolved? It has been said that the State banks are competent to all the necessary operations of the general bank. If the contrary had not been shown, it might be answered, that the Bank of the United States was incorporated when there were only three banks in the United States: one in Philadelphia, one in New York, and one in Boston. These were inadequate to the necessities and accommodation of the General Government and of the citizens. To supply this deficiency, it was necessary to erect the National Bank; and the dignity, honor, good faith, and credit of the United States stand pledged for the renewal of its charter. The institution having been well conducted, and found in the highest degree useful and beneficial to Government and to the citizens at large, it ought to be continued. Individual citizens and foreigners became stockholders on a well grounded expectation of the stability of the Government. It was in this just expectation that foreigners, Englishmen, purchased of our Government, itself, its remaining shares of the public stock in, the Bank of the United States, and at an advance of forty-five per cent.; so that, for every hundred dollars laid out by the Government in the purchase of bank shares, the United States received of these foreigners one hundred and forty-five dollars. And how was it possible for these foreigners to conceive the Government capable of destroying the work of its own hands, and of reducing their property to one hundred dollars a share, for which, but eight years before, they had paid the same Government one hundred and forty-five dollars?

In limiting the duration of the charters of banks to twenty years, no wise Government ever contemplated their destruction at the end of that term. Known to be useful institutions, the proprietors have well founded claims to their continuance, which the public good also requires. But, in the course of twenty years, some inconveniences may be experienced which ought to be remedied, and some improvements discovered which ought to be adopted. Besides, being profitable to the proprietors, they can well afford, once in twenty years, to give to the Government considerable sums of money in acknowledgment for the benefits derived from the acts of incorporation.

But, sir, in respect to the English stockholders in the Bank of the United States, (and the foreign stockholders are chiefly Englishmen,) we are under special obligations by the treaty with Great Britain in 1794. The tenth article being permanent, is still in force, and in these words:

"Neither the debts due from individuals of the one nation to individuals of the other, nor shares, nor moneys which they may have in the public funds, or in the public or private banks, shall ever, in any event of war or national differences, be sequestered or confiscated; it being unjust and impolitic that debts and engagements, contracted and made by individuals having confidence in each other, and in their respective Governments, should ever be destroyed or impaired by national authority on account of national differences and discontents."

Sir, this is the very time when the equitable obligation of this treaty (and as a matter entitled to consideration in equity I introduce it) applies with force. We now have national differences with Great Britain, and a stock of discontents sufficiently strong and extensive. By "destroying" the Bank of the United States, (and to refuse to renew its charter is to destroy it,) we essentially "impair" the "engagements," not of individuals only of the one nation with individuals of the other, but the "engagements" of our Government itself with some of those individuals. When the Barings purchased of our Government two thousand two hundred and twenty shares of stock in the Bank of the United States, for which they paid one million two hundred and eighty-seven thousand and six hundred dollars, would they have made the purchase if the Government had intimated its intention to destroy the bank in eight years? No, sir. By the dissolution of the bank, the stock so purchased being reduced from one hundred and forty-five to one hundred dollars in value for each share, a difference is made to the Barings of three hundred and ninety-nine thousand and six hundred dollars, which they lose.

Sir, I have no personal interest in the Bank of the United States. I am no stockholder; I have not the means of being one. Nor is the branch at Boston of equal import to the citizens of Massachusetts, with the bank itself and its branches to the inhabitants and commercial cities of other States; although the withdrawing of seven or eight hundred thousand dollars from the banking capital of Boston would undoubtedly produce some serious inconveniences. But, sir, I consider the Bank of the United States, with its branches, of immense importance to the citizens of the United States, and a necessary instrument in the hands of the Government, in the management of our great national concerns. I shall, therefore, give my vote for the renewal of its charter.

MR. BRENT.—Mr. President, having been prevented from finishing the remarks which I had intended to make on the subject under discussion when I last had the honor to address this body, from the late hour of the day to which it was detained, I will avail myself of this opportunity to make a few desultory observations, which the want of time prevented me from heretofore submitting to your consideration. I formerly remarked, that many gentlemen had avowed that the principal cause that induced them to vote against this bill was the large portion of the stock of the Bank of the United States which was held by foreigners, which caused a foreign influence to exist in this country, which was incompatible with its safety; and that, after the termination of this bank, they were willing to join in the creation of another in which our own citizens only would be interested. I insisted, that if it was desirable to get rid of foreign stockholders, (which I did not believe,) this could not be effected by the destruction of that bank, for the reasons I then had the honor to suggest. I will here add one or more additional reasons why I entertain this opinion. If foreigners can employ their capital here to greater advantage than in their own country, it will be impossible to prevent them from subscribing to the shares of the new bank you create. If you propose to do so by prohibiting them from being stockholders, the law will be avoided by the subscription being made in the name of our own citizens, who will hold it for foreigners; or, even if the shares should be wholly taken by our own citizens, they will afterwards sell to foreigners; so that the same foreign influence exists, (if such is the effect of stock being held by foreigners.) Nor, sir, is this apprehended foreign influence in any degree diminished, if this bank is destroyed and a new bank should not be created. In such a state of things, those foreigners who, if there existed a Bank of the United States, would have invested their money in its stock, now invest the same quantity of money in the State banks. Of course the same extent of foreign influence (as far as foreigners holding our stock produces this result) in either state of things exists. This reasoning, Mr. President, is addressed to those only who are so very apprehensive of the dangerous influence which the investment of foreign capital here produces. For myself, I entertain no such fears; and for the reasons I have heretofore had the honor of stating, do very much question whether it is not most advantageous that foreigners should hold extensively the stock of our banks.

Some gentlemen are anxious for the dissolution of the bank, because they are of opinion that banks of every kind and under every modification are injurious. Perhaps they may be so. But does the destruction of this bank remove or diminish the evil society is to suffer from the existence of banks? If this bank is dissolved, the State banks will exist, and new ones be created to fill up the vacuum of bank circulating paper which is produced by the dissolution of this bank. If the community is to be oppressed with such institutions as banks to the same extent, whether or not there exists a National Bank, is it not better to have a National Bank than to put the Government to the necessity of carrying on its fiscal arrangements by the co-operation of State banks, which are in no respect under its control?

Among other reasons urged by the honorable gentleman from Maryland why there would be no inconvenience attending the dissolution of the Bank of the United States, indeed why there would almost be an advantage from such a measure—he insists there is at this time about $20,000,000 due our merchants from those of England, and such was the deranged state of the commercial resources in that country, that our merchants could not now obtain payment of their British debts, but that on the dissolution of the Bank of the United States this seven millions of stock which was held by foreigners would be applied in part payment to our merchants of the debt due to them from the British—so that this money would not go out of the country, but would be immediately paid to our merchants and go to that extent to the increase of their resources.

Now, Mr. President, it appears to me, notwithstanding the high respect I entertain for the honorable gentleman's mercantile and political knowledge; that in this instance his opinion is not accurate. Either the British merchants that are indebted to ours are solvent or otherwise. If the first, they can pay our merchants the $20,000,000 they owe them in the present state of things; if they are not solvent, is it to be believed that the stockholders, after receiving money from the bank to the amount of their stock, will, with this money, purchase bills which will be protested for non-payment? For such must be the result if the British merchant is not at present able to pay his debts to our merchant. To me it seems most probable that on the dissolution of the bank one of two events will take place. Either the seven millions, the amount of foreign stock, will be invested in our State banks, or it will be remitted to Europe in actual specie. If it should be invested in our State banks, the same extent of foreign influence remains in our country which we are so anxious to get rid of—and so far as relates to this difficulty, the dissolution of the present bank has no operation. If these seven millions are not invested in State bank stock, and good bills cannot be obtained to transmit it, as is clearly deducible from the statement of the gentleman from Maryland, then it must go in actual specie. An honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, of great and unquestionable mercantile information, has supposed there is not in the United States more than ten million of dollars in specie. If by the dissolution of the bank seven of these ten millions are to be exported from our country, will it not be attended with serious consequences, more especially since it has already been discovered that the quantity of the precious metals in the United States has for some years past been diminishing to such an extent that it has been thought by several important that Congress should take some steps to guard against the continuance of this evil? Another reason which might induce the holders of this stock, when the amount is paid off, to transport the specie instead of purchasing bills, is the great and increasing difference in value between the actual value of the same nominal amount of paper and specie in England. In the remarks which I heretofore had the honor to submit to the Senate, I suggested that it was more than probable that the dissolution of the Bank of the United States might seriously affect our revenue. In addition to the reasons then insisted on as leading to this conclusion, permit me, Mr. President, to remark, that if at the same moment you diminish the circulating medium of the nation (which to a certain extent is effected by destroying the Bank of the United States) and call upon your merchants immediately to pay fourteen millions of dollars, the amount of the debt they owe the banks, and at the same time to pay twelve millions to the Government, which is the amount of the bonded revenue, at a period when our commerce has been struggling for many years with the accumulated difficulties produced by spoliations, by embargo and non-intercourse laws—I say, Mr. President, under such circumstances, is it unreasonable to entertain some apprehension that our merchants, finding themselves unable to surmount all the difficulties with which they are surrounded, will in their choice of difficulties pursue the common dictates of prudence, and choose the least? Is it not probable that they will in the first instance take every step to secure their bank endorsers by settling their debts with the bank and leave the Government to bring suit on their revenue bonds? Such an event is the more to be deprecated, as this is, of all others, a period when we should be cautious about adopting any measure which would diminish the receipts of our treasury, already much curtailed by our late embargo, and which will be considerably affected by our non-importation law.

The remark I made some days past, in relation to a supposed incapacity of the Bank of Virginia to the wants of the country, was, that it had been suggested to me that it had produced in Richmond a great deal of usury, or, as it is commonly called, money-shaving. In making this observation, Mr. President, it was not my intention to reflect in the most distant manner on the president or any of the directors of that bank. I know not the name of any one gentleman in the direction. For all that I know, or have heard, the affairs of that bank are as ably and as honorably conducted as those of any bank in the United States or elsewhere. The fact which I stated was one which I suppose to be an unavoidable result when you go into the banking system and do not create a banking capital adequate to the wants of society. If you establish a bank with an inadequate capital, favorites go into the bank, get the money out of it, and apply it to usurious purposes; it is no reflection on a bank to say that it has its favorites. When more applications are made or more good paper offered than can be accommodated, a selection must be made, and some applicants remain unaccommodated, who will be compelled to give usurious interest to those who have been accommodated for the very money which this accommodation has supplied them with. My honorable colleague is of opinion that the Bank of Richmond has a capital of sufficient extent, and that all who deserve accommodations there can obtain them. I can only say that I have repeatedly heard a very different statement in Richmond and elsewhere. Another fact, too, I beg leave to mention. I am well acquainted with a very intelligent officer of the branch bank at Petersburg, who has informed me that almost always more good paper is offered to the board of directors than could be accommodated, from the limited extent of their banking capital; and it would seem an extraordinary phenomenon, that when Richmond and Petersburg are only twenty-five miles distant there should be a redundancy of banking capital at the former and such a deficiency at the latter.

I now, Mr. President, approach the discussion of a question which excites with me more sensibility than is produced by any consideration connected with the subject now deliberated on. It is principally with a view to investigate this delicate and interesting question that I have been induced at the present hour to solicit the attention of this honorable body. We are told that this question concerning the rechartering of the Bank of the United States is a party question, and from the vociferous and earnest reiteration of this assertion, it is evident that this invidious inference is intended to be derived from it—to wit: that at the first establishment of the Bank of the United States it was contested on Constitutional grounds, and that its favorers or its opposers marked the Federal or Republican character, and designated the individuals who formed the body of these two great political sects; that the same characteristic adheres to the bill now before us, and that such of those who have heretofore been considered as appertaining to the Republican party as give their sanction to this bill must hereafter be considered as apostatizing from that political sect with which they have heretofore been arranged. I will first inquire into the justice of this assertion as it relates to the matter of fact, at the first establishment of the Bank of the United States; and next, as to the honorable and generous inference which these magnanimous asserters attempt to derive from it.

[Mr. S. SMITH wholly denied that he had ever called this a party question or viewed it in this light]

Mr. BRENT said that he had never heard the honorable gentleman make such an assertion, but he had been informed it was attributed to him. The honorable gentleman's declaration is, however, perfectly satisfactory to me; I am satisfied that he is incapable of making so invidious and unfounded an accusation; I am too well acquainted with that honorable gentleman's good sense and liberality. He will therefore be so good as not to consider any remarks I shall make on the particular question that I am now investigating as applying to him, but to others who act with him as to the general and ultimate fate of the bill under consideration. That among the great mass of people in some sections of the Union, particularly the State I represent, this measure establishing the Bank of the United States was taken up as a party question, may be admitted; but that it was viewed in this light in either House of that Congress which passed the law; that the votes which were given either affirmatively or otherwise were the test to ascertain who was of the Republican and who of the Federal party, is an assertion destitute of all foundation; for whoever will examine the yeas and nays of both Houses of Congress will find some of our most distinguished Republican patriots voting for the bill, while others equally eminent and zealous in the Federal ranks will be found in hostility to it. Sir, the Journals of Congress, testimony derived from solemn and unquestionable records, a species of evidence which the laws of our country and the practice of our courts in the gradation of the different species of testimony places in the highest station and considers as of the most imposing authority, demonstrate that the assertion that the question concerning the establishment of the Bank of the United States in the first instance was entirely a party question, is destitute of all foundation; that an assertion so susceptible of refutation by testimony so irresistible should have been made, is evidence to me of the unjustifiable length to which some gentlemen will permit their zeal to transport them. Nay, Mr. President, let me call your attention to the only member, as I believe, of this honorable body who was a member of Congress when the law establishing a Bank of the United States took place, (I mean the honorable Mr. GILMAN.) This gentleman is known to be a Republican; yet the journals will assure us that he voted for the bill establishing the bank.

If the opinion of the constitutionality or otherwise of the Bank of the United States is the criterion by which the estimate is to be made of the political sect to which each individual belongs, what shall we say of Mr. Jefferson and the majorities of the two Houses of Congress during his Administration, who by repeated acts recognised the legality and constitutionality of this institution? Shall we say that he and they have apostatized from the Republican cause? Do the presumptuous and daring assertors pretend to impose upon us a belief that, during a period which we have hitherto supposed was the proudest triumph of republicanism, those of the dominant party had apostatized from the Republican cause? Are we to believe that, during the Administration of Mr. Jefferson, the great apostle of republicanism, one with whose name republicanism has been supposed to be identified—are we to believe that he has apostatized from his political party? Are there any so presumptuous as to imagine they can impose upon the public mind or upon this honorable body so monstrous, so absurd a belief? Can you be induced to select that moment which has hitherto been imagined most auspicious to Republican principles as the one when above all others there was a total apostasy from them? No, sir, every effort is vain which is made to impose upon us so irrational a belief. On the contrary hand, we will account for the conduct of Mr. Jefferson and the Republican majorities in Congress during his Administration, when they sanctioned by repeated laws the constitutionality of the Bank of the United States, by the considerations I proceed to enumerate. Whatever might have been the abstract opinion of Mr. Jefferson respecting the constitutionality of the bank on its first institution, it is now immaterial to inquire. He saw, when he came into the Presidency, that this was in its origin not a party question; but that the Journals of Congress would evince that on the vote which first gave a sanction to this measure all party distinction was confounded; that it was one of those questions, which, when first agitated, was calculated to produce a diversity of opinion among men of the purest intentions and of the most luminous understandings; that it was one of those doubtful questions which, when once settled by precedent, should never again be agitated; that this measure had been sanctioned, after the fullest deliberation had been bestowed upon it; and that we had so incorporated this bank establishment with our fiscal and other Governmental arrangements, that it could not at that time be put down without impairing the public credit, and without being like (in various other points of view) to be productive of very serious and numerous calamities to the community. From all these various considerations, Mr. Jefferson, when he came into the Administration, as also the majority of Congress during that period, considered the question respecting the Bank of the United States as a settled and adjudicated one, which was now to be acquiesced in, and pursued a system of policy in conformity with this sentiment. On any other principle the conduct of Mr. Jefferson and of Congress would not only not be justifiable, but would be criminal in the highest sense. If they had considered this a party question, a measure which the Federal party, during its ascendancy, had established, contrary to the manifest and unquestionable principles of the Constitution, (as some gentle men now contend,) every step that was taken to sanction this unconstitutional measure, was inflicting a new wound on the Constitution, and a violation of the sacred oaths they had taken to support it. To say that it was done for the support of public faith, because the law incorporating the bank had made a contract with individuals, is irrational and fallacious, because no unconstitutional law can pledge the faith of Government. An unconstitutional law incorporating a body of men can give them no legal existence which can be binding on a subsequent legislature. It is, as was well observed by my colleague, to enter into a contract with an idiot or married woman. The contract is ipso facto void. If an unconstitutional law cannot pledge the faith of Government, or a subsequent legislature; nay more, if it is incumbent on a subsequent legislature to repeal such unconstitutional law; then the law establishing the Bank of the United States, if it is of this description, (that is, evidently unconstitutional,) imposed no other obligation on Mr. Jefferson and his Republican majority than immediately to repeal it, and to restore to its original purity that Constitution they had sworn to support; but when the very opposite conduct is pursued, we must presume it was done from an idea that the constitutionality of the bank in its origin was one of those questionable principles which might create doubt between individuals of all parties, and on which men of the best understanding might pause and hesitate; but being once determined on, was to be considered as an adjudicated case, which the repose of society made it proper should never again be drawn into discussion. This, sir, I think, is a justifiable inference. Are we not then warranted in saying, that the assertion that this is a party question, with all the bearings it is intended to have, is destitute of all foundation? That the law concerning the Bank of the United States was not in its origin a party question, is demonstrated by the Journals of Congress. Whenever this measure was agitated during the Administration of Mr. Jefferson, it was not taken up as a party question, because all parties gave it their concurrent support. It remains to be inquired whether on the present occasion the bill under your consideration is to be viewed as a party question. In order to ascertain the character of a question, that is, whether it is a party one or not, it is first necessary to ascertain who are the different individuals that constitute the different parties, and how these individuals stand in relation to the question to be decided on. If all or almost all of each political sect are arranged, one for, the other against the measure, then it may be deemed a party question; but if a very large portion of one of your political parties, carrying with it some of your most distinguished members, is found opposed to another portion of its own party, you can no longer call this a party question.

Each portion of this divided party may claim its exclusive identification with the party itself, and upbraid the other with the epithet of apostate; but their pretensions will not be admitted unless supported by higher authority than that which is derived from the arrogance of one section of this divided party. When I view the Journals of the House of Representatives, and cast my eyes over the yeas and nays on this question, as decided there some days past, and find some of the most zealous and distinguished Republicans in the affirmative; when I reflect on the number and great weight of character of the Republican members of this honorable body who concur with me in opinion that it is proper the re-incorporation of the bank should prevail, I consider it as the height of arrogance, and the most baseless of all unfounded pretensions, in those of the Republican party who are opposed to this measure, to call this a party question, to identify themselves exclusively with the Republican party, and to insinuate that such Republicans as vote for this bill have abandoned their political principles. By what authority can those Republican gentlemen, who oppose this bill, appropriate exclusively to themselves the character of Republicans; are there not, among those of the Republicans who are in favor of this measure, men of as great weight of character as those who are opposed to them; men, who can offer as distinguished and as proud and elevated pretensions for the zeal, the diligence, the fidelity, and the fortitude they displayed in the Republican cause during the period of its adversity, as any this country contains? Who, sir, in the hour of difficulty, at that period which tried men's souls, when republicanism meant more than a name, and its advocates were stigmatized as factious demagogues and upbraided with every odious epithet—who, sir, at this inauspicious moment occupied a more eminent and distinguished station in the Republican ranks than the present Secretary of the Treasury, who is the first to recommend this measure? And is Albert Gallatin, one of those who pre-eminently contributed to form the Atlas, on whose shoulders the fate of Republicanism rested, at the moment when it was surrounded with such numerous and ferocious assailants—is he not a Republican? Nay, Mr. President, are there none in this body of the veteran politicians who contributed to form that Spartan band who so nobly defended the Republican cause, when it exposed its advocates to every species of obloquy and political persecution—are there none of that description in this body that mean to vote for this bill? It will, with justice, not be denied. Mr. President, who are the characters who have proclaimed this to be a party question? Does my colleague, who was inferior in zeal and efficiency to no one in the Councils of our country, at the crisis I have been speaking of—does he call this a party question? Does the honorable gentleman from Maryland, who also bore his share in the honorable conflict for Republican principles; does he call this a party question? No, sir, they each know the reverse, and are too honorable and just to make such an insinuation. It is not, sir, from those political veterans whose standing might justify them for making some pretension, that this exclusive claim to Republicanism is insisted on, both within and without our doors. It is made by characters that at the period of Republican adversity were not known in the Councils of our nation, or were perhaps in most instances boys at school; and are these unflinching, fair-weather politicians, in these halcyon days of Republicanism, to attribute to themselves the exclusive monopoly of Republican principles, and stigmatize as apostates those veteran politicians to whose persecutions and exertions the triumph and preservation of Republican principles can alone be attributed? These, sir, are modest pretensions, and the public will duly appreciate them when they learn the source from whence they come and the characters to whom they are to be applied. If to be of an opinion that there is a Constitutional power in the General Government to establish a National Bank, is an apostacy from the Republican cause, then Mr. Jefferson and the two Houses of Congress during his Administration, who considered this a settled and an adjudicated point, and in repeated instances legislated on this principle, and passed laws recognising the constitutionality of such an institution—then, sir, Mr. Jefferson and the majority of the two Houses of Congress during his Administration have apostatized, as also has Albert Gallatin, who, relying on the score of precedent, has considered this as an adjudicated question, and in his report recommended its adoption—he also has apostatized from the Republican party. Mr. President, I remember to have heard an instance mentioned when a gloomy and ferocious fanatic was pronouncing eternal damnation on all who died without the pale of his church—that a more benevolent and liberal person who heard him, in order to obviate such monstrous doctrine, enumerated a great many of the most amiable of their common acquaintance and even relatives whom the hand of death had taken from them, that were not of the same religious tenets with this fanatic, and interrogated him what had become of each of these amiable and dear friends and relations? The fanatic replied, they were all in hell; to which the interrogator rejoined that he also would go to hell, for he was sure if the information he had just received was true he should find better company there than in any other region he could repair to. With the same desire to get in good company, if Mr. Jefferson and the majorities of Congress, during his Administration, and Albert Gallatin, have apostatized from the Republican party, I also am content to be an apostate. I am sure I know of no political sect that have manifested opinions so congenial with my own as they have done, and with them I wish to be associated.

Mr. President, I beg leave to remind these newborn, unknown, self-created, exclusive Republicans, who hurl apostacy and other denunciation with such liberality against all that will vote for this bill, that many of their own party, many of those who vote with them, avow a belief, that Congress has the power to create a bank, but they do not think it expedient at present to re-charter this bank. I understand the honorable member from Maryland has candidly and honorably avowed this opinion—many others are known to entertain the same sentiments, (though they will not acknowledge them with the same candor,) who have and will vote against this bill. To those who entertain this sentiment how can this be a party question? The only incident which gives it the character of a party question is, the opinion that a such a law is Constitutional or otherwise; and a determination to vote in the affirmative or negative, as that opinion shall dictate. Now, to such gentlemen as believe the law Constitutional and yet vote against it, it cannot be a party question. Those who are in this situation, and endeavor to overthrow the bill by the prejudices they may create against it, by affecting to call it a party question, though secretly and in their own minds they entertain no such belief—such gentlemen, Mr. President, as act in this manner, fight under false colors.

Mr. President, it is painful for any gentleman when addressing this House to speak of himself, and to make his past political conduct the theme of his observations; but, in an instance like this, when insinuations are made so calculated to excite the most poignant sensibility—when a charge of inconsistency and dereliction of former political principles is made, it is pardonable to take a review of our past political conduct, for the purpose of repelling charges which create emotions proportioned to the ardor and fidelity with which we are conscious of cherishing those principles which we are accused of having abandoned. During the most arduous conflicts of the Republican party, at a time when it was borne down by domineering and tyrannical majorities, although I occupied no prominent station, it certainly was not my fortune to repose upon a bed of roses. It was at this most inauspicious period, as it respected the fortune of the party to which I was attached, that I first acquired a seat in the other branch of the National Legislature. The four years during which I retained it may be considered as the very time, when, above any other, party intolerance was carried to the greatest excess; when a Republican was almost hunted down in the streets of Philadelphia, where Congress then sat; when the Republican members were reduced in Congress on great and critical questions, which served most precisely to designate the two parties, to a very inconsiderable body; when, to be called a Republican, was, in the estimation of the dominant party, to promulgate outlawry against you in the code of humanity, and to cut you off from almost all the charities of life; at this period, sir, it was my fortune to represent the only Federal district in the State of Virginia, (and to be the only Republican representative that this district either before or after elected to Congress;) it was my fortune to receive during this adverse and tempestuous period almost innumerable addresses from my constituents, which I was made the organ to present to the President of the United States, stigmatizing with the severest animadversions my political conduct and that of the party with which I thought and acted. Let the Journals of the House of Representatives during this alarming and eventful crisis be examined, and let the recorded votes of that body be resorted to in order to ascertain whether I was inferior in promptitude, fidelity, and ardor, for the Republican cause, to any member of the Republican party. During the whole of this period I was suffering under the most painful state of ill health, yet such was my anxiety to show my disapprobation of the ruinous measures pursued by the then dominant and infatuated party, that I occupied my seat in Congress, in very many instances, when, if I had attended to my own ease and health, I should have confined myself to the bed; and I challenge the most minute and accurate investigator to point out one instance where any measures were taken in Congress calculated to interest party feeling, when I was absent from my post, or failed to attest by my vote the sincerity of my devotion to the Republican cause. Under these circumstances, I had flattered myself that I had some humble pretensions to the public confidence, when I professed my early and continued devotion to the principles of republicanism, but I discover that I am mistaken, and that a new order of fortunate politicians have come into existence in the present propitious hours of republicanism, and have so exclusively engrossed the whole of this precious commodity, that they will not permit their elder order of political men, to whose exertions it is indebted for its very existence, to have one particle of it. If this new created order of patriots will banish me, and all who think with me, on this occasion, from the Republican ranks, they cannot deprive us of this consolation, that, in the state of exile and denunciation, they place us in company at least as respectable as that from which we are driven. If to be associated in the same political class with the late President, with the majorities of Congress during his Administration, and with the Secretary of the Treasury, in contradistinction to this new order of exclusive Republicans, is the result of these denunciations, I am willing to encounter their consequences.

Mr. President, if I and those of the Republican party who act with me on the present occasion have apostatized from our former political principles, I can say with truth, so far as the charge respects myself, that the motive by which I am actuated must not only be disinterested but very different from that which generally operates on the human mind. In the most gloomy hour of Republican adversity, during the severest denunciations and persecutions which it experienced; at an hour when our political hemisphere was pregnant with a tempest which threatened destruction to all its votaries; when I represented the only Federal district in the State of Virginia, and my constituents were constantly sending on loyal addresses, in the most pointed manner animadverting on the party with whom I was associated; under all these adverse circumstances, I was not inferior to any one in fidelity and zeal for the Republican cause. But, at this period of

FEBRUARY, 1811.

Republican triumph, when to be associated with that party, is the best passport to all the honors and offices of our country, when I am elected to a seat in this very elevated and honorable body by the vote of a Republican Legislature of one of the most uniform and unanimously Republican States in the Union; in such a crisis, and in such a state of things, I have abandoned the Republican party! If the charge be just, I can only repeat, that I must be actuated by motives very different from those which generally operate on the human bosom. No consideration of pecuniary aggrandizement could have had any operation on me in relation to the subject under consideration; any other than a wish to advance the general happiness of society, for I never had a bank share in any bank whatever, nor have I ever had any negotiation with, or requested or obtained a loan of one penny from the Bank of the United States or any of its branches. I must here remark, if this abandonment and tergiversation of political principles is justly attributable to me. I am not conscious of the motive which produced it. Whether I shall be considered faithful to Republican principles, my country must determine; and to this tribunal I cheerfully appeal. But whether, in the vote I am about to give, I shall evince uniformity of political principles, is not a question that I will submit as a matter of doubt for the decision of any one. It is a matter of fact, susceptible of immediate and conclusive demonstration. The first time I was a candidate for a seat in the House of Representatives, a gentleman who was a competitor with me for that station, published a lengthy address to the freeholders of the district, which we each wished to represent, which was, in some measure, a profession of political faith, and seemed to call on me to make public a similar exposition of my political sentiments. The question concerning the Bank of the United States was then a topic more generally adverted to, than it has been for some years past; it was, of course, dilated on in the address of my competitor, which imposed an obligation on me to express my sentiments on this subject, in the answer which I published to this address. I have no copy of my answer in my possession, nor have I seen it for several years; but I have no doubt but some copies of it are to be found, and if they can be found, it will be seen that I therein waive all considerations respecting the original constitutionality of the bank, and, after making some remarks respecting it, which I do not now recollect, conclude with observing, that however inexpedient at first, it cannot now be touched without impairing public credit and shaking our Constitution to its base. These, I think, are the very words used in my answer. Thus, sir, recorded evidence may be produced, that, in the very first act of my political life, (as relates to the General Government,) on the first promulgation of my political sentiments, when I was a very young man, I avowed the sentiments I now profess, and in conformity with which I now act. If I was a Republican at the time I published this answer, if the sentiments it contained consigned me in the public estimation to the Republican party, if I acted and shall act in my political career in conformity to these sentiments, I have some latent suspicions that I should have some pretensions to the character of a Republican, if it were not discovered that a new order of patriots has lately arisen, which has exclusively appropriated to itself every Republican attribute, and will not permit any of its benign influence to animate the bosoms of those who have preceded them in the theatre of public life, though it is exclusively owing to the exertions of the latter, that its genial and hallowed flame has not been entirely extinguished. From the exposition I have just made, whatever may be the political sect with which I and many others of my more illustrious political associates are arrayed, I hope it will at least be admitted, that I have acted with consistency and in conformity with my earliest professions. I am conscious of possessing but little political merit, and my anxiety to have credit for what little I do possess, is augmented from my consciousness of the scantiness of the general stock. When we possess but little, that little is our all, and its value is proportionally enhanced from this consideration. Consistency of political opinion, and steady adherence to those tenets with which I had commenced my political life, was one of those humble recommendations for public confidence to which I flattered myself I could make some just pretensions; nor will the review I have just taken of the commencement and progress of my political life, diminish these pretensions. Whether this new order of exclusive Republicans, who have made their appearance upon the theatre of public life more recently than it was my fortune to do, shall succeed in excluding from the Republican ranks the late President of the United States and the majority of Congress, as also the Secretary of the Treasury and all the Republican members of Congress who voted for the bill under consideration; I say, Mr. President, whether this is effected or not, in either case the charge of apostacy or dereliction of political principles, cannot apply to me, because I now act in strict conformity with the profession of political faith which I made at the commencement of my public life (in relation to the Government of the United States.) With whatever political sect I may be associated in consequence of the affirmative vote I shall give to the bill now deliberated on, from the considerations already enumerated, I shall at least stand absolved from all imputations of inconsistency, insincerity, or apostacy. My candor cannot be impeached; I cannot be accused with advocating now a doctrine I once reprobated, nor of vibrating in my political opinions with a vibrating state of things. Nor has any one the right to question the sincerity of the solemn declaration I now make, that I every day cherish with a fonder affection, my attachment to those just and leading political principles to which I was attached, and which I professed at the commencement of my political life, because every passing day's experience serves

WEDNESDAY, February 20.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate and House of

Representatives of the United States:

I lay before Congress a return of the militia of the United States, as received by the Department of War, from the several States and Territories.

JAMES MADISON.

FEBRUARY 19, 1811.

Ordered, That the Message and documents lie on the table.

Mr. CUTTS, from the committee, reported the bill making further provisions for the disposal of the sections of land heretofore reserved for the future disposition of Congress, and for other purposes, correctly engrossed; and the bill was read the third time as amended.

Resolved, That this bill pass, and that the title thereof be "An act making further provisions for the disposal of the sections of land heretofore reserved for the future disposition of Congress, and for other purposes."

Mr. GREGG, from the committee to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act establishing navy hospitals," reported it without amendment.

Mr. BRADLEY, from the committee to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Peter Audrain," reported it without amendment.

The bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Richard Tervin, William Coleman, Edwin Lewis, Samuel Mims, Joseph Wilson, and the Baptist Church at Salem Meeting-house, in the Mississippi Territory;" was read the third time, and passed.

The bill, entitled "An act providing for the sale of a tract of land lying in the State of Tennessee, and a tract in the Indiana Territory," was read the third time, and passed.

The bill entitled, "An act authorizing the Secretary of State to cause a general index to the laws of the United States to be made, printed, and distributed," was read the third time; and, on motion of Mr. CRAWFORD, postponed to the first Monday in December next.

The PRESIDENT communicated a resolution of the Legislature of the State of Kentucky, approving the amendment to the Constitution respecting titles of nobility; which was read, and, on motion of Mr. BRADLEY, ordered to be transmitted to the Secretary for the Department of State.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to amend and continue in force an act, entitled "An act to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States," passed on the 25th day of February, 1791.

Mr. CRAWFORD said he regretted extremely, that at so late an hour, he was constrained to throw himself upon the indulgence of the Senate, especially as the subject was so much exhausted by the able and animated discussions which had for so many days attracted their attention. Before I enter upon the few remarks, which I feel it my duty to make in reply to the numerous comments which have been made upon the observations which I had the honor to submit to the consideration of the Senate, at the commencement of this discussion, permit me, sir, to acknowledge the liberality and indulgence with which those observations have been generally treated. In the course of the few observations to which I intend to confine myself, it shall be my endeavor to exercise that indulgence towards others which has been extended to me. The gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. CLAY) complains of the committee, because they have listened to the representations of two delegations from the city of Philadelphia who presented memorials to the Senate, who referred them to the committee; and because the committee have, in his opinion, given an adventitious importance to their representations, by the minuteness and by the pomp and parade with which they have been detailed to the Senate. It will be recollected that the committee did not seek the post which has been assigned them by the Senate, nor did they desert it after it was assigned to them. The object of referring petitions to committees is to collect that information which the Senate ought to have before it acts, and which in its collective capacity it cannot obtain. It has always been the practice of committees to permit the petitioners to be present at their meetings, to make such explanations, and to give such information touching the subject of their petition, as they think connected with it. It is the duty of committees to detail to the Senate the information which they collect, to enable the members to take a full view of the subject upon which they are called upon to act. The committee in the present case has done all this, and it has done nothing more. Had it pursued a different course it would have justly subjected itself to the animadversions of the Senate. To the information collected by the committee from these delegations, and laid before the Senate, my friend from Maryland (Mr. SMITH) has opposed a statement of facts, and his opinion founded upon those facts. As the situation and talents of that gentleman entitle his statements and opinions to great weight; as it is more than probable that the votes of several members will ultimately rest upon the weight of his authority, my honorable friend from Maryland (Mr. SMITH) will pardon me if I should examine his observations rather according to the rules of evidence, than those of logic. In making this declaration I wish to be explicitly understood, as excluding every idea of charging that gentleman with having made statements which he did not believe, or with having given opinions he did not entertain. I have no doubt but that he sincerely believes in the correctness of his statements, and in the accuracy of his opinions; but if, in the course of my observations, I shall prove incontestably that he is mistaken in some of his statements and opinions, it will teach the Senate the necessity of weighing the remainder of them with great circumspection. If I shall be able to show that he is mistaken in a case, the evidence of which is matter of record, that circumstance alone will induce the Senate to reject all idea of receiving his statements and opinions with implicit confidence. But, sir, before I proceed further in my observations, permit me to notice an expression which fell from the gentleman from Tennessee on my right, (Mr. WHITESIDE.) I understood that gentleman to say, that those Republicans who thought the law incorporating the bank was Constitutional, had been guilty of apostasy. I hope I misunderstood the gentleman; if I am mistaken it will afford me great pleasure to be corrected, because the declaration made a very strong impression upon my mind, and excited the most unpleasant sensations. [Mr. W. explained. He said an impression had been made upon his mind that the bank charter was unconstitutional, but that he had never examined the subject minutely until it had become his duty to do it. That that examination had convinced him that it was unconstitutional, and that those Republicans who now supported the renewal must have apostatized.] Then, sir, I say that this is language which no gentleman ought to use towards any member of this honorable body; and, sir, it is language which no gentleman shall without the walls of the Senate use to me with impunity. [Mr. W. explained by saying that he did not say that gentlemen had apostatized, but that he had only said in his opinion they had apostatized.] I wish the gentleman had been able to make a satisfactory explanation of his unwarrantable declaration. What right has he to make his opinion of the Constitution the test of other men's republicanism? By what authority does he erect his opinion as the standard of republican orthodoxy? as the standard by which the republicanism of other gentlemen is to be tried? The gentleman has mistaken his standard in the Republican party. I disclaim all authority in a case of this kind, and more especially the authority of the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. President, the honorable gentleman from Maryland has declared, that the act incorporating the Bank of the United States was in its origin a party question. [Mr. SMITH explained: He did not say it was a party question, but that it had given rise to party.] If I have mistaken what fell from the honorable gentleman from Maryland, I am not in what fell from the gentleman from Tennessee on my right, (Mr. WHITESIDE.) Sir, the assertion is not only without proof, but it is contradicted by matter of record. A reference to the yeas and nays upon the bill in both Houses of Congress will prove that many of our most distinguished Republicans voted for our bill, and some of the most respectable Federal members voted against it. In the observations which I made when I had the honor of addressing the Senate at the opening of this discussion, I attempted to show that the idea of party, as now known, did not then exist in the United States. That the parties then known were those who were the friends of the Federal Constitution, and those who were opposed to it. Nothing which I have heard advanced upon this subject in reply to my observations has made the slightest impression upon my mind against the correctness of the opinion which I then advanced. I understood the gentleman from Maryland to say, that the Congress which passed the bill to incorporate the bank was capriciously apportioned, and consisted of sixty-five members, and that of that number only thirty-nine voted for it. That if the members had been apportioned as the Constitution directs, upon the principles of population, in his opinion the bill never would have been passed. Sir, let us examine the correctness of this opinion: Every member present but one, from the States of New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and Delaware, voted for the bill, together with two from the State of Maryland, two from the State of North Carolina, and one from the State of South Carolina. The eight States who voted unanimously for the bank, one only excepted, upon the apportionment under the first enumeration, give a net gain of twenty members, while the other few States, most of whom voted against the bank, give a net gain of sixteen members. Thus, sir, if we may judge of the conduct of members in a geographical point of view, there can be no doubt that the friends of the bank would have been considerably increased by a correct apportionment. The vote in the House of Representatives on the final passage of the bill was thirty-nine to twenty. In the Senate the yeas and nays were taken on two questions during its pendency there. Upon the first the yeas were sixteen, the nays six. Upon the motion to strike out the twelfth section, which restrains the right of Congress to create any other bank during the existence of that about to be created, the yeas were five, and the nays eighteen. The opinion then is wholly incorrect, and yet the evidence upon which this opinion ought to have been formed was matter of record. Sir, the gentleman from Maryland has said that this bank has been mischievous in its consequences, and that wherever it has established a branch it has immediately produced a necessity for creating other banks. I would ask what has created the necessity of creating banks in New Hampshire, Vermont, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New Jersey, Delaware, North Carolina, and the Western States? This bank has never established a branch bank in any one of these States, and yet they have, without, I believe, a single exception, established banks; while the State of Georgia, where a branch bank has been long established, has not until within a few months past established a single bank. What cause is it that has influenced the Legislatures of Maryland, Pennsylvania, and several other States, to create so many banks within a few months past? Is it owing to the mischievous effects of the Bank of the United States? Sir, the facts I have stated show conclusively that the cause assigned by my honorable friend from Maryland cannot be the one which has produced this multiplication of banks. Some other cause must be sought for, and in my opinion a more rational one is ready at hand. The effects of the bank and of its branches wherever established, upon the prosperity of the people, and of the commerce of the place, removed the long-rooted objections which existed against banks, and hence their great increase in all the States.

The gentleman from Maryland has stated several cases in which the State banks, and the banks of this Territory have accommodated the Government, where the United States had refused. The cases stated prove nothing, and ought to have no influence with this Government in establishing a permanent system of revenue. If the State and Territorial banks have upon several occasions received the bills of other State banks to accommodate the Government, it was because it suited their convenience at the time. It was a mere temporary transaction, and forms an exception to the general rule. The charter of no bank in the United States compels them to take the paper of other banks, and whether they do receive them or not will depend upon contingent circumstances, or upon whim and caprice. No reliance, therefore, ought to be placed upon the duration of any regulation which is not enforced by their charters. The gentleman from Maryland thinks that the United States will have the same influence over the State banks that it has had, and will have over that of the United States. If he is correct as to the extent of that influence, his conclusion may be correctly drawn. But, sir, is it true that the National Government has no other influence over this bank than that which can be produced by withdrawing of its deposits? If it is so, then it must be admitted that the United States will have the same influence over the State banks that they will have over one of their own creation, because they can as easily withdraw their deposits from the one as the other. But, sir, the United States have an influence over the Bank of the United States, which is wholly independent of, and unconnected with, the right of withdrawing their deposits from its vaults. The bank is dependent on them for its existence. By renewing the charter for short periods of time you create a state of dependency upon the Government, which will at all times make the bank completely subservient to all the legitimate objects for which it was created. How, sir, is it with the State banks? Upon whom are they dependent for legal existence and for length of days? Upon the State governments. Suppose the authority from which they derive their existence should place itself in opposition to the Government of the United States; and suppose that this state of hostility should happen a year or two before the time at which their charters were to expire, and the State Legislature should direct them to hold the deposits of public moneys against the demand of the National Government, what course would they pursue under such circumstances? Sir, the case which I have stated is not a mere possible case. The history of several of the large influential States proves that this state of hostility, which I have supposed, is not an imaginary one. Make yourselves dependent upon the State banks for the collection and transmission of your revenue, and that opposition, which has but seldom happened, will become more frequent. Their disposition to control the operations of the National Government will increase with every increase of the means of annoyance, which the folly and improvidence of Congress may throw into their hands. For whose benefit, sir, is the Government to strip itself of this right, so essential for the due administration of its finances? Is it for the benefit of the great mass of the American people? No; not one in an hundred of them have any interest in the State banks. They feel no interest in the question; their true interest is more effectually subverted by the operations of the Bank of the United States than it can possibly be by the State banks. This bank affords them a portable currency which is of equal value in every part of the United States, while the credit and currency of the State banks is local.

Mr. President, the honorable gentleman from Maryland (Mr. SMITH) says that the Bank of the United States does not facilitate the collection of the revenue. If I understood the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. LLOYD) and the gentleman from Maryland correctly, human imagination cannot devise a system so peculiarly calculated to insure the speedy collection of your revenue, as that which is furnished by banks. Sir, I know nothing of the details of the banking system—I never was inside of a bank except two or three times in the branch bank which has been established in this city; but I understood the gentleman from Massachusetts to say, that when a revenue bond even of fifty dollars was deposited in the bank for collection, if it was not discharged when due, that the obligor was refused all further accommodation in that bank, and that if his accommodations amounted to $100,000, he was called upon to discharge his notes as they became due, the right to renew them being forfeited by this act of default. I understood the gentleman from Maryland to say, that whenever any person was known to be in default at any bank, that all the banks of the place immediately refused him credit, and demanded the payment of his notes as they became due, by excluding him from the right of renewing them. [Both gentlemen assented to the correctness of the statement.] I have then understood both gentlemen correctly. This simple statement proves, beyond the possibility of doubt, that the bank is the most powerful engine in the collection of your revenue, which human ingenuity can devise. Credit is the true basis of commerce. By placing your revenue bonds in the bank, the want of punctuality in a single case towards the Government shuts the door of every bank to which the defaulter had before had access, and also of every other bank of the city in which his commercial transactions have been carried on. And yet we are seriously told that the operations of the bank have no influence upon the prompt and secure collection of the national revenue.

It is impossible to resist the conviction that the prompt and secure collection of our revenue is principally owing to the influence of the bank. But, sir, the bank has another direct influence upon the collection of your revenue. By the rules established in the bank at Philadelphia, every person whose bond to the Government is deposited there, has a right, upon getting an additional endorser, to claim a discount for half of the amount of his bond, and the part so discounted is immediately carried to the credit of the United States, and the bank takes upon itself the risk of the ultimate collection. In this way, sir, one-half of the bond is collected at the sole risk of the bank, without any possibility of loss on the part of Government. And yet, sir, it is contended that the bank has nothing to do with the collection of the public revenue. The gentleman from Maryland says that the scarcity of money, and the alarm and dismay which the delegation of mechanics had represented as existing in Philadelphia, could not be the effect of the contraction of discounts by the Bank of the United States, because that bank, as well as the State banks, are going on with their ordinary discounts. This is true, but the gentleman from Maryland has forgotten that this delegation stated that the bank, upon the rejection of their memorial by the House of Representatives, had contracted their discounts, and that a correspondent contraction had taken place in the discounts of the State banks which had produced the pressure; and that that pressure had spread alarm and dismay through the city. That before they left the city, the directors of the Bank of the United States had come to an understanding with the directors of the State banks, all of whom had determined to resume and continue their ordinary discounts until the last hour. Notwithstanding the banks had resumed their ordinary discounts, the panic which had been produced did not cease, and the scarcity of money, and the distrust which had taken place, still continued to exist in Philadelphia.

The gentleman from Maryland admits expressly that the transmission of your public money for the payment of the Army and Navy must be effected through the agency of banks, but contends that that object can be effected as well by the State banks as by a Bank of the United States. My friend from Kentucky (Mr. Pore) said, that the great characteristic difference between the present Government and that which existed under the old articles of confederation, is, that the present Government has within itself the means of executing its own measures, without relying upon the State governments; whereas the old Congress had to rely upon the States for the execution of the measures which it had previously devised and adopted.

This opinion is substantially correct; for the Constitutional dependence of the present Government of the United States upon those of the States is confined to its organization, and not to the execution of its Constitutional powers after it is organized. The gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. WHITESIDE) has said, that we argue this question as though Congress was wholly independent of the State governments. When, sir, I had the honor of submitting my reasons to the Senate upon a former day, I expressly stated the cases in which the National Government was dependent upon those of the States, and proved, by referring to the Constitution itself, that in every case of that kind the Constitution imposed upon the State the highest obligation to perform the acts, for which the Government of the United States was dependent upon them. The Constitution having defined the cases in which this Government shall be dependent upon the State government, I did not hesitate to declare it to be unwise and improvident to increase that dependence by legislative acts, when we were unable to impose any obligation on the States to perform the act. The same gentleman has said that the objection to employ the State banks, was the result of a distrust in the State governments rather than in the State banks; and that this distrust was unreasonable, because the State governments were composed of the same description of men who composed the National Government. If this be called argument, and is entitled to any weight, it is a two-edged sword, which cuts both ways. It equally proves the unreasonableness of the distrust which is felt against the Government of the United States in relation to the exercise of the right to incorporate a bank. But, sir, to all this the most satisfactory answer is, that I will trust no man to do for me what I can do so much better for myself. Why trust any man when there is no necessity or reason for trusting him?

The gentleman from Maryland, in speaking of the means which have been resorted to, to procure the renewal of the charter, says that we have not procured memorials to be presented to Congress praying that the charter might not be renewed—we have not procured pamphlets to be written, published, and laid upon the tables of members, proving the unconstitutionality and inutility of the bank—we have not imposed upon the credulity of honest mechanics and manufacturers, and by that means procured delegations to be sent to pray for the rejection of the bank memorial. Surely, sir, the gentleman did not by these declarations mean to insinuate that any one of those gentlemen who support the bill upon your table, have had any agency in procuring any application to be made in favor of the bank. I know that gentleman's respect for himself; his respect for the Senate; his respect for the individual members of this body, as well as his respect for the general rules of propriety, exclude the possibility of his making such an insinuation. [Mr. SMITH explained, by saying, I exclude every idea of such an insinuation.] Sir, I will tell the honorable gentleman from Maryland, what has been done by those who are opposed to the renewal of the charter. I do not mean the members of the Senate who are opposed to it, but those who have attempted to inflame public opinion upon this question. Letters, sir, have been written from this place to induce the State Legislatures to instruct their members to oppose the renewal of the charter of the bank. I will ask the honorable gentleman from Maryland whether he does not know that letters have been written for that purpose?

The gentleman from Maryland has said, and I am extremely sorry that he has, that the Bank of the United States had their agents in this city for two sessions, intriguing with members of Congress to obtain a renewal of their charter. I can assure that gentleman that I have had as little to do with the agents of the bank as he has had. If, sir, I was disposed to retort upon those who are opposed to the renewal of the charter, I would ask, if they have not seen published in the democratic papers of Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Virginia, extracts of letters said to be written in the City of Washington, charging the members of Congress who are in favor of it with being bribed and corrupted, and with being disposed to sell the sovereignty of the nation to British capitalists? Have they not seen, in the same papers, conversations detailed with great minuteness, which it is pretended have passed between members of Congress, calculated to excite public odium and indignation against the friends of the bill now under consideration? Sir, I will not for a moment indulge an idea that these letters have been written or these conversations detailed by any member of this body. The idea that such has been the fact is too humiliating, too degrading, not only to this honorable body, but to human nature itself; to be entertained but for one moment. And yet, sir, the author of a charge, as base as it is false, against my honorable friend from Kentucky (Mr. POPE) has, day after day, occupied a seat in a gallery of the Senate, to which no person has a right of access, but by an introduction of one of the members of this body. Sir, the highway robber, when compared with the infamous fabricator of this base attempt to assassinate the reputation of this honorable member, becomes a virtuous and estimable character. Such, sir, has been the warfare which has been waged against the renewal of the charter. Denunciations and charges of political apostacy are the measures by which we have been assailed from without and from within. Sir, I have shown that the bank question was no party question in its origin—that it was a question upon which an honest difference of opinion always has existed, and does now exist. And, shall I be charged with deserting the standard of the people, while I am treading in the footsteps of the great Father of his Country? Shall I tremble at the charge of apostacy which has been denounced against me by the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. WHITESIDE) while I am pursuing the course which has been approved by a Gerry, a Langdon, and a Washington; men whom the wise and virtuous have delighted to honor? No! while treading in the footsteps of these well-tried patriots and enlightened statesmen, I will advance, with a firm, undeviating step, unappalled by the howling of party rage, more terrific than the yell of the aboriginal savage.

The gentlemen from Maryland (Mr. SMITH) has said that he has understood that a proposition was made in the Federal Convention to vest Congress with power to create corporations generally and without limitation. Had I been a member of that Convention, I should most certainly have voted against the proposition, because it would have been unreasonable. Why should such a power have been delegated? Not certainly as necessary to execute the delegated powers, because they are very limited—a general power to create corporations would have enabled Congress to have created them ad libitum, where there was no possible relation between them and any one of the delegated powers. The vote upon the bill incorporating the bank proves that if such a proposition had been submitted, it must have been rejected, under a conviction that the power to create corporations is incident to such of the general powers as might require an act of incorporation completely to execute them, and fairly vested by the Constitution in Congress; because ten of the members of that Convention were in Congress, and voted for that bill—because General WASHINGTON signed that bill, because the only member of that Convention now in Congress voted for the bill, and is now in favor of renewing the charter; and because there were but eight members of that Convention in Congress who voted against it.

Mr. President, I will now proceed to examine the objections which have been offered to the construction which I have given to several clauses of the Constitution. In the observations which I made upon this part of the question when I was up before, I endeavored to prove that every construction that had been given to this instrument, upon the idea of its being perfect, was likely to be erroneous. The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. GILES) and the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. WHITESIDE) still view it as the model of perfection. They are certainly at liberty still to entertain that opinion. Every man has a right to erect his idol in this land of liberty, and to fall down and worship it, according to the dictates of his own conscience. I endeavored also to prove, that if we applied the same rule of construction to that clause of the Constitution from which we endeavor to derive the right to create a bank, which has been applied to that from which the power to erect a light-house has been derived, the Constitutional difficulty at once disappears. Until my friend from Virginia (Mr. GILES) and my friend from Tennessee (Mr. ANDERSON) had otherwise declared, I had always understood the right to erect light-houses had been exercised as incidental to the power to regulate commerce. It seems, however, that I am mistaken, and that this right is incidental to that clause which gives Congress the right to exercise exclusive legislation in certain places. The clause reads in the following words:

"To exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever, over such district (not exceeding ten miles square) as may, by cession of particular States, and the acceptance of Congress, become the seat of the Government of the United States, and to exercise like authority over all places purchased by the consent of the Legislature of the State in which the same shall be, for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dockyards, and other needful buildings," &c.

Now, says my friend from Tennessee, this clause gives the right to erect dockyards; and as dockyards must be on the seacoast, therefore, Congress has the right to erect light-houses, because they must also be on the seacoast. This argument is extremely logical, nay, syllogistical, in form, but it is extremely illogical in substance. The conclusion drawn from the premises, is as necessary, as though I were to say, that because two and two makes four, therefore five and five makes twelve. The conclusion in the latter case is as necessary as in the former. But my honorable friend from Virginia (Mr. GILES) derives it from the authority given in this clause, to erect other needful buildings. But the question recurs, needful for what? Why certainly for the purpose before specified. What are they? Forts, magazines, arsenals, and dockyards. If this clause gives any authority to erect forts, magazines, arsenals, and dockyards, the other needful buildings spoken of must be needful for these specified purposes. I should suppose that no man, who spends only a few days in this city, can be at a loss to determine what is comprehended under the term "other needful buildings." Let him go to the dockyard, nicknamed a navy yard in this city, and he will there find a little town of "other needful buildings" in the words of the Constitution. But, sir, I deny that this clause of the Constitution expressly gives any right, but that of exercising exclusive legislation in the places to be accepted or purchased for the purpose therein specified. The right to erect forts, magazines, and arsenals, is fairly incidental to the right of declaring war, and of raising armies; and the right to erect dockyards is fairly incidental to the right of providing and maintaining a navy. But if for the sake of argument I should admit that the right to erect forts, &c. is given in this clause, how can it be proved that the right to erect a light-house is also given? Forts, magazines, arsenals, and dockyards, are enumerated, and as the Constitution says that all powers not expressly given are retained, if the right to erect forts, magazines &c. is given in this clause, most clearly the right to erect light-houses is retained by the States, because it is not to be found in the enumeration contained in the clause. When I had the honor of addressing the Senate before, I questioned the authority of the State governments to create banks; I then stated, and I again explicitly state, that it is with reluctance that I have felt it my duty to make any inquiry into the Constitutional right of the State governments to incorporate banks. The State Legislatures ought to have recollected the Spanish proverb, which says, that those who live in glass houses ought not to throw stones. Before they undertook to question the Constitutional authority of Congress, they ought to have thoroughly examined the foundation upon which their own right rested. The honorable gentleman from Virginia (Mr. GILES) says that the construction which I have given to that part of the Constitution which prohibits the States from emitting bills of credit, would apply equally to promissory notes given by one individual to another under the laws of a State, as to a bank bill. Permit me to inquire of that gentleman whether he ever saw a law authorizing one man to give another his promissory note? He may search the pandects of Justinian; he may turn over the leaves of the musty volumes written upon the common law, from the days of Bracton and Fleta down to the present day, and his search will be in vain. For the right to make contracts, the right to give promissory notes, is antecedent to, and independent of all municipal law. The gentleman will find laws and decisions in abundance, regulating the effect of endorsements and other collateral circumstances, and prescribing the manner of enforcing the payment of promissory notes, but he will never find a law giving the right to execute the promissory note. But it is said that the bills of credit, which the States are prohibited from emitting, must be bills of credit emitted on the credit of the State. If this distinction should be well founded, many of the State banks are still subject to the charge of unconstitutionality, because in many of them the States are directly interested, and wherever that is the case; their bank bills are bills of credit emitted on the credit of the State. But the correctness of this distinction may well be denied, because the restriction is as general as it could possibly be made. But it is said that this restriction applies only to bills of credit which are made a legal tender in the payment of debts; that bills of credit, designated in the Constitution, are ex vi termini a legal tender. For the correctness of this exposition, an appeal is made to the restriction which immediately follows it, which restrains the right of the States to make anything but gold and silver a legal tender in the payment of debts. It appears to me that the latter restriction excludes most emphatically the construction contended for. If the States are prohibited from emitting bills of credit, it would have been, to say the least of it, wholly nugatory to say they should not make them a legal tender. If the bills are not emitted, it is impossible that they can be made a legal tender. To suppose that the restriction upon the right of the States to make anything but gold and silver a legal tender has any connexion with or influence upon the restriction to emit bills of credit, is as absurd, as to suppose that the Decalogue, after having declared, that

"thou shalt do no murder," should have added, but, if you will murder, you shall not rob and strike the dead. The construction of the restraint upon the right to make anything but gold or silver a tender, is that they shall not make specific articles, as tobacco or cotton, a tender, as was the case in some of the States.

But it is said that the history of the States will show that the bills of credit specified in the Constitution were those only which were a legal tender in the payment of debts. Let us examine this point, according to the rule of construction applied to another clause in the Constitution by a large majority of both Houses of Congress during the present session. Another clause in the Constitution gives Congress the power to admit new States into the Union under two limitations: 1st. That no new State shall be formed within the limits of any State without the consent of the State; and, 2d. That no new State should be formed by the junction of two or more States without the consent of such States, and also of Congress. These limitations prove that the formation of new States, within the limits of the United States, was in view of the Convention at the time that this clause was adopted; and the subsequent clause, which gives Congress the power to make rules for the government of its Territories, proves that these Territories were at that moment under consideration. In addition to these reasons for believing that the framers of the Constitution had no idea of forming new States, beyond the limits of the United States, those who were opposed to the admission of Orleans as a State contended that the history of the United States proves that the power to erect new States and admit them into the Union was intended to be confined to new States within the limits of the United States, at the formation of the Constitution, and that a different construction would disparage the rights of the original States, and, of course, be a violation of the Constitution. What reply did the majority of Congress give to this train of reasoning? They said that the right to admit new States cannot be subject to any other limitations or restrictions than those which are contained in the clause which gives the right, and as there is no restriction upon the right to erect new States without the then limits of the United States, Congress have an unlimited right to erect and admit them into the Union. Let us apply the same rule of construction to the restriction of the right of the States to emit bills of credit. The restriction is a general one; it has no exceptions; and every attempt to make exceptions ought to be repelled by the answer which was given to those who opposed the right of Congress to admit the Territory of Orleans into the Union as a State. The construction I have contended for gains additional weight when we consider the restriction which immediately precedes that under consideration. No State shall coin money, emit bills of credit, &c. Bills of credit are but the representatives of money. The Constitution gives Congress the right to coin money, and to regulate its value. It takes from the States the right to coin money and to emit bills of credit. Why give to Congress the right to coin money and regulate its value? Because the interest of the nation requires that the current coin of the nation should be uniform both as to its species and value. If this is the true reason why the right of coining money and fixing its value was given to Congress, does not the right to issue that which is to be the representative of this coin; which, in fact, is to usurp its place; which is to be the real currency of the nation, necessarily belong to Congress? Does not the right to create a bank, which shall issue this representative of money, come within the same reason? I think it does.

My friend from Kentucky (Mr. CLAY) contends that the right to create a bank will prove destructive to the rights of the States, because if Congress can incorporate a bank, it may, under some pretext or other, create other corporations and authorize them to hold real and personal estate, which shall be exempt from the right of taxation by the States. That if this is admitted, and he believes it generally is admitted, that the States cannot tax bank stock, in this way the States may be deprived of the power of taxation. Sir, I am one of those who do not admit the fact. [Mr. CLAY said that he did not admit it neither, though he had understood that the bank held that doctrine.] I am extremely glad that we think alike, at least upon this collateral point. The right of the States to impose taxes is unlimited by the Constitution of the United States; they, therefore, can tax every species of property which is within their legislative jurisdiction. The unlimited power of the States to impose taxes is, in all probability, the true cause of giving to Congress the power of exclusive legislation over all places which should be selected for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, and dock-yards, because public property to a great amount would necessarily be collected in these places; and but for the vesting the right of legislation in Congress to the exclusion of the States, all this property would have been subject to taxation, which would have produced great embarrassment. It has been said, not indeed upon this floor, but by men for whose opinions I entertain a very high respect, that the right of the States to tax bank stock is inconsistent with the right of Congress to create a bank. That the right of taxation destroys the right to create, because the States, by immoderate taxation, could drive the bank out of their limits. All arguments drawn from the abuse of a right ought to be received with great caution; but, if it is entitled to any weight in this case, it equally proves the unconstitutionality of the State banks, because the right of Congress to lay and collect taxes is subject to but two restrictions: that they shall be uniform, and that direct taxes shall be according to the representation. Suppose Congress was under a necessity of raising $10,000,000 by direct tax, the whole, or nearly the whole, of this sum might be imposed upon bank stock, and by that means the State banks totally destroyed. The advocates of this doctrine are also advocates for State banks. If the right of taxation by the States proves the unconstitutionality of the Bank of the United States, the right of Congress to tax equally proves the unconstitutionality of the State banks.

To the fervid imagination of my friend from Kentucky, (Mr. CLAY,) this power to create a bank appears to be more terrific than was the lever of Archimedes to the frightened imagination of the Romans, when they beheld their galleys suddenly lifted up and whirled about in the air, and in a moment plunged into the bosom of the ocean. Are these apprehensions founded in reason, or are they the chimeras of a fervid and perturbed imagination? What limitation does the Constitution contain upon the power to lay and collect taxes, imposts, duties, and excises? None but that they shall be uniform; which is no limitation of the amount which they can lay and collect. What limitation does it contain upon the power to raise and support armies? None other than that appropriations shall not be made for a longer term than two years. What restriction is to be found in it upon the right to provide and maintain a navy? None. What upon the right to declare war and make peace? None, none. Thus the Constitution gives to the Government of the United States unlimited power over your purses—unlimited power to raise armies and provide navies—unlimited power to make war and peace, and you are alarmed; you are terrified at the power to create a bank to aid it in the management of its fiscal operations. Sir, nothing short of my most profound respect for honorable gentlemen, who have frightened themselves with this bugbear, could induce me to treat the subject seriously. Gentlemen have said that they are alarmed at the exercise of this power, and I am bound to believe them. Sir, after giving Congress the right to make war and peace; the right to impose taxes, imposts, duties, and excises, ad libitum; the right to raise and support armies without restriction as to number or term of service; the right to provide and maintain a navy without a limitation, I cannot bring myself to tremble at the exercise of a power incidental to only one of these tremendous grants of power. The gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. CLAY) contends that we have attempted to give a degree of weight and force to what we are pleased to call precedents, to which they would not be entitled in those tribunals from which we derive all of our ideas of precedents. I am happy to find that my friend from Virginia (Mr. GILES) agrees with me in opinion upon this subject. Indeed the principal difference between that gentleman and myself is confined to the question of expedience. He thinks that the construction which has been given to the Constitution ought to be considered as conclusive; and that great inconvenience will be produced by unsettling what ought to be considered as finally settled and adjudged.

I agree, also, with the gentleman from Kentucky, that a precedent, to have weight, must be in point; that the issue upon which the decision is made must be the same as that in which it is adduced as authority. To this I most heartily agree, and will rely upon it, to show that the cases which we urged as precedents are entitled to the greatest weight. In all cases between individuals, they are supposed to understand their own interests and their own cases. The plaintiff is supposed to understand the point upon which the decision of his case must depend. The defendant is supposed to understand the ground of his defence. They make up an issue, either of fact or of law. It is this issue which is to be tried. Any declaration or expression of the judge which is not confined to the issue, is, of course, entitled to no weight. Well, sir, what is the nature of the precedents upon which we rely? 1st. That a republican Congress, in the year 1804, passed a law extending the operations of this unconstitutional institution, as they contend, into territories to which they had no right to extend them by their charter. In the year 1807, they passed a law punishing the forging of their bills. Now, sir, my friend from Tennessee (Mr. ANDERSON) says, that those who passed the bank bill were afraid to venture that far; they were afraid to pass a law to punish the counterfeiting of their bills; but, in the year 1798, in the plenitude of federal domination, they passed a law to punish counterfeiting the bills of the bank. It is certainly true, that the Federal party did pass this bill in that year, but it is equally true, that the Republican party in the plenitude of their power did pass a bill of the same kind in the year eighteen hundred and seven. Well, sir, what is the issue which is tendered in the passage of every bill by the Congress of the United States. First, that the Constitution gives them the right to pass the bill; and, second, that it is expedient. The first, sir, is the most important issue, made up between the National Legislature and the people of the United States, in passing bills by which their rights are to be protected or violated. How, then, are we told that these laws passed sub silentio—that the Constitutional right of Congress to pass such a law never was discussed, or even thought of? Sir, suppose the gentleman from Kentucky had constituted me his attorney to do a particular act for him, and I had performed an act under that power which had no connexion with the one which he had authorized me to perform, and when charged with this violation of my trust. I should gravely say, really I never examined the power, but took it for granted that I had the right—that, in fact, I had done it sub silentio—what would my friend from Kentucky say to such a reply? But, suppose I had taken an oath to discharge the trust with fidelity and skill, and that I would, in all things touching the trust, confine myself to the power delegated to me. Suppose, I say, under these circumstances, I should violate this trust—should transcend the authority given, and perform an act clearly not delegated? What would the gentleman say to me when I gravely told him, that I had not particularly examined the authority under which I acted, that I had done it sub silentio? Sir, this way of disposing of these formal voluntary acts of the Government, sanctioning the legality and constitutionality of the bank charter, will not be accepted. Some more happy expedient must be devised. But, sir, we are told, that because the Constitution contains within itself the principles of amendment, that if any doubts existed on this subject, it ought to have been amended. Whenever the States have conceived their rights to have been affected by any construction which has been given to the Constitution, they have shown that they know how to obtain relief. When the Supreme Court of the United States undertook to support the doctrine that an individual could sue a State, they did not hesitate to interfere, and the Constitution was amended. When an embargo was laid, in the year 1807, those States who were most inimical to that measure did not hesitate to offer an amendment to the Constitution. Whenever a construction is given to the Constitution by a legitimate and competent authority, those who are opposed to that construction ought to propose amendments, and not those who are satisfied with it. If the construction given to the Constitution by the creation of the bank was thought by the Republican party to be vicious, then indeed have they been guilty of the grossest act of negligence. It was in their power, and most assuredly it was their duty to have amended the Constitution, either by expressly giving or taking away the power. It was their duty to have settled the question forever. Suppose, sir, you now decide that it is unconstitutional for Congress to incorporate a bank; this will not settle the Constitutional question. It will unsettle and render uncertain what has been settled for twenty years. You say you have not the right to incorporate a bank. Ten years hence other men will come into power, and say they have the right, and will exercise that right for twenty years. The bank will then have been Constitutional for twenty years, unconstitutional for ten years, and Constitutional for twenty more. Are we to go on in this unsettled, miserable, halting manner? God forbid! Sir, I have closed the observations which I thought it my duty to make in reply to the comments which have been made upon the remarks which I had previously submitted to the consideration of this honorable body. If, sir, I preferred my political standing in the State which I have the honor to represent (and, sir, I do not profess to have any out of it) to the public welfare, I should rejoice at the success of the motion which has been made by the honorable gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. ANDERSON.) But, sir, as I believe the public welfare infinitely more important than any fleeting popularity which an individual like myself can expect to enjoy, I shall most sincerely regret the success of that motion. Sir, I have said but little about the degree of distress which will flow from the dissolution of the bank, because I have not that kind of evidence which would enable me to judge of it with any degree of accuracy. The convulsed state of the European nations; the immense losses which our commerce has sustained by the operation of the decrees and orders of the tyrants of the land and the ocean, imperiously admonish us to beware of making untried and dangerous experiments. By supporting this institution, the tottering credit of the commercial class of your citizens may be upheld, until the storm shall have passed over. By overturning this great moneyed institution at the present crisis, you may draw down to undistinguished ruin thousands of your unfortunate and unoffending fellow-citizens.

[We have to regret the omission of two speeches in the course of the preceding debate, which are wanting to make it perfectly complete—that of Mr. Whiteside, the lowness of whose voice rendered it impossible for the reporter to follow him, and that of Mr. Anderson, the copy of the report of which was mislaid before it was committed to the press—both speeches in opposition to the renewal of the charter.]

The question was then taken on striking out the first section of the bill, (equivalent to a rejection,) when it appeared that there were for the motion 17, against it 17, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Campbell, Clay, Cutts, Franklin, Gaillard, German, Giles, Gregg, Lambert, Leib, Mathewson, Reed, Robinson, Smith of Maryland, Whiteside, and Worthington.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Bradley, Brent, Champlin, Condit, Crawford, Dana, Gilman, Goodrich, Horsey, Lloyd, Pickering, Pope, Smith of New York, Tait, Taylor, and Turner.

The Senate being equally divided, it became the duty of the VICE PRESIDENT to decide the question by his vote; previously to which he made the following observations:

GENTLEMEN: As the subject on which I am called upon to decide has excited great sensibility, I must solicit the indulgence of the Senate while I briefly state the reasons which influence my judgment.

Permit me to observe, that the question to be decided does not depend simply upon the right of Congress to establish under any modification a bank, but upon their power to establish a National Bank, as contemplated by this bill. In other words, can they create a body politic and corporate, not constituting a part of the Government, nor otherwise responsible to it but by forfeiture of charter, and bestow on its members privileges, immunities, and exemptions not recognised by the laws of the States, nor enjoyed by the citizens generally? It cannot be doubted but that Congress may pass all necessary and proper laws for carrying into execution the powers specifically granted to the Government, or to any department or officer thereof: but, in doing so, the means must be suited and subordinate to the end. The power to create corporations is not expressly granted; it is a high attribute of sovereignty and in its nature not accessorial or derivative by implication, but primary and independent.

I cannot believe that this interpretation of the Constitution will, in any degree, defeat the purposes for which it was formed. On the contrary, it does appear to me, that the opposite exposition has an inevitable tendency to consolidation, and affords just and serious cause of alarm.

In the course of a long life I have found that Government is not to be strengthened by an assumption of doubtful powers, but by a wise and energetic execution of those which are incontestable; the former never fails to produce suspicion and distrust, while the latter inspires respect and confidence.

If, however, after a fair experiment, the powers vested in the Government shall be found incompetent to the attainment of the objects for which it was instituted, the Constitution happily furnishes the means for remedying the evil by amendment, and I have no doubt that in such event on an appeal to the patriotism and good sense of the community it will be wisely applied.

I will not trespass upon the patience of the Senate any longer than to say, from the best examination I have been able to give the subject, I am constrained by a sense of duty to decide in the affirmative—that is, that the first section of the bill be stricken out.

THURSDAY, February 21.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act to erect a light-house on Boon island, in the State of Massachusetts, to place buoys off Cape Fear river, and to erect a beacon at New Inlet, in the State of North Carolina; and to place buoys at the entrance of the harbor of Edgartown, and to erect a column of stone on Cape Elizabeth, in the State of Massachusetts;" in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill last brought up for concurrence was read, and passed to the second reading.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to amend and continue in force an act, entitled "An act to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States," passed on the 25th day of February, 1791.

On motion of Mr. LEIB,

Ordered, That it be postponed to the first Monday in December next.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to extend the right of suffrage in the Indiana Territory, and for other purposes; and the bill having been amended, the PRESIDENT reported it to the House accordingly.

On the question, Shall this bill be engrossed and read a third time as amended? it was determined in the affirmative.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to authorize the payment of certain certificates, credits, and pensions, and for other purposes; and, on motion, it was agreed that it be made the order of the day for to-morrow.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill in addition to the act to regulate the laying out and making a road from Cumberland, in the State of Maryland, to the State of Ohio; and the bill having been amended, the PRESIDENT reported it to the House accordingly.

On the question, Shall this bill be engrossed, and read a third time as amended? it was determined in the affirmative.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill, entitled "An act to authorize the election of sheriffs in the Indiana Territory," together with the amendment reported thereto by the select committee.

On motion, it was agreed that the further consideration thereof be postponed until to-morrow.

The Senate resumed as in Committee of the Whole, the bill, entitled "An act establishing navy hospitals."

Ordered, That it pass to the third reading.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Peter Audrain;" and,

Ordered, That it pass to the third reading.

MR. SMITH, of Maryland, gave notice that to-morrow he should ask leave to bring in a bill to repeal the tenth section of the act, entitled "An act to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States;" and to repeal the third section of the act, entitled "An act supplementary to the act, entitled 'An act to establish the compensation of the officers employed in the collection of the duties on impost and tonnage,' passed 10th May, 1800."

MR. BRADLEY, from the committee to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act in addition to the act, entitled 'An act concerning Consuls,' and for the further protection of American seamen," reported it amended; and the amendment was considered and agreed to, as in Committee of the whole; and the PRESIDENT reported the bill to the House accordingly.

On the question, Shall this bill be read the third time as amended? it was determined in the affirmative.

MR. CUTTS gave notice that to-morrow he should ask leave to bring in a bill to amend the act, entitled "An act providing for the final adjustment of claims to lands, and for the sale of the public lands, in the Territories of Orleans and Louisiana."

FRIDAY, February 22.

The bill entitled "An act to erect a light-house on Boon island, in the State of Massachusetts, to place buoys off Cape Fear river, and to erect a beacon at New Inlet, in the State of North Carolina, and to place buoys at the entrance of the harbor of Edgartown, and to erect a column of stone on Cape Elizabeth, in the State of Massachusetts," was read the second time.

MR. LLOYD presented the petition of Moses Brown and others, on the subject; which was read. Whereupon, on motion by Mr. TURNER, the bill and petition was referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon; and Messrs. LLOYD, TURNER, and CONDRY, were appointed the committee.

MR. HORSEY, from the committee, reported the bill to extend the right of suffrage in the Indiana Territory, and for other purposes, correctly engrossed; and the bill was read the third time as amended, and passed.

MR. HORSEY, from the committee, reported the bill in addition to the act to regulate the laying out and making a road from Cumberland, in the State of Maryland, to the State of Ohio, correctly engrossed; and the bill was read the third time as amended, and the blanks filled.

Resolved, That this bill pass, and that the title thereof be "An act in addition to the act to regulate the laying out and making a road from Cumberland, in the State of Maryland, to the State of Ohio."

Mr. HORSEY, from the committee, also reported the amendment to the bill, entitled "An act in addition to the act, entitled 'An act concerning Consuls and Vice Consuls,' and for the further protection of American seamen," correctly engrossed; and the bill was read the third time as amended.

Resolved, That this bill pass with an amendment.

The bill, entitled "An act establishing navy hospitals," was read the third time, and passed.

The bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Peter Audrain," was read the third time, and passed.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to authorize the payment of certain certificates, credits, and pensions, and for other purposes; and, on motion by Mr. ANDERSON, that the further consideration thereof be postponed to the first Monday in December next, it was determined in the negative—yeas 8, nays 17, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Bradley, Franklin, German, Gregg, Lambert, Smith of New York, and Turner.

NAYS—Messrs. Campbell, Clay, Condit, Crawford, Cutts, Dana, Gilman, Horsey, Leib, Lloyd, Pope, Reed, Smith of Maryland, Tait, Taylor, Whiteside, and Worthington.

Agreeably to notice, Mr. CUTTS asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill to amend the act, entitled "An act providing for the final adjustment of claims to lands, and for the sale of the public lands, in the Territories of Orleans and Louisiana;" and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

Agreeably to notice, Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill to repeal the tenth section of the act, entitled "An act to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States," and to repeal the third section of the act, entitled "An act supplementary to the act, entitled 'An act to establish the compensation of the officers employed in the collection of the duties on impost and tonnage,' passed 10th of May, 1800;" and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill, entitled "An act to authorize the election of sheriffs in the Indiana Territory;" together with the amendment reported thereto by the select committee; and, having agreed to the amendment, the PRESIDENT reported the bill to the House accordingly.

On the question, Shall this bill be read a third time as amended? it was determined in the affirmative.

The PRESIDENT communicated a report of the Secretary of the Navy on the practical use of the torpedo, or submarine explosion; and the report and documents therein referred to were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT notified the Senate that he should be absent, after this day, for the remainder of the session.

SATURDAY, February 23.

The VICE PRESIDENT being absent, the Senate proceeded to the election of a PRESIDENT pro tempore, as the Constitution provides; and the Hon. JOHN POPE was elected.

The credentials of the Hon. JOHN TAYLOR, appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the State of South Carolina, for the term of six years, commencing on the fourth day of March next, were read, and ordered to lie on file.

The bill to repeal the tenth section of the act, entitled "An act to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States," and the third section of the act, entitled "An act supplementary to an act, entitled 'An act to establish the compensation of the officers employed in the collection of the duties on impost and tonnage,'" was read the second time, and referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon; and Messrs. SMITH, of Maryland, FRANKLIN, and ANDERSON, were appointed the committee.

The bill to amend an act, entitled "An act providing for the final adjustment of claims to lands, and for the sale of the public lands, in the Territories of Orleans and Louisiana," was read the second time, and referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon; and Messrs. BRADLEY, CAMPBELL, and FRANKLIN, were appointed the committee.

On motion, by Mr. BRENT, that the memorial of Richard Bland Lee, on the subject of the damages he has sustained from the troops of the United States, when stationed at Harper's Ferry, and otherwise, together with the accompanying documents, be referred to the Secretary of War; it was determined in the negative.

The PRESIDENT communicated a report of the Secretary for the Department of Treasury, with a statement of the emoluments of the officers employed in the collection of the customs for the year 1810; which were read, and, ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the committee to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act for establishing trading-houses with the Indian tribes," reported the bill amended.

Mr. CUTTS, from the committee, reported the amendment to the bill, entitled "An act to authorize the election of sheriffs in the Indiana Territory," correctly engrossed; and the bill was read the third time as amended.

On motion, by Mr. GILES, that it be postponed to the first Monday in December next, it was determined in the negative—yeas 13, nays 14, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bradley, Brent, Clay, Condit, Giles, Goodrich, Lloyd, Pickering, Pope, Smith of New York, Tait, Taylor, and Turner.

YAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Campbell, Franklin, Gailard, German, Gregg, Lambert, Leib, Mathewson, Reed, Robinson, Smith of Maryland, Whiteside, and Worthington.

On the question, Shall this bill pass? it was determined in the negative—yeas 13, nays 14, as follows:

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the bill entitled "An act incorporating the Protestant Episcopal Church, in the town of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia," which passed the two Houses of Congress, and was presented to the President of the United States for his approbation and signature, and returned by him, on the 21st instant, to the House of Representatives, in which House it originated, with the following objections:

"Because the bill exceeds the rightful authority to which Governments are limited by the essential distinction between civil and religious functions, and violates, in particular, the article of the Constitution of the United States, which declares that 'Congress shall make no law respecting a religious establishment.' The bill enacts into and establishes by law sundry rules and proceedings relative purely to the organization and polity of the church incorporated, and comprehending even the election and removal of a minister of the same; so that no change could be made therein by the particular society, or by the general Church, of which it is a member, and whose authority it recognises. This particular church, therefore, would so far be a religious establishment by law: a legal force and sanction being given to certain articles in its constitution and administration. Nor can it be considered that the articles thus established are to be taken as the descriptive criteria only of the corporate identity of the society; inasmuch as this identity must depend on other characteristics; as the regulations established are generally unessential and alterable, according to the principles and canons by which churches of that denomination govern themselves; and, as the injunctions and prohibitions contained in the regulations would be enforced by the penal consequences applicable to a violation of them according to the local law.

"Because the bill vests in the said incorporated church an authority to provide for the support of the poor, and the education of poor children of the same; an authority which, being altogether superfluous if the provision is to be the result of pious charity, would be a precedent for giving to religious societies, as such, a legal agency in carrying into effect a public and civil duty."

And that, upon a reconsideration of the bill, two-thirds of the House of Representatives did not agree to pass the same.

Mr. CURTIS, from the committee, reported the bill to authorize the payment of certain certificates, credits, and pensions, and for other purposes, correctly engrossed; and, on motion, by Mr. BRADLEY, it was agreed that it be postponed to, and made the order of the day for Monday next.

Mr. GILES submitted the resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Virginia, instructing their Senators, and requesting their Delegates, to use their best efforts to obtain from Congress an act authorizing the officers and soldiers of the Virginia line on State establishment, their heirs or assigns, to locate warrants which they may hold for lands granted for military services, on certain waste and unappropriated lands; which were read, and laid on the table.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill for the relief of the Collectors of the ports of Norfolk, Baltimore, and Philadelphia; and, on motion by Mr. REED, the consideration thereof was further postponed until Monday next.

Mr. LEIB submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate pay, out of the contingent fund, the sum of — dollars to Henry Miller, William Fishburn, and Tobias Simpson, each, for extra services during the present session.

Mr. GREGG, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 4th instant, the memorial of the clergy resident in the city of Philadelphia, made a report. Whereupon the further consideration thereof was postponed to the first Monday in December next.

Mr. BRADLEY, from the committee to whom was referred the bill to amend an act, entitled "An act providing for the final adjustment of claims to lands, and for the sale of the public lands, in the Territories of Orleans and Louisiana, passed on the 31st day of December, 1810," reported it amended; and the amendments were considered as in Committee of the Whole, and agreed to by unanimous consent; and the PRESIDENT reported the bill to the House accordingly.

On the question, Shall this bill be engrossed, and read a third time as amended? it was determined in the affirmative.

MONDAY, February 25.

The PRESIDENT communicated a report from the Secretary for the Department of War, containing an account of the expenses of the national armories at Springfield and Harper's Ferry, together with a return of the arms made and repaired at each during the year 1810, made in obedience to the fifth section of an act, entitled "An act to provide for the erecting and repairing of arsenals and magazines, and for other purposes;" and the report was read, and laid on the table.

The resolution to authorize the Secretary of the Senate to pay, out of the contingent fund of the Senate, to Henry Miller and others — dollars each, was read the second time.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill for the benefit of the seamen of the United States, together with the amendments reported thereto by the select committee; and, after debate, on motion of Mr. LLOYD, the further consideration thereof was postponed until the next session of Congress.

Mr. LEIB presented the memorial of the stockholders of the Bank of the United States, praying an extension of their charter, so far as to enable them to settle the accounts of the bank, for reasons therein stated; and the memorial was read, and referred to a select committee, to consist of five members, to consider and report thereon; and Messrs. CLAY, FRANKLIN, ANDERSON, LEIB, and BAYARD, were appointed the committee.

Mr. GILMAN, from the committee, reported the bill to amend an act, entitled "An act providing for the final adjustment of claims to lands, and for the sale of the public lands in the Territories of Orleans and Louisiana," correctly engrossed; and the bill was read the third time as amended.

Resolved, That this bill pass, and that the title thereof be "An act providing for the final adjustment of claims to lands, and for the sale of the public lands, in the Territories of Orleans and Louisiana; and to repeal the act passed for the same purpose, and approved February 16, 1811."

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, presented the petition of William Lorman and others, citizens of the United States, and residents in the city of Baltimore, stating that they, together with several others, resident merchants in Philadelphia, are severally owners of the ship Fair American and her cargo, arrived a few days since in the port of Baltimore from Calcutta, and that the said cargo is refused entry by the Collector of the Customs, on an alleged violation of the act, entitled "An act to interdict the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France, and their dependencies, and for other purposes;" and praying relief, for reasons stated at large in the petition;" which was read, and laid on the table.

The engrossed bill to authorize the payment of certain certificates, credits, and pensions, and for other purposes, was read the third time.

On the question. Shall this bill pass? it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 14, nays 12, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Clay, Condit, Crawford, Gilman, Goodrich, Lloyd, Pickering, Pope, Reed, Smith of Maryland, Tait, Taylor, and Worthington.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Bradley, Cutts, Franklin, German, Gregg, Lambert, Leib, Mathewson, Smith of New York, Turner, and Whiteside.

So it was resolved that this bill pass, and that the title thereof be "An act to authorize the payment of certain certificates, credits, and pensions, and for other purposes."

On motion, by Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, the bill for the relief of the collectors of the ports of Norfolk, Baltimore, and Philadelphia, was recommitted to a select committee, further to consider and report thereon; and Messrs. SMITH of Maryland, BRADLEY, and MATHEWSON, were appointed the committee.

TUESDAY, February 26.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole the bill, entitled "An act for establishing 11th Con. 3d Sess.—12 trading houses with the Indian tribes," together with the amendments reported thereto by the select committee; and, having agreed to the amendments and further amended the bill, the President reported it to the House accordingly.

On the question, Shall this bill be read a third time as amended? it was determined in the affirmative.

The Senate resumed the resolution to authorize the Secretary of the Senate to pay, out of the contingent fund of the Senate, to Henry Miller and others, — dollars for extra services during the present session. And on the question, Shall this resolution be engrossed and read a third time? it was determined in the affirmative.

WEDNESDAY, February 27.

Mr. CUTTS, from the committee, reported the amendments to the bill, entitled "An act for establishing trading houses with the Indian tribes," correctly engrossed; and the bill was read the third time as amended, and passed.

Mr. BRADLEY gave notice that to-morrow he should ask leave to bring in a bill to fix the time for the next meeting of Congress.

The resolution submitted on the 23d instant, was read the third time and passed, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate pay, out of the contingent fund, the sum of fifty dollars to Henry Miller, William Fishburn, and Tobias Simpson, each, for extra services during the present session.

Mr. GREGG submitted the following motion:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be directed to deliver to Caleb Boyle the portraits of the late King and Queen of France, which were some time since kept in the Senate Chamber, and which are now in one of the committee rooms, to be kept by him until the Senate direct otherwise; taking, at the time of delivery, his obligation to return them when demanded.

Mr. LLOYD, from the committee to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act to erect a lighthouse on Boon island, in the State of Massachusetts, to place buoys off Cape Fear river, and to erect a beacon at New Inlet, in the State of North Carolina, and to place buoys at the entrance of the harbor of Edgartown, and to erect a column of stone on Cape Elizabeth, in the State of Massachusetts," reported it with amendments; which were read and considered as in Committee of the Whole, and agreed to; and the President reported the bill to the House accordingly.

On the question, Shall this bill be engrossed and read a third time as amended? it was determined in the affirmative.

Mr. HORSEY, from the committee, reported the amendments to the last mentioned bill correctly engrossed, and the bill was read the third time as amended, by unanimous consent, and passed.

Mr. CRAWFORD, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 10th December, so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to the occupation of West Florida, reported a bill authorizing the President of the United States to accept the service of a num-

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 27th December, the memorial of Thomas Corcoran, and others, citizens of Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, made report. Whereupon, the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

Mr. LEIB, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 14th December, last, the report of the Secretary for the Department of War, on the discipline of the militia of the United States, made report. Whereupon, the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

Ordered, That the Secretary of the Senate return the documents accompanying the report of the Secretary of War of the 14th December last, to the War Office.

Mr. WORTHINGTON presented the memorial of Joseph Gordon, and others, praying an alteration in the laws providing for the sales of the lands of the United States, as mentioned in the memorial; which was read, and referred to Messrs. WORTHINGTON, POPE, and BRADLEY, the committee appointed on the 14th January last.

Mr. BRADLEY asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill altering the time for the next meeting of Congress; and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

The bill authorizing the President of the United States to accept the service of a number of volunteer companies, not exceeding fifty thousand men, was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. And on the question, Shall this bill be engrossed and read a third time? it was determined in the affirmative.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act supplementary to the act, entitled 'An act concerning the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France, and their dependencies, and for other purposes,' in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill last mentioned was read, and passed to the second reading.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

I transmit, and recommend to the attention of Congress, a report of the Secretary of State, relative to deficiencies in the returns of the census.

FEBRUARY 28, 1811. JAMES MADISON.

The Message and report were read, and referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon by bill or otherwise; and Messrs. WHITESIDE, TAYLOR, and BRENT, were appointed the committee.

FRIDAY, March 1.

The bill, entitled "An act supplementary to the act, entitled 'An act concerning the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France, and their dependencies, and for other purposes,'" was read the second time; and on motion by Mr. LLOYD, that it be referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon, it was determined in the negative.

Mr. GERMAN presented the memorial of Thompson and Edgar, and others, merchants of the city of New York, stating that they are owners and consignees of property to the value of not less than one million and a half of dollars, which has arrived in that port since the 2d of February, and that the collector has refused to permit the said property to be entered at the custom-house, on an alleged violation of the non-intercourse laws; wherefore the memorialists pray relief; and the memorial was read.

Mr. CURTIS, from the committee, reported the bill authorizing the President of the United States to accept the service of a number of volunteer companies, not exceeding fifty thousand men, correctly engrossed; and the bill was read the third time.

Resolved. That this bill pass, and that the title thereof be "An act authorizing the President of the United States to accept the service of a number of volunteer companies, not exceeding fifty thousand men."

The bill altering the time for the next meeting of Congress was read the second time. And on motion, by Mr. BRADLEY, to fill the blanks with the words "third" and "May;" so that the meeting be on the third Monday of May next, it was determined in the negative—yeas 10, nays 17, as follows:

eight hundred and four, establishing the fees of harbor master and health officer of the ports of Savannah and St. Mary's," was read the second time by unanimous consent, and referred to a select committee to consider and report thereon; and Messrs. TAIT, LLOYD, and SMITH of Maryland, were appointed the committee.

The bill, entitled an act to annex a part of the State of New Jersey to the collection district of New York; to remove the office of collector of Niagara to Lewiston; to make Cape St. Vincent, in the district of Sackett's Harbor, a port of delivery; and out of the districts of Miami and Mississippi to make two new districts, to be called the districts of Sandusky and Teche, and for other purposes," was read the second time by unanimous consent, and referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon; and Messrs. GERMAN, CONDIT, and BRADLEY, were appointed the committee.

Mr. LLOYD, from the committee to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act authorizing a loan of money for a sum not exceeding five millions of dollars," reported the bill amended.

The bill, entitled "An act for the relief of John Macnamara," was referred to a select committee to consider and report thereon; and Messrs. TAYLOR, BRADLEY, and TURNER, were appointed the committee.

SATURDAY, March 2.

The bill, entitled "An act authorizing the issuing of debentures in certain cases," was read the second time, and referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon; and Messrs. BRADLEY, LEIB, and SMITH, of Maryland, were appointed the committee.

Mr. GERMAN, from the committee to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act to annex a part of the State of New Jersey to the collection district of New York; to remove the office of collector of Niagara to Lewiston; to make Cape St. Vincent, in the district of Sackett's Harbor, a port of delivery; and out of the districts of Miami and Mississippi, to make two new districts, to be called the districts of Sandusky and Teche, and for other purposes," reported it without amendment.

On motion, by Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, the bill was read the third time by unanimous consent, and passed.

Mr. TAIT, from the committee to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act declaring the consent of Congress to an act of the State of Georgia, passed the twelfth of December, one thousand eight hundred and four, 'establishing the fees of the harbor master and health officer of the ports of Savannah and St. Mary's,'" reported it without amendment.

On motion, by Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, the bill was read the third time, by unanimous consent, and passed.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill, entitled "An act authorizing a loan of money for a sum not exceeding five millions of dollars," together with the amendment reported thereto by the select committee; and the amendment having been agreed to, the President reported the bill to the House accordingly.

On the question, Shall this bill be read a third time as amended? it was determined in the affirmative. The bill was then read the third time as amended, by unanimous consent, and passed.

Mr. TAYLOR, from the committee to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of John Macnamara," reported it with an amendment, which was considered as in Committee of the Whole; and, having agreed to the amendment, the President reported the bill to the House accordingly.

On the question, Shall this bill be read the third time as amended? it was determined in the affirmative. The bill was then read the third time as amended, by unanimous consent, and passed.

The Senate resumed the motion made yesterday by Mr. PICKERING, that the injunction of secrecy on certain papers, communicated confidentially to the Senate, be taken off; and, on motion by Mr. BAYARD,

Resolved, That the injunction of secrecy be taken off in relation to the vote of the Senate this day, on the resolution of the first March, offered by Mr. PICKERING.

On the question to agree to the original motion, it was determined in the negative—yeas 8, nays 14, as follows:

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Bradley, Dana, Goodrich, Horsey, Lloyd, and Pickering.

So it was Resolved, That this bill pass.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. CLAY, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 25th February, the memorial of the stockholders of the Bank of the United States, praying that an act of Congress might be passed to continue the corporate powers of the bank for a further period, to enable it to settle such of its concerns as may be depending on the 3d of March, 1811, made the following report:

That your committee have duly weighed the contents of the memorial, and deliberately attended to such explanations of the views of the memorialists as they have thought proper to present through their agents. That, holding the opinion (as a majority of the committee do) that the Constitution did not authorize Congress originally to grant the charter, it follows, as a necessary consequence of that opinion, that an extension of it, even under the restrictions contemplated by the stockholders, is equally repugnant to the Constitution. But, if it were possible to surmount this fundamental objection, and if that rule which forbids, during the same session of the Senate, the re-agitation of a proposition once decided, were disregarded, your committee would still be at a loss to find any sufficient reasons for prolonging the political existence of the corporation for the purpose of winding up its affairs. For, as it respects the body itself, it is believed that the existing laws, through the instrumentality of a trust properly constituted, afford as ample means as a qualified continuance of the charter would, for the liquidation of its accounts, and the collection and final distribution of its funds. But should any inconvenience be experienced on this subject, the committee are persuaded it will be very partial, and such as the State authorities, upon proper application, would not fail to provide a competent remedy for. And, in relation to the community, if the corporation, stripped of its banking powers, were to fulfil bona fide the duty of closing its affairs, your committee cannot see that any material advantage would be derived. Whilst, on the contrary, if it should not so act, but should avail itself of the temporary prolongation, in order to effect a more durable extension of its charter, it might in its operations become a serious scourge.

Your committee are happy to say that they learn, from a satisfactory source, that the apprehensions which were indulged, as to the distress resulting from a non-renewal of the charter, are far from being realized in Philadelphia, to which their information has been confined. It was long since obvious that the vacuum, in the circulation of the country, which was to be produced by the withdrawal of the paper of the Bank of the United States, would be filled by paper issuing from other banks. This operation is now actually going on. The paper of the Bank of the United States is rapidly returning, and that of other banks is taking its place. The ability to enlarge their accommodations is proportionately enhanced; and when it shall be further increased by a removal into their vaults of those deposits which are in the possession of the Bank of the United States, the injurious effects of a dissolution of the corporation will be found to consist in an accelerated disclosure of the actual condition of those who have been supported by the credit of others, but whose insolvent or tottering situation, known to the bank, has been concealed from the public at large.

Your committee beg leave to present the following resolution:

Resolved, That the prayer of the memorialists ought not to be granted.

The report was ordered to lie on the table.

CLAIM OF GENERAL WILKINSON.

Mr. BRADLEY, from the committee to whom was referred the memorial of General James Wilkinson, praying to be remunerated for moneys disbursed in the service of the United States, made the following report:

That the said Wilkinson has exhibited to them claims against the United States, to the amount of eleven thousand eight hundred dollars and ninety-six cents. It appears to your committee, from the documents and proofs produced by the petitioner to explain and support his claim against the public, that, of the above sum, $6,719 73 are claimed for his disbursements and expenses incurred pending Burr's conspiracy; $2,560 paid for a tract of land for the public service, now occupied by the troops on the Missouri river, near its mouth; $450, the amount of his passage from Baltimore to Charleston, when ordered on extra duty by the President; and $2,131 23, for losses of property sustained by his sudden transfer from St. Louis, where he was exercising the functions of a civil magistrate, to the Sabine, for the purpose of directing the arms of the nation against an invading force of the Spaniards.

Your committee have no hesitancy in saying that many of the charges appear to be legal and founded in justice, and may furnish a proper set off against the balance opposed to him by the War Department, and that the residue are entitled to equitable consideration; but, from the shortness of the time, and the pressure of business before the expiration of the session, your committee cannot find leisure to form that deliberate and clear judgment on the merits of the several items which justice to the petitioner and to the public require; they, therefore, beg leave to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the further consideration of the petition of General James Wilkinson, together with the accompanying documents, be postponed to the next meeting of Congress.

Extract of a letter from General Wilkinson to the chairman of the committee of the Senate.

WASHINGTON, March 1, 1811.

SIR; I have now the honor to present to the honorable committee the claim which I set up against the United States, sustained by an account current, duly vouched and explained; and I could conscientiously add to this amount the following sums:

In consequence of a peremptory order to repair to Richmond, for the purpose of attending Burr's trial, I was obliged to send the preceding property to the vendue-master, where it was knocked off for what it would bring.

But the clamor raised against me for saving the nation from a civil war, and upholding the existing Administration in office, by the most meritorious actions of my life, has been such that I have been heretofore restrained from asking for justice, much less seeking for liberality; and now, nothing but the penury incurred in the public service, and my desire to vindicate my character against the official calumnies of my enemies, could induce me to make the present application. It is possible the item charged against D. W. Ellicott may have been adjusted by the military agent; but finding the voucher among my papers, I have included it.

Should a question be made why this application should have been so long postponed, my answer would be, that, amidst the whirlwind of passion and prejudice excited against me, I do verily believe, had I asked for bread, I should have been offered a stone.

The committee will perceive, from the confidential tenor of the documents relative to Colonel ———'s visit to the city of Mexico, that they should not be exposed, and therefore I hope they may be returned to me. It will be observed, that he tendered a free gift of his toils, hazards, and expenses in the public service; but, believing that the acceptance would be unworthy the nation, and that the proposition sprung out of a sense of delicacy, opposed to the idea that it should be said that he had received money for doing that which might be called the duty of a spy, I insisted on his taking the bare expenses; and it was on the same ground of jealousy that he refused to give a receipt.

With great respect, &c.

JAMES WILKINSON.

Hon. STEPHEN R. BRADLEY.

Remarks explanatory of the annexed account.

The money paid Job Ruth was for the purpose expressed, pending Burr's conspiracy; the distance being six hundred miles.

The amount paid D. W. Ellicott was for the transport of public property from Fort Adams to New Orleans, to get it out of the way of the conspirators.

When Bollman was seized, he complained that he was without a cent; and to prove that the Government, while it protected itself, could not deal hardly with him, I advanced this sum by the hands of Lieut. William Wilson, now Captain Wilson, and stationed at Norfolk.

The money paid Ezra Haws needs no explanation.

The money paid Reibelt was for his services, and that of half a dozen others employed by him, to visit the taverns and suspected places in the city, to see and report what was passing.

The money paid Girard was for services past and prospective; he had been Colonel Burling's interpreter, on his route to Mexico; for these payments Simmons would give me no credit, although he holds the vouchers.

The payment to Mounet was for carrying advice to the Attorney General at Richmond of my approach, and various other witnesses whom I was directed to bring with me from New Orleans.

The payment to Pain was for transport of a part of these witnesses.

The payment for Colonel Burling is explained by the confidential documents submitted to the committee.

The charge for extraordinary expenses is explained by the oath of Captain Hughes.

The charge for money lost on the purchase of lands is deemed a fit subject for legislative bounty, because my absence on a distant and important service to the country caused the misfortune; and the public has received from another person the legal price of the land.

The charge for land, purchased on the Missouri, will be explained by an application to the War Department, where a deed for the land has been lodged.

The amount of sundries deducted from Simmons's account may be thus explained:

The New Orleans boat, in which the General embarked, was loaded with shot and shells for St. Louis, and not New Orleans, in the year 1805, and not the year 1806, and descended as far as Massac, where the load was shifted into barges to ascend the Mississippi.

The paint and awning charged for said boat is absurd; as neither the one nor the other will apply in any way to such flats.

The transport for camp equipage, baggage, and stores, was charged, because it is according to usage immemorial in the American, and all other armies; and can be considered no emolument, because these articles include books, papers, tents, marquees, and provisions, the transport of which belongs to the quartermaster's department, and cannot be attended to, or provided for, by a general officer.

Dr. The United States to Gen. James Wilkinson. For sundry disbursements incurred pending Burr's conspiracy, and subsequent to that period, either unprovided for by law, rejected by the accounting officer, or improperly charged by him:

Nov. 18, To cash paid for the transport of public property to New Orleans, to D. W. Elliott, (V. No. 2.)	231 00
Dec. 15, To cash advanced to Erick Bollman, by the hands of Lieutenant William Wilson, when seized and sent from New Orleans to the United States, (V. No. 3.)	200 00
1807, Jan. 16, To cash paid Ezra Haws for the transport of prisoners and guard from New Orleans to Baltimore, (V. No. 4.)	550 00

JAS. WILKINSON.

The charges of four hundred dollars should be credited by services rendered under the orders of the Secretary of War, as I performed the translations.

The articles under the head of the quartermaster's department are iniquitously charged, and in the face of the advice of the military agent, (see documents A, B, and C :) from which it would appear how anxiously Mr. Simmons searched for this charge; making it even a condition for the settlement of an account of many thousands of dollars. It will strike any one, that it was impossible the private horses of a single officer could have consumed such a quantity of forage, or that his fire would have required so much wood. The fact is this: a guard of fifty men helped to consume this fuel, and the horses of goers and comers, and a detachment of militia dragoons, were found out of the forage.

The report and accompanying documents were ordered to lie on the table.

The Senate adjourned to 6 o'clock this evening.

SATURDAY EVENING, 6 o'clock.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the bill, which had passed the two Houses of Congress at the present session, entitled "An act for the relief of Richard Terpin, William Coleman, Edwin Lewis, Samuel Mims, Joseph Wilson, and the Baptist Church at Salem Meeting-house, in the Mississippi Territory," and presented to the President of the United States for his approbation, has been returned by the President of the United States with the following objections:

"Because the bill, in reserving a certain parcel of land of the United States, for the use of the said Baptist Church, comprises a principle and precedent for the appropriation of funds of the United States, for the use and support of religious societies, contrary to the article of the Constitution which declares that Congress shall make no law respecting a religious establishment."

And the House of Representatives, in which House the bill originated, have taken the question in the Constitutional way, and have

Resolved, That the said bill do not pass.

The House of Representatives have passed a bill, entitled "An act concerning invalid pensioners;" a bill, entitled "An act making further appropriations to complete the fortifications commenced for the security of the ports and harbors of the United States;" and the bill, entitled "An act for allowing a reasonable compensation to the persons who have taken an account of the several manufacturing establishments and manufactures within the United States; in which bills they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The three bills last mentioned were read, and passed to the second reading.

Mr. CAMPBELL asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill for the relief of Richard Terpin, William Coleman, Edwin Lewis, Samuel Mims, and Joseph Wilson; and, on motion, by Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, the bill was read the first and second time by unanimous consent. On the question, Shall this bill be engrossed and read a third time? it was determined in the affirmative. The bill was then read the third time by unanimous consent, and passed.

The bill, entitled "An act concerning invalid pensioners," was read the second time by unanimous consent, and considered as in Committee of the Whole; and the bill having been amended, the President reported it to the House accordingly. On the question, Shall this bill be read a third time as amended? it was determined in the affirmative.

The bill entitled, "An act making appropriations to complete the fortifications commenced for the security of the ports and harbors of the United States," was read the second and third times by unanimous consent, and passed.

The bill, entitled "An act for allowing a reasonable compensation to the persons who have taken an account of the several manufacturing establishments and manufactures within the United States," was read the second time by unanimous consent.

On motion, by Mr. TURNER, the bill last mentioned was read the third time by unanimous consent, and passed.

Mr. CAMPBELL presented the petition of a number of inhabitants of the State of Ohio, praying a continuation of the road from the City of Washington to the Ohio river, (at or near Wheeling, in the State of Virginia,) through the State of Ohio and the Indiana Territory, for reasons mentioned therein; and the petition was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The Senate adjourned to ten o'clock to-morrow morning.

SUNDAY, March 3.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed the bill, sent from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Richard Tervin, William Coleman, Edwin Lewis, Samuel Mims, and Joseph Wilson," with an amendment, in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate; also, the bill, entitled "An act in addition to the act to regulate the laying out and making a road from Cumberland, in the State of Maryland, to the State of Ohio," with an amendment, in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

They have passed a bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for carrying into effect a treaty between the United States and the Great and Little Osage nations of Indians, concluded at Fort Clarke, on the 10th day of November, one thousand eight hundred and eight, and for other purposes;" also, a bill, entitled "An act to increase the salaries of the judges of the circuit court for the District of Columbia;" in which bills they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The two bills last brought up for concurrence were severally read the first and second times by unanimous consent, and ordered to the third reading.

The bill, entitled "An act concerning invalid pensioners," was read the third time as amended.

Resolved, That this bill pass with an amendment.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Richard Tervin, William Coleman, Edwin Lewis, Samuel Mims, and Joseph Wilson," and concurred therein.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill, entitled "An act in addition to the act to regulate the laying out and making a road from Cumberland, in the State of Maryland, to the State of Ohio." Whereupon,

Resolved, That they concur therein.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the committee to whom was referred the bill to repeal the tenth section of the act, entitled "An act to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States," and the third section of the act, entitled "An act supplementary to an act, entitled 'An act to establish the compensation of the officers employed in the collection of the duties on impost and tonnage,'" reported it without amendment; and, on his motion, the further consideration thereof was postponed to the first Monday in December next.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the committee to whom was recommended the bill for the relief of the collectors of the ports of Norfolk, Baltimore, and Philadelphia," reported it without amendment; and, on his motion, the further consideration thereof was postponed to the first Monday in December next.

The bill, entitled "An act to increase the salaries of the judges of the circuit court for the district of Columbia," was read the third time by unanimous consent, and passed.

The bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for carrying into effect a treaty between the United States and the Great and Little Osage nations of Indians, concluded at Fort Clarke on the 10th day of November, 1808, and for other purposes," was read the third time by unanimous consent, and passed.

Mr. BRADLEY, from the committee to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act authorizing the issuing of debentures in certain cases," reported it without amendment; and, on his motion, the further consideration thereof was postponed to the first Monday in December next.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate, that the House have passed the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to extend the right of suffrage in the Indiana Territory, and for other purposes," with amendments; in which they desire the concurrence of the Senate. They have passed a bill, entitled "An act allowing additional compensation to the Postmaster General;" in which bill they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill last brought up for concurrence was read; and, on motion by Mr. BRADLEY, that it be now read a second time by unanimous consent, it was objected to.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill, entitled "An act to extend the right of suffrage in the Indiana Territory, and for other purposes," and concurred therein.

The Senate adjourned to 6 o'clock in the evening.

SUNDAY EVENING, six o'clock.

Resolved, That Messrs. TURNER and CONDIT be a committee on the part of the Senate, with such committee as the House of Representatives may join, to wait on the President of the United States and notify him, that, unless he may have any further communications to make to the two Houses of Congress, they are ready to adjourn.

Ordered, That the Secretary acquaint the House of Representatives therewith, and request the appointment of a committee on their part.

Mr. BAYARD asked leave to bring in a bill making further appropriations for completing the Capitol, and for other purposes; and the unanimous consent of the Senate being necessary, it was objected to.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate, that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act to remit certain fines, penalties, and forfeitures;" a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Charles Minifie;" also, a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Lieutenant Colonel William Dent Beall;" in which bills they desire the concurrence of the Senate.

The three bills last brought up for concurrence were read, and severally postponed until the first Monday in December next.

The Senate resumed the bill, entitled "An act allowing additional compensation to the Postmaster General;" and, on motion by Mr. ANDER-SON, the further consideration thereof was postponed to the first Monday in December next.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate, that the House concur in the resolution for the appointment of a joint committee to wait upon the President of the United States, and notify him of the intended recess, and have appointed a committee on their part.

Mr. TURNER, from the joint committee, reported that they had waited upon the President of the United States, who informed them that he had no further communications to make to the two Houses of Congress.

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives that the Senate, having finished the business before them, are about to adjourn. Whereupon, the PRESIDENT adjourned the Senate without day.

PROCEEDINGS IN THE SENATE,

IN SECRET SESSION,

AT THE THIRD SESSION OF THE ELEVENTH CONGRESS.

THURSDAY, January 3, 1811.

The following confidential Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, by Mr. Coles, his Secretary:

To the Senate and House of

Representatives of the United States:

I communicate to Congress, in confidence, a letter, of the 2d of December, from Governor Folch, of West Florida, to the Secretary of State; and another, of the same date, from the same, to John McKee.

I communicate, in like manner, a letter from the British Chargé d'Affaires to the Secretary of State, with the answer of the latter. Although the letter cannot have been written in consequence of any instruction from the British Government, founded on the late order for taking possession of the portion of West Florida well known to be claimed by the United States; although no communication has ever been made by that Government to this of any stipulation with Spain, contemplating an interposition which might so materially affect the United States; and although no call can have been made by Spain, in the present instance, for the fulfilment of any such subsisting engagement; yet the spirit and scope of the document, with the accredited source from which it proceeds, required that it should not be withheld from the consideration of Congress.

Taking into view the tenor of these several communications, the posture of things with which they are connected, the intimate relation of the country adjoining the United States, eastward of the river Perdido, to their security and tranquillity, and the peculiar interest they otherwise have in its destiny, I recommend to the consideration of Congress, the seasonableness of a declaration that the United States could not see, without serious inquietude, any part of a neighboring territory, in which they have, in different respects, so deep and so just a concern, pass from the hands of Spain into those of any other foreign Power.

I recommend to their consideration, also, the expediency of authorizing the Executive to take temporary possession of any part or parts of the said territory, in pursuance of arrangements which may be desired by the Spanish authorities; and for making provision for the government of the same, during such possession.

The wisdom of Congress will, at the same time, determine how far it may be expedient to provide for the event of a subversion of the Spanish authorities within the territory in question, and an apprehended occupation thereof by any other foreign Power.

JAMES MADISON.

WASHINGTON, January 3, 1811.

The Message was read.

On motion by Mr. CLAY,

Resolved, That the Message from the President of the United States, of this day, which has been just read, be referred to a committee, with leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. CLAY, Mr. CRAWFORD, Mr. BRADLEY, Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, and Mr. ANDERSON, were appointed the committee.

MONDAY, January 7.

Mr. CLAY, from the committee, appointed the 3d instant, on the confidential Message of the Executive Proceedings.

President of the United States, reported a declaration and bill to enable the President of the United States to take possession of the country lying east of the Perdido, and south of the State of Georgia and the Mississippi Territory, and for other purposes; which were read, and passed to a second reading.

On motion, by Mr. ANDERSON, that the bill be now read the second time; it was objected to, as against the rule.

On motion, by Mr. CRAWFORD, that the Secretary furnish each Senator, requiring it, with a manuscript copy of the said bill, it was determined in the negative—yeas 14, nays 16, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Champlin, Crawford, Dana, Franklin, Goodrich, Horsey, Lambert, Lloyd, Pickering, Reed, Smith, of New York, Tait, and Whiteside.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Bradley, Brent, Campbell, Clay, Condit, Cutts, Gaillard, German, Gilman, Gregg, Leib, Mathewson, Robinson, Smith, of Maryland, and Taylor.

Mr. BAYARD submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be instructed to cause to be printed one copy for each member of the Senate, of the bill and declaration this day reported to the Senate by their select committee; and to adopt such measures as will insure the same being printed without danger of the secret proceedings of the Senate, on the subject, being disclosed.

On the question to agree thereto, it was determined in the negative—yeas 7, nays 23, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Champlin, Goodrich, Horsey, Lloyd, Pickering, and Reed.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Bradley, Brent, Campbell, Clay, Condit, Crawford, Cutts, Dana, Franklin, Gaillard, German, Gilman, Gregg, Lambert, Leib, Mathewson, Robinson, Smith of Maryland, Smith of New York, Tait, Taylor, and Whiteside.

TUESDAY, January 8.

The bill to enable the President of the United States to take possession of the country lying east of the Perdido, and south of the State of Georgia and the Mississippi Territory, and for other purposes, was read the second time; and, on motion by Mr. CLAY, it was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

On motion, by Mr. BAYARD, to amend the bill, by striking out of the first section thereof the words, "In the event of such arrangement for that purpose as shall have been made with the local authority which may then exist;" and, in lieu thereof, to insert the words, "In case an arrangement has been or shall be made with the local authority of the said territory for delivering up the possession of the same to the United States;"

On motion, by Mr. GILMAN, a division of the question was called for; and the question being put on striking out, it was determined in the affirmative.

The question was then taken upon inserting the proposed amendment, and determined in the affirmative—yeas 20, nays 12, as follows:

NAYS—Messrs. Bradley, Champlin, Clay, Cutts, Dana, Gaillard, Gilman, Goodrich, Horsey, Leib, Robinson, and Whiteside.

On motion, by Mr. BAYARD, further to amend the bill, by striking out of the first section thereof the words, "Or in the event of an attempt to occupy the said territory by any foreign Government," it was determined in the negative—yeas 11, nays 20, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Bradley, Champlin, Dana, Franklin, Goodrich, Horsey, Lambert, Lloyd, Pickering, and Reed.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Brent, Campbell, Clay, Condit, Crawford, Cutts, Gaillard, German, Gilman, Gregg, Leib, Pope, Robinson, Smith of Maryland, Smith of New York, Tait, Taylor, Whiteside, and Worthington.

On motion, by Mr. BAYARD, it was agreed to amend the fourth section of the bill, by inserting, after the word "enacted," the words, "That in case possession of the territory aforesaid shall be obtained by the United States, as aforesaid."

WEDNESDAY, January 9.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to enable the President of the United States to take possession of the territory lying east of the Perdido, and south of the State of Georgia and the Mississippi Territory, and for other purposes.

Mr. LLOYD presented the oaths, or affidavits, subscribed and sworn to by Samuel Turner, jun., John G. McDonald, and Lewis H. Machen, for the faithful discharge of their respective duties as clerks in the office of the Secretary of the Senate of the United States; which were read, as follows:

I, Samuel Turner, jun., do solemnly swear, that I will, with fidelity, and to the best of my ability, perform the duties that may be assigned to me as a clerk in the office of the Secretary of the Senate of the United States; and that I will, faithfully and inviolably, keep secret all the confidential business of the Senate until I may be specially absolved therefrom.

SAMUEL TURNER, Jr.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, County of Washington.

On the 9th day of January, 1811, Samuel Turner came before the subscriber, one of the United States' justices of the peace for the county, and made oath to the truth of the above statement.

JOHN OTT.

I, John G. McDonald, do solemnly swear, that I will, with fidelity, and to the best of my ability, perform the duties that may be assigned to me as a clerk in the office of the Secretary of the Senate of the United States; and that I will, faithfully and inviolably, keep secret all the confidential business of the Senate, until I may be specially absolved therefrom.

JOHN G. McDONALD.

Sworn to and subscribed before me, this 9th day of January, 1811. SAMUEL N. SMALLWOOD.

Executive Proceedings.

I, Lewis H. Machen, do solemnly swear, that I will, with fidelity, and to the best of my ability, perform the duties that may be assigned to me as a clerk in the office of the Secretary of the Senate; and that I will, faithfully and inviolably, keep secret all the confidential business of the Senate, until I may be specially absolved therefrom.

LEWIS H. MACHEN.

Sworn to and subscribed before me, this 9th day of January, 1811.

SAML. N. SMALLWOOD, J. P.

Whereupon, on motion by Mr. LLOYD,

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be authorized to employ the clerks in his office, who have subscribed and taken the oath, the form of which has been read to the Senate, in transcribing or otherwise arranging the business confidentially communicated to the Senate.

On motion, by Mr. CLAY, it was agreed to amend the first section of the bill, by inserting the words, "or any part thereof," between the words "same" and "to."

On motion, by Mr. CLAY, it was agreed to amend the bill, by striking out all the words, in the second section, preceding the words, "and he may for, &c.," also, by striking out of the same section the words, "of the said detachment, and."

On motion, by Mr. CLAY, it was agreed further to amend the bill, by striking out of the third section the words, "for paying and subsisting such part of the detachment as may be required for actual service, and;" also, the word "other," between the words "such" and "expenses;" also, by inserting after the words "necessary for," the words, "obtaining possession as aforesaid, and;" and, also, by striking out the words, "and the Territories of the United States."

On motion, by Mr. CLAY, it was agreed further to amend the bill, by adding to the first section the remainder of the original second section; and by adopting the original third and fourth sections, as the second and third sections of the bill; and having gone through the amendments, the President reported the bill to the House accordingly.

On motion, by Mr. FRANKLIN, further to amend the bill, by striking out of the first section the words, "or in the event of the attempt to occupy the said territory, or any part thereof, by any foreign Government," it was determined in the negative—yeas 10, nays 19, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Bradley, Champlin, Franklin, Goodrich, Horsey, Lambert, Lloyd, Pickering, and Reed.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Brent, Campbell, Clay, Crawford, Cutts, Gaillard, German, Gilman, Gregg, Leib, Mathewson, Pope, Robinson, Smith of Maryland, Smith of New York, Tait, Taylor, and Whiteside.

On the question, "Shall this bill be engrossed and read a third time, as amended?" it was determined in the affirmative.

On motion, by Mr. CHAMPLIN, that the injunction of secrecy respecting the bill be taken off, and that the further discussion thereof be with open doors, it was determined in the negative—yeas 6, nays 24, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Champlin, Goodrich, Horsey, Lloyd, and Pickering.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Bradley, Brent, Campbell, Clay, Crawford, Cutts, Franklin, Gaillard, German, Gilman, Gregg, Lambert, Leib, Mathewson, Pope, Reed, Robinson, Smith of Maryland, Smith of New York, Tait, Taylor, Whiteside, and Worthington.

Mr. ANDERSON submitted the following motion:

Resolved, That the subject-matter of the bill, entitled "An act to enable the President of the United States to take possession of the country lying east of the Perdido, and south of the State of Georgia and the Mississippi Territory, and for other purposes," be kept inviolably secret by the members of the Senate, until the Senate shall, by their resolution, take off the injunction of secrecy.

Which was read; and on the question to agree thereto, it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 20, nays 6, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Bradley, Brent, Clay, Crawford, Cutts, Franklin, Gaillard, Gilman, Gregg, Lambert, Leib, Pope, Reed, Robinson, Smith, of Maryland, Tait, Taylor, Whiteside, and Worthington.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Champlin, Dana, Goodrich, Lloyd, and Pickering.

Mr. CUTTS, from the committee, reported the bill last mentioned, correctly engrossed.

A confidential message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MONTGOMERY and Mr. CUTTS, two members of that body, with the following resolution, in which they ask the concurrence of the Senate:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,

In House of Representatives, Jan. 8, 1811.

Taking into view the present state of the world, the peculiar situation of Spain and of the American provinces, and the intimate relation of the territory eastward of the river Perdido, adjoining the United States, to their security and tranquillity: Therefore

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the United States cannot see, with indifference, any part of the Spanish provinces, adjoining the said States, eastward of the river Perdido, pass from the hands of Spain into those of any other foreign Power.

The resolution was read, and passed to a second reading.

THURSDAY, January 10.

The bill to enable the President of the United States to take possession of the country lying east of the Perdido, and south of the State of Georgia and the Mississippi Territory, and for other purposes, was read the third time; and, on motion by Mr. CLAY, to fill the blank with the words "one hundred thousand dollars."

On the question to agree thereto, the Senate being equally divided, the President determined the question in the affirmative.

On the question, "Shall this bill pass, as amended?" it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 23, nays 7, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Bradley, Brent, Campbell,

Executive Proceedings.

Clay, Condit, Crawford, Cutts, Franklin, Gaillard, Gilman, Gregg, Lambert, Leib, Mathewson, Pope, Robinson, Smith of Maryland, Smith of New York, Tait, Taylor, Whiteside, and Worthington.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Champlin, Goodrich, Horsey, Lloyd, Pickering, and Reed.

On motion, by Mr. CLAY, it was agreed to amend the title of the bill, by inserting the word "river," before the word "Perdido;" and after the word "States," by inserting the words "under certain contingencies."

So it was Resolved, That this bill do pass, and that the title thereof be "An act to enable the President of the United States, under certain contingencies, to take possession of the country lying east of the river Perdido, and south of the State of Georgia and the Mississippi Territory, and for other purposes."

On motion, by Mr. CLAY,

Resolved, That a committee of two be appointed to carry the said bill to the House of Representatives, and ask their concurrence therein.

Ordered, That Mr. CLAY and Mr. BAYARD be the committee.

Mr. CLAY reported that the committee had performed the service assigned them.

The following confidential Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, by Mr. Coles, his Secretary:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

I communicate to Congress, in confidence, the translation of a letter from Louis de Onis to the Captain General of Caracacas.

The tendency of misrepresentations and suggestions, which, it may be inferred from this specimen, enter into more important correspondences of the writer, to promote, in foreign councils, at a critical period, views adverse to the peace and to the best interests of our country, renders the contents of the letter of sufficient moment to be made known to the Legislature.

JAMES MADISON.

JANUARY 10, 1811.

The Message and letter therein referred to, were read, and referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon.

Ordered, That Mr. BAYARD, Mr. CRAWFORD, and Mr. CLAY, be the committee.

The resolution yesterday received, confidentially, by message, from the House of Representatives, was read the second time; and, on motion by Mr. CRAWFORD, it was referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon; and Mr. ANDERSON, Mr. CRAWFORD, Mr. CLAY, Mr. BRADLEY, and Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, were appointed the committee.

Mr. CHAMPLIN submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before the Senate such communications as may have been made to him by Louis de Onis, in relation to his having been appointed a special Minister to the United States by the Supreme Central Junta of Spain.

FRIDAY, January 11.

The resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. CHAMPLIN, was resumed; and, on his motion, it was agreed to amend the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before the Senate such communications as may have been made to him by Louis de Onis, in relation to his having been appointed a special Minister to the United States by the Supreme Central Junta of Spain; and, also, in regard to the particular object of his appointment.

On the question to agree thereto, it was determined in the negative—yeas 9, nays 18, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Champlin, Dana, Goodrich, Horsey, Lloyd, Pickering, Reed, and Worthington.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Brent, Clay, Condit, Crawford, Cutts, Franklin, Gaillard, German, Gilman, Gregg, Lambert, Leib, Smith of Maryland, Smith of New York, Tait, Taylor, and Whiteside.

Mr. ANDERSON, from the committee appointed on the subject, reported the confidential resolution from the House of Representatives, with the following amendment:

Strike out all the words after the word "the," first mentioned in the first line of the resolution, to the end thereof, and in lieu thereof, insert "peculiar situation of Spain and of her American provinces; and considering the influence which the destiny of the territory adjoining the southern border of the United States may have upon their security, tranquillity, and commerce: Therefore,

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the United States, under the peculiar circumstances of the existing crisis, cannot, without serious inquietude, see any part of the said territory pass into the hands of any foreign Power; and that a due regard to their own safety compels them to provide, under certain contingencies, for the temporary occupation of the said territory; they, at the same time, declare that the said territory shall, in their hands, remain subject to a future negotiation.

Which report was read, and considered as in Committee of the Whole; and, on motion to adopt the report, a division of the question was called for by Mr. DANA, and the question to strike out was agreed to, and the amendment was adopted; and the President reported the resolution to the House accordingly.

Ordered, That the resolution pass to the third reading, as amended.

SATURDAY, January 12.

Mr. CUTTS, from the committee, reported the amendment to the confidential resolution from the House of Representatives, correctly engrossed; and the resolution was read the third time, as amended.

On the question, "Shall this resolution pass, as amended?" it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 23, nays 6, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bradley, Brent, Campbell, Clay, Condit, Crawford, Cutts, Franklin, Gaillard, German, Gilman, Gregg, Lambert, Leib, Mathewson, Pope, Robinson, Smith of Maryland, Smith, of New York, Tait, Taylor, Whiteside, and Worthington.

NAYS—Messrs. Champlin, Dana, Goodrich, Lloyd, Pickering, and Reed.

On motion, by Mr. WORTHINGTON,

Resolved, That a committee of two be appointed to carry the said resolution and amendment to the House of Representatives, and ask their concurrence therein.

Ordered, That Mr. CLAY and Mr. PICKERING be the committee.

MONDAY, January 14.

Mr. CLAY, from the committee, reported that they had performed the duties assigned them on Saturday last.

The following confidential message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MONTGOMERY and Mr. MILLER, two members of that body:

Mr. PRESIDENT: The House of Representatives agree to the amendment of the Senate, to the resolution making a declaration with respect to our Southern frontier.

They concur in the bill, entitled "An act to enable the President of the United States, under certain contingencies, to take possession of the country lying east of the river Perdido, and south of the State of Georgia and the Mississippi Territory, and for other purposes."

Mr. CUTTS, from the committee, reported that they this day examined, and found duly enrolled, the bill and resolution last mentioned.

TUESDAY, January 15.

The following confidential message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MONTGOMERY and Mr. MILLER, two members of that body:

Mr. PRESIDENT: The Speaker of the House of Representatives having signed an enrolled bill, and an enrolled resolution, we are directed to bring them to the Senate for the signature of their President.

The PRESIDENT signed the enrolled bill and resolution last reported to have been examined; and they were delivered to the committee, to be laid before the President of the United States.

FRIDAY, January 18.

Mr. CUTTS, from the committee, reported that they did, on the 15th instant, lay before the President of the United States the enrolled bill, entitled "An act to enable the President of the United States, under certain contingencies, to take possession of the country lying east of the river Perdido, and south of the State of Georgia and the Mississippi Territory, and for other purposes;" also, the resolution making a declaration with respect to our Southern frontier.

The following confidential message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MONTGOMERY and Mr. GRAY, two members of that body:

Mr. PRESIDENT: The President of the United States hath notified the House of Representatives that he did, on the 15th instant, approve and sign the enrolled resolution, making a declaration with respect to our Southern frontier.

The following confidential Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

Mr. PRESIDENT: The President of the United States did, on the 15th instant, approve and sign "An act to enable the President of the United States, under certain contingencies, to take possession of the country lying east of the river Perdido, and south of the State of Georgia and the Mississippi Territory, and for other purposes."

Ordered, That the Secretary communicate the same to the House of Representatives, confidentially.

SUNDAY, March 3.

Mr. CLAY submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the act, passed during the present session of Congress, entitled "An act to enable the President of the United States, under certain contingencies, to take possession of the country lying east of the river Perdido, and south of the State of Georgia and the Mississippi Territory, and for other purposes;" and the declaration accompanying the same, be not printed or published, unless directed by the President of the United States, any law or usage to the contrary notwithstanding.

On motion, by Mr. CLAY, the resolution was twice read, by unanimous consent.

On the question, "Shall this resolution be engrossed and read a third time?" it was determined in the affirmative.

Mr. CUTTS, from the committee, reported the resolution last mentioned, correctly engrossed; and the resolution was read the third time, by unanimous consent; and

Resolved, That this resolution do pass.

On motion, by Mr. TURNER,

Resolved, That a committee of two be appointed to carry the said resolution to the House of Representatives, and ask their concurrence therein.

Ordered, That Mr. TURNER and Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, be the committee.

Mr. TURNER, from the committee, reported that they had performed the duty assigned them.

A confidential message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MONTGOMERY and Mr. MOORE, two members of that body, as follows:

Mr. PRESIDENT: The House of Representatives have passed the confidential resolution sent from the Senate, with amendments, in which they ask the concurrence of the Senate.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendments of the House of Representatives to the said resolution. And

Resolved, That they do concur therein.

Executive Proceedings.

On motion, by Mr. GAILLARD,

Resolved, That a committee of two be appointed to inform the House of Representatives that the Senate have concurred in the said amendments.

Ordered, That Mr. WORTHINGTON and Mr. BAYARD be the committee.

Mr. BAYARD, from the committee, reported that they had performed the duty assigned them.

Mr. CUTTS, from the committee, reported that they had examined, and found duly enrolled, the bill, entitled "An act concerning the act to enable the President of the United States, under certain contingencies, so take possession of the country lying east of the river Perdido, and south of the State of Georgia and the Mississippi Territory, and for other purposes, and the declaration accompanying the same."

A confidential message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MONTGOMERY and Mr. MOORE, two members of that body:

Mr. PRESIDENT: The Speaker of the House of Representatives having signed an enrolled bill, we are directed to bring it to the Senate for the signature of their President.

The PRESIDENT signed the enrolled bill, last reported to have been examined, and it was delivered to the committee, to be laid before the President of the United States.

Mr. CUTTS, from the committee, reported that they this day laid before the President of the United States the enrolled confidential bill last mentioned.

A confidential Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, as follows:

Mr. PRESIDENT: The President of the United States this day approved and signed the confidential bill, entitled "An act concerning an act to enable the President of the United States, under certain contingencies, to take possession of the country lying east of the river Perdido, and south of the State of Georgia and the Mississippi Territory, and for other purposes, and the declaration accompanying the same,"

Ordered, That Mr. CUTTS and Mr. CAMPBELL be a committee to notify the House of Representatives thereof.

Indiana Territory, and JULIAN POYDRAS, the Delegate from the Territory of Orleans, appeared, and took their seats.

A message from the Senate informed the House that a quorum of the Senate is assembled, and ready to proceed to business. They have appointed a committee on their part, jointly, with the committee appointed on the part of this House, to inform the President of the United States that a quorum of the two Houses is assembled, and ready to receive any communications that he may be pleased to make to them.

MR. DAWSON, from the joint committee appointed to wait on the President of the United States, reported that the committee had performed the service assigned them, and that the President answered that he would make a communication to the two Houses of Congress tomorrow at twelve o'clock.

WEDNESDAY, December 5,

Several other members, to wit: from New Hampshire, DANIEL BLAISDELL and JOHN C. CHAMBERLAIN; from Massachusetts, J. QUINCY, SAMUEL TAGGART, and LABAN WHEATON; from Vermont, WILLIAM CHAMBERLIN, MARTIN CHITTENDEN, and JONATHAN H. HUBBARD; from Connecticut, LEWIS B. STURGES; from New York, VINCENT MATTHEWS, PETER B. PORTER, and EBENEZER SAGE; and from Rhode Island, RICHARD JACKSON, jr.; appeared, and took their seats in the House.

A Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, which was read at the Clerk's table.

[For this Message see Senate Proceedings of this date, ante page 11.]

The documents accompanying the Message having been read, in part, the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, December 6.

The House resumed the reading of the documents accompanying the President's Message of yesterday, and having gone through the same, the Message and documents were committed to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and three thousand copies ordered to be printed for the use of the members of the House.

MR. SOUTHARD presented to the House certain proceedings of the Legislature of the State of New Jersey, disapproving of three amendments proposed to the Constitution of the United States, to wit: one by the Legislature of the State of Massachusetts, limiting the duration of any act laying an embargo within the United States; one by the Legislature of Virginia, "That the Senators in Congress may be removed from office by a vote of a majority of the whole number of the members of the respective State Legislatures by which the said Senators have been, or may be, appointed;" and the other by the Legislature of Pennsylvania, "That an impartial tribunal may be established to determine disputes between the General and State Governments;" which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Resolved, That the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads be instructed to report a bill authorizing the members of the Senate and House of Representatives to frank the President's Message and accompanying documents, transmitted to both Houses at the opening of the present session, notwithstanding the same may weigh more than two ounces avoirdupois: Provided, That each member, so franking, shall endorse on the wrapper, in substance, that the enclosure contains the said Message and documents, and them only, and subscribe his name to such endorsement.

A motion was made by MR. JOHNSON, that the House do now resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union; and the question being taken, it was determined in the negative.

The SPEAKER laid before the House certificates of the election of EBENEZER HUNTINGTON, of Connecticut; JOHN A. SCUDDER, of New Jersey; ROBERT WRIGHT, of Maryland; and WILLIAM MCKINLEY, returned to supply the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of John G. Jackson, of Virginia; which were referred to the Committee of Elections.

STANDING COMMITTEES.

A motion was made by MR. W. ALSTON, that the House do now proceed to the appointment of the Standing Committees, pursuant to the rules and orders of the House.

Whereupon, the following committees were appointed:

Committee of Elections—MR. FINDLEY, MR. CLAY, MR. STURGES, MR. TROUP, MR. TAYLOR, MR. VAN RENSSELAER, and MR. TAGGART.

Committee of Ways and Means—MR. EPPES, MR. W. ALSTON, MR. TALLMADGE, MR. MONTGOMERY, MR. BACON, MR. SMILIE, and MR. JOHNSON.

Committee of Commerce and Manufactures—MR. NEWTON, MR. MITCHILL, MR. CUTTS, MR. PITKIN, MR. MCKIM, MR. SEYBERT, and MR. BIBB.

Committee of Claims—MR. ROOT, MR. BUTLER, MR. BROWN, MR. STANLEY, MR. GHOLSON, MR. GOLDSBOROUGH, and MR. SHAW.

Committee on Public Lands—MR. MORROW, MR. GOODWYN, MR. ELY, MR. BOYD, MR. GOLD, MR. COBB, and MR. MCKEE.

Committee for the District of Columbia—MR. VAN HORN, MR. L. ALSTON, MR. WEAKLEY, MR. G. SMITH, MR. J. C. CHAMBERLAIN, MR. TRACY, and MR. BRECKENRIDGE.

Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads—MR. RHEA of Tennessee, MR. THOMPSON, MR. DESHA, MR. STANFORD, MR. TROUP, MR. CALHOUN, MR. MORROW, MR. DAVENPORT, MR. CHITTENDEN, MR. WHITEHILL, MR. J. SMITH, MR. POTTER, MR. WILSON, MR. SEAVER, and MR. HUFTY.

Committee of Revision and Unfinished Business—MR. SOUTHARD, MR. JACKSON, and MR. WITHERSPOON.

Committee of Accounts—MR. N. R. MOORE, MR. TURNER, and MR. KENAN.

DECEMBER, 1810.

Amendment to the Constitution.

H. OF R.

FRIDAY, December 7.

Another member, to wit: from New Jersey, WILLIAM HELMS, appeared, and took his seat in the House; also, a new member, to wit: from Maryland, SAMUEL RINGGOLD, returned to serve in the place of Roger Nelson, resigned, appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat in the House.

Mr. LEWIS presented a petition of the President and Directors of the Farmers' Bank of Alexandria, signed by Richard M. Scott, their President, praying that a charter of incorporation may be granted, according to the terms of their association, or upon such other terms as Congress may think proper to prescribe; which was read, and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

On motion of Mr. BACON,

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be directed to lay before this House a list of the names of persons who have invented any new or useful art, machine, or composition of matter, or any improvement thereon, and to whom patents have issued for the same, from that office, subsequent to the twenty-third day of January, one thousand eight hundred and five, with the dates and general objects of such patents.

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to prepare and bring in a bill establishing a suitable annual salary for the additional Assistant Postmaster General, authorized by the act regulating the Post Office Establishment, passed at the last session of Congress.

On motion of Mr. ROOR, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. R. then moved the appointment of several committees on the President's Message; but it being suggested that the documents had not been laid on the tables of the members, the committee rose without deciding on anything in relation to the Message.

On motion of Mr. FISK,

Resolved, That the apportionment of Representatives amongst the several States, according to the third enumeration of the people, ought to be in the ratio of one Representative for every — thousand persons in each State; and that a committee be appointed to bring in a bill accordingly.

Mr. FISK, Mr. MOSELEY, Mr. MOORE of South Carolina, Mr. QUINCY, Mr. COCHRAN, Mr. BARD, and Mr. MILLER, were appointed.

The House adjourned until Monday.

MONDAY, December 10.

Several other members, to wit: from Massachusetts, GIDEON GARDNER; from New York, GURDON S. MUMFORD; from Pennsylvania, JOHN PORTER; from Virginia, JOHN LOVE and DANIEL SHEFFEY; and from North Carolina, LEMUEL SAWYER; appeared, and took their seats.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a certificate of the election of WILLIAM T. BARRY, elected to supply the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Benjamin Howard, of Kentucky; which was referred to the Committee of Elections.

Mr. LEWIS presented a petition of the President and Directors of the Bank of Potomac, in Alexandria, in the District of Columbia, praying for an act of incorporation to take effect from the third of March next; which was read, and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

On motion of Mr. DAVENPORT,

Resolved, That two Chaplains, of different denominations, be appointed to Congress, for the present session, one by each House, who shall interchange weekly.

Mr. RHEA, of Tennessee, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, presented a bill to authorize the transportation of certain documents by mail, free of postage; which was read twice and ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-day.

Mr. KEY presented a petition of Lewis Grant Davidson, of the City of Washington, stating that, for the purpose of inheriting a large estate, he has assumed the surname of Davidson, having heretofore been distinguished by the surname of Grant, and praying that a law may be passed ratifying and confirming to him and his heirs forever the said surname of Davidson.—Referred to Mr. KEY, Mr. EMOTT, Mr. SAWYER, Mr. SHEPHERD, and Mr. S. SMITH, to consider and report thereon to the House.

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. MACON said that he had, late in the last session, laid upon the table a motion to amend the Constitution of the United States. He had done it at that time merely with a view to give notice of his intention to offer such a proposition at the present session. This amendment spoke so plainly for itself that it was unnecessary to explain it. It would be seen that its object was to prevent any member of Congress from accepting an appointment in the Presidential term during which he might be a member; for instance, it would go to prevent any member of the present Congress, from accepting an appointment under the present Chief Magistrate. The following is the resolution:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, two-thirds of both Houses concurring, That the following section be submitted to the Legislatures of the several States, which, when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the States, shall be valid and binding as a part of the Constitution of the United States.

"No Senator or Representative, after having taken his seat, shall, during the time for which he was elected, be eligible to any civil appointment under the authority of the United States, nor shall any person be eligible to any such appointment until the expiration of the Presidential term, during which such person shall have been a Senator or Representative."

This resolution was, on motion of Mr. MACON, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

President's Message.

DECEMBER, 1810.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

On motion of Mr. ALSTON, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. MACON in the Chair.

The Message of the President of the United States having been read—

Mr. ROOT moved the following resolutions:

1. Resolved, That so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to the subject of our foreign relations, be referred to a select committee.

2. Resolved, That so much as relates to that part of West Florida, acquired by the cession of Louisiana, be referred to a select committee.

3. Resolved, That so much as relates to the encouragement of American manufactures and navigation, be referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

4. Resolved, That so much as relates to the institution of a National University, be referred to a select committee.

5. Resolved, That so much as relates to the violation of laws interdicting the slave trade, be referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

6. Resolved, That that part relating to fortifications be referred to a select committee.

7. Resolved, That that part in regard to the militia, be referred to a select committee.

8. Resolved, That so much as relates to the Corps of Engineers and Military Academy be referred to a select committee.

When the resolution respecting West Florida was under consideration—

Mr. NEWTON said he wished to know from the gentleman who moved the resolutions why he had spoken of a part of West Florida only? Whether the whole was not included in the cession?

Mr. ROOT said he had supposed that no more territory had been acquired by the Treaty of St. Ildefonso, than lies west of the Perdido; whilst West Florida was understood to extend as far east as Pensacola. But if the whole had been ceded, so much the better; all that part "acquired by the cession," was embraced by the resolution.

Mr. T. MOORE moved to amend the resolution so as to read "so much as relates to West Florida, as ceded to the United States."

Mr. MITCHILL remarked that the resolution was about as perspicuous as could well be devised. If there was any ambiguity in it, it was derived from the Message, in which West Florida was mentioned, although he believed no such name was to be found in the convention for the cession of Louisiana. If the resolution conformed to the message, it was not worth while to go into a discussion as to the different appellations which had at different times been given to the territory in question. Mr. M. took a brief view of the different transfers of that territory, observing that the term West Florida was not known in Spanish geography, being an arrangement made by the British whilst they held possession; so that, in fact, this was a question of British and American geography on one side, and Spanish and French on the other. Upon the whole, as the resolution corresponded with the language of the Message, and was sufficiently intelligible at present, he was opposed to the amendment.

The amendment was lost.

When the resolution respecting the encouragement of American navigation and manufactures was under consideration—

Mr. BURWELL suggested the propriety of referring the subjects to two distinct committees. This motion was supported by Mr. ALSTON. It was contended that the duties of the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures were sufficiently arduous, without burdening them also with the subject of manufactures. Mr. ALSTON took occasion to observe that the subject of manufactures had heretofore been rather neglected, and it was proper that more attention should be paid to it.

Mr. NEWTON opposed the motion for dividing the subject between the two committees. How were they to encourage manufactures, he asked, unless by laying additional duties upon foreign tonnage and manufactures? Mr. N. repelled the insinuation that manufactures had experienced neglect under the guidance of the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures. He contended that on the contrary they had thriven and flourished under their care, although the House had never consented to take as effectual measures for their support as had been recommended by the committee.

Mr. MITCHILL said he too was opposed to severing things which had in their nature an essential connexion; for instance, he thought that the proposed separation of the subjects of commerce and manufactures was unnatural and preposterous. On a review of what had been done by Congress, he thought the friends of domestic manufactures had much cause to be satisfied. He recited the various encouragements which had been given to manufactures by Congress, in permitting the importation of the raw materials free of duty, and in laying heavy duties on the importation of manufactured articles. On the whole, he thought that as commerce and manufactures in fact were inseparable, they ought not to be divided by any regulation of the House.

The motion to amend was lost.

On motion of Mr. DAWSON, the resolution respecting fortifications was amended by inserting the words "land forces and" preceding the word "fortifications."

On motion of Mr. BASSETT, the following resolution was adopted:

9. Resolved, That so much as relates to the Navy of the United States, be referred to a select committee.

The Committee rose and reported the resolutions to the House, which were immediately adopted; and the several committees ordered to be appointed accordingly.

Mr. EPPES, Mr. TAYLOR, Mr. FISK, Mr. MONTGOMERY, Mr. SEAVER, Mr. CHITTENDEN, and Mr. DESHA, were appointed a committee, pursuant to the first resolution.

Mr. WRIGHT, Mr. SAGE, Mr. GARDNER, Mr. CRAWFORD, Mr. LEWIS, Mr. MCBRYDE, and Mr. RHEA of Tennessee, were appointed a committee, pursuant to the second resolution.

Mr. Mitchell, Mr. Burwell, Mr. Macon, Mr. J. Porter, Mr. Pitkin, Mr. Wheaton, and Mr. Ringgold, were appointed a committee, pursuant to the fourth resolution.

Mr. Dawson, Mr. Helms, Mr. Cobb, Mr. Rea of Pennsylvania, Mr. Champion, Mr. Livingston, and Mr. Hubbard, were appointed a committee, pursuant to the sixth resolution.

Mr. Root, Mr. Turner, Mr. Potter, Mr. Cobb, Mr. Holland, Mr. Butler, Mr. J. Smith, Mr. Weakley, Mr. Morrow, Mr. McKee, Mr. N. R. Moore, Mr. George Smith, Mr. Scudder, Mr. Huntingdon, Mr. William Chamberlin, Mr. Blaisdell, and Mr. Jennings, were appointed a committee, pursuant to the seventh resolution.

Mr. Peter B. Porter, Mr. Love, Mr. Lyle, Mr. Pearson, and Mr. Ely, were appointed a committee, pursuant to the eighth resolution.

Mr. Bassett, Mr. Mumford, Mr. Quincy, Mr. Kenan, Mr. Milnor, Mr. Taylor, and Mr. Jackson, were appointed a committee, pursuant to the ninth resolution.

Mr. BACON remarked that at present a doubt might exist whether the subject of the defects in the non-intercourse law, alluded to in the Message, was referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures or to the Committee on Foreign Relations. To remove this doubt he moved the following resolution, which was agreed to :

10. Resolved, That so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to the defects which may be found to exist in the provisions of the act concerning the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France, be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

TUESDAY, December 11.

Several other members, to wit; from New York, HERMAN KNICKERBACKER; from Virginia, EDWIN GRAY and JACOB SWOOPE; and from South Carolina, RICHARD WINN; appeared, and took their seats.

Mr. VAN RENSSELAER presented a petition of sundry officers and soldiers, and the heirs of officers and soldiers, who served in the British army in America in the war between England and France, between the years 1755, and 1763, now residing in the county of Albany, State of New York, paying that their claims to lands for services in the said war may be investigated, and that, if any be found due to them, they may receive grants for the same.—Referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have resolved that two Chaplains, of different denominations, be appointed to Congress, for the present session, who shall interchange weekly.

An engrossed bill to authorize the transportation of certain documents, free of postage, was read the third time, and passed.

The House proceeded to consider the resolution from the Senate, for the appointment of two Chaplains to Congress, who shall interchange weekly; and the same being read, was agreed to by the House.

The House proceeded, by ballot, to the appointment of a Chaplain to Congress on their part; and, upon examining the ballots, it appeared that the whole number of votes were one hundred and five, that fifty-seven were given for the Reverend Mr. LEE, forty-seven for the Reverend Mr. BRECKENRIDGE, and one for the Reverend Mr. BROWN.

Mr. LEE, having a majority of the whole number given, was, consequently, declared duly elected.

WEDNESDAY, December 12.

Two other members, to wit: from North Carolina, MESHACK FRANKLIN and WILLIAM KENNEDY, appeared, and took their seats.

A Message was received from the President of the United States, transmitting a report of the Secretary of State, from which it will be seen, that a very considerable demand beyond the legal appropriations has been incurred for the support of seamen distressed by seizures, in different parts of Europe, of the vessels to which they belonged.—The Message and report were referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. JOHNSON presented a petition of John and Edward Tanner, of Louisiana, praying the aid and patronage of Congress, in opening a canal navigation between the waters of the Mississippi and St. Francis Rivers; also the pre-emption right to a certain tract of land on which are two mill seats; and to be authorized to open a road direct from New Madrid, in Louisiana, to Nashville, in Tennessee; and that the said road may be established as a post road of the United States.

Ordered, That so much of the said petition as respects a pre-emption right to land be referred to the Committee on the Public Lands; that so much as relates to opening a road be referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads; and that that part thereof which relates to opening a canal, be referred to a select committee.

Mr. JOHNSON, Mr. RICHARDS, and Mr. SWOOPE, were appointed the said committee.

Mr. KEY, from the committee appointed, on the tenth instant, on the petition of Lewis Grant Davidson, made a report; which was read, and the resolution therein contained concurred in by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That the prayer of the petitioner is reasonable, and ought to be granted.

Ordered, That a bill be brought in, pursuant to the said resolution; and that the same committee do prepare and bring in the same.

On motion of Mr. MORROW,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire whether any, and what, further provision is necessary to be made for settling the claims to land, and for surveying and sale of the lands of the United States, in the Territories of Orleans and Louisiana; and that the committee report by bill, or otherwise.

Mr. FISK, from the committee appointed the seventh instant, presented a bill for the apportionment of Representatives among the several States, according to the third enumeration; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have appointed the Rev. Mr. ADDISON a Chaplain to Congress, on their part, during the present session. They have also passed a bill, entitled "An act to suspend the second section of the act, entitled 'An act regulating foreign coins, and for other purposes,'" to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The said bill was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

PATENT OFFICE.

Mr. MITCHILL remarked that Congress had, by virtue of the power expressly granted by the Constitution to secure to individuals their intellectual property, passed several statutes, together constituting what was called the patent office. He said it was extremely evident to every one who inquired into the subject, that the power granted to the Secretary of State in this respect was incomplete. Adverting to the measures taken at the last session, and commenced at this, towards the improvement of the state of that office, Mr. M. said he wished to go a step further by adopting the following resolution:

"Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire whether any, and, if any, what amendments ought to be made in the several acts insuring to individuals an exclusive privilege in their several inventions and discoveries, and that they report thereon by bill or otherwise."

The resolution was agreed to; and

Mr. MITCHILL, Mr. STEPHENSON, and Mr. KENNEDY, were appointed a committee pursuant to the said resolution.

FINANCES.

The following letter and report were received from the Secretary of the Treasury:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Dec. 11, 1810.

SIR: I have the honor to enclose a report, prepared in obedience to the act entitled "An act to establish the Treasury Department."

I have the honor to be, &c.,

ALBERT GALLATIN.

Hon. SPEAKER of the House of Reps.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Dec. 10, 1810.

In obedience to the directions of the act supplementary to the act entitled "An act to establish the Treasury Department;" the Secretary of the Treasury respectfully submits the following report and estimates:

Revenue.

The net revenue arising from duties on merchandise and tonnage which accrued during the year 1808, amounted to $10,348,000.

The net revenue arising from the same sources, which accrued during the year 1809, amounted, as will appear by the statement, (A,) to $6,527,000.

The statement (B) exhibits in detail the several species of merchandise and other sources from which that revenue was derived during the year 1809.

It is ascertained that the net revenue arising from the same duties has, for the first three quarters of the year 1810, exceeded $7,500,000; and it is believed that it will not, for the whole year, fall short of twelve millions.

The sales of public lands north of the Ohio river have, during the year ending on the 30th of September, 1810, as appears by the statement (C,) amounted to 159,000 acres, and the payments by purchasers to $610,000.

The same statement shows that the total amount of sales, from the establishment of the Land Offices in the year 1800, to the 30th of September, 1810, have amounted to 3,168,000 acres, which have produced $6,681,000; of which sum $1,646,000 remain due by purchasers. The sales in the Mississippi Territory being, after deducting expenses, appropriated in the first place to the payment of $1,250,000 to the State of Georgia, are distinctly stated.

Receipts and Expenditures.

1. Year ending on the 30th of September, 1810.

The actual receipts into the Treasury, during the year ending on the 30th of September, 1810, have amounted to	$8,685,861 17
Making, together with the balance in the Treasury, on the 1st of October, 1809, and amounting to	5,828,936 01
An aggregate of	14,517,797 18

The disbursements during the same year have consisted in the following items, viz:

Civil department, including miscellaneous expenses, and those incidental to the intercourse with foreign nations	$1,249,200 06
Military and Indian departments	2,514,523 75
Navy	1,674,735 50
	4,189,259 25
Interest on the public debt	2,735,898 91
Total current expenses	8,174,358 22
Payments on account of the principal of the public debt	2,884,409 24

Amounting together, as will appear more in detail by the statement (E) to	11,058,767 46
And leaving in the Treasury on 30th of September, 1810, a balance of	3,459,029 72
	14,517,797 18

It therefore appears that the actual receipts into the Treasury have exceeded the current expenses of Government, including therein the interest on the debt, by a sum of five hundred thousand dollars: the expenses had during the preceding year exceeded the receipts by a sum of thirteen hundred thousand dollars. The difference arises, not from an increase in the receipts, but from a diminution in the expenses, particularly those of the Military and Naval Departments.

2. Last quarter of the year 1810.

The receipts for that quarter will, it is believed, be more than sufficient to defray the current expenses and interest on the debt accruing during the same period. But the payments to be made on account of the prinprincipal of the debt in order to complete the annual appropriations of eight millions of dollars, amounting to more than $5,100,000, a loan first negotiated for $3,750,000, and afterwards reduced to $2,750,000, became necessary. The receipts and disbursements for that quarter are therefore estimated as follows:

Receipts into the Treasury from the ordinary revenue	$2,500,000
Proceeds of the loan receivable on 31st of December, 1810	2,750,000
Balance in the Treasury on 1st of October, 1810	3,460,000
	8,710,090

Expenses, civil, military, and naval, estimated	1,570,000
Interest accruing on the domestic debt	500,000
	2,070,000

Payments on account of the public debt, in order to complete the annual appropriation of eight millions, and including the reimbursement of 31st of December, 1810, on the six per cent. and deferred stocks, and that of same date, of $3,751,125 exchanged six per cent. stock	4,640,000
	6,710,000

Probable balance in the Treasury on the 31st of December, 1810	2,000,000
	8,710,000

3. Year 1811.

The outstanding revenue bonds, after deducting the expenses of collection and allowing for bad debts, will not probably, on the 1st of January, 1811, fall short of eleven millions and a half of dollars; the actual receipts for the year 1811, on account of the sales of lands, may be estimated at five hundred thousand dollars; and it is presumed that the portion of the revenue arising from importations subsequent to the present year, which will be received in 1811, will be more than sufficient to pay the debentures payable in that year. The actual receipts into the Treasury during that year may therefore be estimated at $12,500,000.

Estimating the expenses of Government for the year 1811, not to exceed the amount actually expended during the year ending on the 30th of September, 1810, that is to say—

Expenses of a civil nature, both domestic and foreign	$1,240,000
Military and Naval Departments	4,190,000
	5,430,000

And adding thereto the interest on the public debt, estimated at	2,550,000
--	-----------

The aggregate of the current expenses, exclusively of the payments on account of the principal of the debt, would not exceed	7,980,000
--	-----------

The payments on account of the principal of the debt will be applicable to the annual reimbursement on the six per cent. and deferred stocks, to the repayment of the loan of $5,750,000 effected this year, and to the reimbursement in part of the converted six per cent. stock, and must, in order to complete the annual appropriation of eight millions of dollars, amount to -

Making for the whole amount of the expenditures of the year 1811 or about one million of dollars more than the receipts for the same year.

If, therefore, this estimate could be relied on, an authority to borrow one million of dollars would be sufficient to enable Government to pay all the current expenses, and to reimburse nearly four millions and a half of the principal of the debt, leaving at the same time in the Treasury a balance of two millions of dollars, a sum not greater than what under existing circumstances it is eligible to reserve. But a deficiency may take place in the receipts if the amount of debentures should exceed what has been estimated; and for the expenses for the Military and Naval Departments, (which, according to the estimates of those departments, and exclusively of the sum necessary for fortifications, amount to $4,916,000,) may be greater than the amount actually expended during the year ending on the 30th of September, 1810. In order to provide for these and other unforeseen contingencies, the propriety of authorizing a reloan not exceeding in the whole the amount of the principal of the debt reimbursed during the same year, is respectfully submitted.

Public Debt.

It appears by the statement (D) that the payments on account of the principal of the public debt have amounted during the year ending on the 30th day of September, 1810, to $2,884,000, and during the nine years and a half ending on the same day to near $37,700,000, exclusively of more than six millions of dollars paid in conformity with the provisions of the Convention with Great Britain and of the Louisiana Convention.

Taking the calendar year 1810 by itself, the principal of the debt actually reimbursed will amount to $5,163,376, viz:

Annual reimbursement of six per cent., and deferred stocks	$1,412,251
Reimbursement of the six per cent. exchanged stock	3,751,125
	5,163,376

From which deducting the loan from the bank of	2,750,000
--	-----------

Leaves for the actual decrease of the debt during the year	2,413,376

The loan authorized by the act of last session had at first been negotiated in the latter end of May for $3,750,000; but the expenses having proven less than had been supposed, it was by mutual consent reduced in October to $2,750,000. With that object in view, in order that no greater sum should be ultimately borrowed than might be necessary, and also in order to avoid as long as practicable an increase of stock in the market, and that of a more permanent species of debt, a temporary loan from the Bank of the United States was preferred to any other mode. It is reimbursable on the last day of December, 1811, with a reservation that the bank may, in case of a non-renewal of its charter, demand an earlier payment on giving three months' notice. This condition may, if enforced, save some interest to the public, and can produce no inconvenience, as there will be no greater difficulty in effecting a new loan (if necessary) in the middle than in the latter end of the year. The documents F. G. H. I. show both the object and the terms of the loan.

From what has been stated, it appears that no other provisions are necessary for the year 1811, than a continuance of the additional  $2\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. duty, commonly called the Mediterranean Fund, and an authority to borrow a sum, probably much less, and certainly not greater than the amount of the principal of the public debt which will be reimbursed during the year. But as in conformity with the act of 1st of May, 1810, the importation of articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of the dominions, colonies, and dependencies of Great Britain will be prohibited after the 2d day of February next, if that nation shall not, before that time, so revoke or modify her edicts as that they shall cease to violate the commerce of the United States, some provisions appear necessary for the purpose of supplying the deficiency in the revenue arising from that cause, and of giving to that measure all the efficacy of which it is susceptible.

The probable defalcation in the revenue cannot, for obvious reasons, be at this time estimated with any degree of precision. The experience of the ensuing year can alone afford sufficient data for a permanent and detailed plan adapted to that state of things, and calculated to insure perseverance in the system as long as may be thought proper. But in the meanwhile, it appears essential to lay the foundation of such plan, and to guard in time against any great deficit in the receipts of the year 1812. It is believed that under existing circumstances it would be sufficient to render those receipts equal or nearly equal to the current expenditure, including therein the interest on the public debt, and estimated at about eight millions of dollars; and with a view to that object, a considerable and immediate increase of the present duties on importations is respectfully suggested.

It is not less important that the act should be free of legal difficulties and of well-founded objections, and that it should be enforced by every practicable means. On that subject the following observations are submitted:

1. The law of 1st of May, 1810, has neither expressly defined the edicts, the revocation of which is expected, nor made a notification by the President the evidence and sole evidence of the fact. It follows that in case of an unsatisfactory modification of her edicts by Great Britain, the decision of the question itself, whether the non-importation be actually in force or not will be left to the courts, whence delays and embarrassments will arise which will considerably impede the operation of the law.

2. The non-importation is to take place on the 2d day of February next, if a revocation shall not have taken place before that day. But this may have taken place and not be known on that day in the United States. If the collectors abstain from seizing merchandise imported after that day, until the fact shall have been ascertained, and the edicts shall not have been revoked, the merchandise will escape forfeiture, and the law during that period will be inoperative. If they seize, and the edicts shall have been revoked, the seizures will have been illegal, and the collectors will be liable to personal suits. This inconvenience may be remedied by a provision, directing, that during that period it shall be the duty of the collectors to make seizures, but, that the goods shall be restored to the parties on their giving bond with sureties for the value.

3. No exception has been made by the act in favor of vessels which have sailed for the British East Indies prior to the President's proclamation, and the short period of three months from the date of that proclamation to the day when the law is to take effect will occasion forfeitures or heavy losses in cases of bona fide American property in England paid for or ordered prior to the proclamation. It seems in every point of view eligible that cases clearly foreseen should be provided for by law, instead of being left to Executive discretion.

4. It is believed that an abandonment by the United States of their share of the penalties and forfeitures which may be incurred, and the distribution of these, according to the circumstances of the case, among the collectors, the other custom-house officers, the inspectors who heretofore have had no share, and the informers, would insure a greater degree of zeal and vigilance in detecting and preventing infractions of the law.

5. Some additional provisions will be necessary to enforce the law on the Northern frontier of the United States, among which may be reckoned: the erection of some new collection districts, particularly on the river St. Lawrence and in the eastern part of the State of Vermont; an increase of salary to the collectors in that quarter, inasmuch as under the non-importation, that part of their compensation which is derived from fees will be considerably reduced; and that which arises from commissions altogether lost; and an authority to the armed force of the United States to make seizures. And it must be added, that the peculiar situation of those districts will render condemnations extremely difficult, unless the obligation be imposed on persons claiming merchandise seized there to prove that the same was legally imported.

All which is respectfully submitted.

The letter and report having been read, so much thereof as relates to the revenue was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and so much as relates to the act respecting commercial intercourse, &c., to the Committee of Foreign Relations.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON,

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to prepare and bring in a bill fixing the number and compensation of clerks in the several Departments of the Government of the United States.

Mr. MITCHELL presented a petition of the President and Directors of the Cayuga Manufacturing Company in the State of New York, praying the remission of the duties they have secured to be paid on the importation of twenty-five salt pans.—Referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

Mr. LEWIS presented a petition of the pilots navigating the Chesapeake Bay and rivers falling into the same, praying to be authorized to collect pilotage on vessels coming through the said bay or rivers to the District of Columbia.—Referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

APPORTIONMENT BILL.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill to apportion the Representatives according to the third enumeration of the people of the United States.

The question recurring on filling the blank with the number of souls which should entitle to a Representative—

Mr. FISK remarked that the committee (of which he was chairman) who reported the bill, had not agreed on any precise number; but, consulting the opinion of others, rather than his own, he would move to fill the blank with a number not so large as he should wish. The precise amount of the population of the United States, by the present census, could not be ascertained, but a rational estimate might be made. Calculating the ratio of increase for the ten years, since 1800, at the same rate as ten years preceding that period, the present population may be estimated at about seven millions. At a ratio of one Representative for every 45,000, the number of Representatives would then be 155. If, however, that population should reach 7,500,000 souls, as many believed, the number of Representatives would amount to 166. If it should exceed 7,500,000 and reach 8,000,000, as some calculated it would, this number would give 177 Representatives.

The question was taken on filling the blank with the ratio of 45,000 souls, and lost.

For this ratio, 39; against it, 56.

Mr. W. ALSTON said, as no number but 45,000 had been mentioned, and the committee had expressed their disapprobation of that number, he felt inclined to propose a larger one, although he had been willing, in order to unite with others, to take the ratio proposed by Mr. FISK. If the ratio fell to less than 45,000 or 50,000, this body would become too numerous to transact business. If gentlemen would turn their attention to the increase of the ten years previous to 1800, they would be satisfied that, with a parallel increase since that period, a less ratio than 45,000 would afford nearly 200 members. He said he felt convinced that a numerous body would not afford more talent than a smaller body. If the Congressional districts were larger, the chance of obtaining men of talents would be quite as great at least as in smaller districts. One advantage of large districts in the Southern States, he said, would be, to put an end to the mode of electioneering practised in some of them; it would then be impossible for the candidates to ride through them as they now did. Mr. A. said he was clearly of opinion that business could be done as well and as satisfactorily with 100 as with 200 members. He therefore moved to fill the blank in the bill with 50,000.

Mr. BOYD made some remarks in favor of a small ratio. From the terms of the Constitution, making 30,000 the minimum, he drew the inference that the illustrious framers of that instrument had considered 30,000 as the most proper ratio. He adverted, too, to the safety produced by having many counsellors—a small body might be led away to act rashly, by passion, which would not have the same operation on a larger body.

Mr. MACON said he was decidedly of opinion that the ratio ought to be fixed, before the result of the census was known. He had no objection to a moderate increase of the number of members, if they amounted to so many that one side of the House could not hear the other side speak, debate was at end, and the purposes of deliberative legislation defeated. He should have liked the bill better, he said, if it had declared that the House of Representatives should hereafter consist of a certain number of members, and had left the apportionment then to be made according to the population. On the subject of electioneering, he said, it became him at least to say that that portion of the people who sent him here, had not been concerned in it. Whatever might have been the practice elsewhere, so far as concerned his constituents, there had been no going about or haranguing. And, on the subject of electioneering, said he, wherever the people are free, there will be electioneering. It belongs to free Government. Possibly different parts of the country may differ as to the mode. In some, men go themselves about electioneering; in others, their friends do it for them. In some, newspaper publications help an election; in others, they destroy it. In some places, I have heard, the sacred pulpit is not free from it; in others, a divine would be destroyed that would attempt it. There was not more electioneering South, Mr. M. believed, than elsewhere; certain he was that candidates could not there spend the sums of money which he had heard of being spent elsewhere in an election. He concluded by saying he was in favor of a moderate increase of Representatives. He was not afraid that, from a multitude of counsellors, nothing would be done; it was quite as much to be feared from too few that they would act rashly.

Mr. SMILIE, urging the importance of this question, the necessity of mature reflection, and his own doubts as to the proper ratio, moved that the Committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

The Committee rose—53 to 49—and obtained leave to sit again.

FOREIGN COINS.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill from the Senate, to suspend the second section of the act for regulating foreign coins.

The bill went through a Committee of the Whole, and was reported to the House. The question occurred, Shall the bill be read a third time?

The following section, from the act of February 9, 1793, is that proposed to be suspended:

"Sec. 2. Provided always, and be it further enacted, That, at the expiration of three years next ensuing the time when the coinage of gold and silver, agreeably to the act, entitled "An act establishing a Mint, and regulating the coins of the United States," shall commence at the Mint of the United States, (which time shall be announced by the proclamation of the President of the United States,) all foreign gold coins, and all foreign silver coins, except Spanish milled dollars and parts of such dollars, shall cease to be a legal tender, as aforesaid."

Mr. ROOR objected to the passage of the bill. By an act of April, 1806, the above section had been suspended for three years from that date, which period of suspension had long ago expired. Why, he asked, now make that a tender (not by tale, but by weight) which had not been so for nearly two years past? He said he certainly should not give his vote for what would subject our citizens to so much inconvenience. Was it to provide for coin in the banks, which could not otherwise be disposed of unless at a discount, or sold to be recoined? If foreign gold was made a legal tender, from the want of means of ascertaining its value, much perplexity would be produced. Every farmer or mechanic did not possess scales for weighing it, and, if they did, probably had not sufficient acquaintance with it to know to how much so many pennyweights and grains amounted. Besides, he said, it would be flattering to him, as a citizen, to see the emblems of his own country circulating among us in preference to those of a foreign Power.

Mr. MITCHELL said he was one of those who thought the bill of no great public moment, but he had rather it should pass than not. He stated the reason why this section had been heretofore suspended, namely: that the Mint had not, as had been expected, thrown into circulation a sufficient quantity of coin for the current exchange, the failure being produced first by a want of skill, perhaps, in the coiners, and, subsequently, by a want of bullion to work upon. Besides, when our dollars were coined, it was known to every one that there was a prodigious exportation to Great Britain and the East Indies; and, when it arrived in Great Britain, it was well known that, as from the most scrupulous honesty, the United States' dollars contained less alloy than the silver coins of other nations, they were melted down by the silversmiths for plate and for other purposes. If it was expedient to allow foreign coins to circulate, as they now do, by common consent; for the purpose of avoiding litigation, he was willing to make them a legal tender. The law had already sufficiently guarded, by various provisions, which Mr. R. read, against the circulation of spurious, or any other than good coin. With such guards of its purity, the alarm of his colleague was quite groundless. The coins were now circulating de facto; the bill proposed merely, when good, to establish a legality of tender in relation to them.

Mr. SOUTHARD was in favor of the bill. He viewed the decision on the bill as hanging on that of a question of policy; whether it was expedient to permit the circulation of any other coin than American and Spanish milled dollars? He thought a legal circulation of gold coin would be more advantageous than otherwise, and therefore he was in favor of the bill.

Mr. BACON said that, on the general principle, he could not see why foreign coin should be made a legal tender, because banks could collect and have it recoined. But, at the present moment, under the particular circumstances growing out of the non-renewal of the charter of the Bank of the United States, which he understood was winding up its affairs, and had, of course, heavy demands upon the State banks; and, under the pressure produced by this demand, or an increased pressure created by the bank to serve their own purposes, if foreign coin were not made a legal tender, the shock upon the banks, and through them upon the community, would be very severe. Mr. B. said he was not, in the present crisis of affairs, inclined to give to the Bank of the United States, a facility to augment the pressure which really existed. These considerations might not be entitled to weight, but to allow time for further consideration of them, he moved that the bill lie upon the table till to-morrow.

Mr. BURWELL said, in his opinion, the gentleman who was last up, had taken a correct view of the subject. As far as he had any information, the Bank of the United States pressed very much upon the State banks, refusing to receive gold coin in payment for their notes. Whether the law passed or not would have no material effect upon the country at large. Foreign gold coin was already circulating, and every one, who had a debt due to him, was willing to close it by receiving that coin in payment. But, Mr. B. said, he did believe that the crisis alluded to was one which deserved the consideration of the House; and he believed, by passing such a law, that they would enable the State banks to stand the storm gathering over them.

His impression was that the Bank of the United States, to obtain the renewal of the charter, would make every effort to enlist in their views all the moneyed institutions of the country; and if any one showed a disposition to oppose the renewal of their charter, that it would receive no quarter from the Bank of the United States.

DECEMBER, 1810.

Apportionment of Representation.

H. OF R.

The quantity of foreign gold coin in the country could not be considerable, but might be an object to the State banks. To those gentlemen who wished to sustain the State banks, the object of this bill must be very acceptable. He called the attention of the House to a paragraph he had seen in the newspapers, stating that, from the single port of Philadelphia, in the last year, there had been exported between two and three millions of silver dollars; and inferred thence the probable scarcity of United States' coins. Mr. B. was in favor of the bill's lying for consideration.

Mr. SEYBERT said that, for the information of the House, he would state that the case which had been supposed as likely to exist, had really occurred. The Bank of the United States had pressed upon the State banks, refusing to receive in payment foreign gold coin, which had been tendered, unless at a reduced value. He was, therefore, of opinion that the bill ought to pass.

The bill was ordered to lie on the table—yeas 50, nays 43.

FRIDAY, December 14.

Another new member, to wit: from Massachusetts, ABIAH BIGELOW, elected to supply the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of William Stedman, appeared, was qualified, and took his seat.

Mr. SOUTHARD, from the Committee of Revision and Unfinished Business, made a report in part; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, to whom was referred the petitions of Isaac Clason, and Archibald McCall, presented a bill authorizing the issuing of debentures in certain cases; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Wednesday next.

On motion of Mr. GOLD,

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of providing, by law, for ascertaining and settling the controverted boundary of the public land, at West Point, in the State of New York; and that they have leave to report by bill, or otherwise.

Mr. GOLD, Mr. GRAY, Mr. WINN, Mr. ALLEN, and Mr. FRANKLIN, were appointed a committee, pursuant to the said resolution.

On motion of Mr. P. B. PORTER,

Resolved, That the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures be instructed to inquire into the expediency of removing the office of the Collector of customs for the District of Buffalo, in the State of New York, from the village of Buffalo, to Black Rock.

On motion of Mr. NEWTON, the House resumed the consideration of the bill to suspend the second section of the act regulating foreign coins.

Mr. QUINCY moved a recommitment of the bill to a select committee, on the ground that it would, he apprehended, as it at present stood, go to admit the gold coins of foreign Powers to circulate at their nominal, instead of their real value; by which means certain coins would become a tender at their nominal value, which were not worth so much by four cents in the dollar. To the principle of the bill, he said, there could be no objection; and he only wished that a committee should be appointed to examine the operation of the bill and ascertain whether it would be as he suspected or not.

After a few observations from Messrs. MITCHELL and BACON on the subject, the bill was referred to a committee of five.

Mr. QUINCY, Mr. MITCHELL, Mr. NEWTON, Mr. SEYBERT, and Mr. PITKIN, were appointed the said committee.

Mr. SHEFFEY presented the memorial of Simeon Knight, stating that he, whilst acting as a paymaster in the Army of the United States, had, under the authority of the late Secretary of War, General Henry Dearborn, paid to Brigadier General James Wilkinson the sum of $1,450, being the amount of extra rations allowed him as commander of a separate post whilst at New Orleans; but that on presenting his vouchers for settlement at the War Office, payment of the same was withheld; and praying relief.—Referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. VAN HORN presented a memorial from the first and second chambers of the City Council of Washington, praying for certain alterations in their charter.—Referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

APPORTIONMENT BILL.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, 51 to 44, on the bill for apportioning the Representatives according to the third enumeration of the people of the United States.

The question pending when the Committee rose yesterday was on filling the blank for the ratio of apportionment with 50,000.

This question was lost, yeas 26.

The question having been taken on filling the blank for the number to entitle to one Representative with 43,000, and lost—

Mr. FISK said it would be gratifying to him if any member would state his reasons in favor of a small number. They were now, he said, legislating on a great question; one as materially affecting the rights of the people as any which would come before them during the present session. He had been disappointed in the results of several questions which had been decided in Committee; for, from the best calculation he could make from the last returns, the ratio of one for every forty thousand would yield an aggregate number of upward of one hundred and eighty members; more than could be accommodated in this room, a larger number than was admissible under a rule, mentioned yesterday, viz: that more should not be admitted than could hear each other speak. If we increase the number according to the standard which seems to be considered proper by some, to what extent will it not carry us? If we once establish the rule that the Representatives shall be so apportioned as that no State shall be deprived of a Representative, we shall, for the next ten years, have at least two hundred and twenty; and, for the ten years following, perhaps three hundred and fifty. Did any gentleman wish such extension of their number? How disproportionate would it be to the other branch of the Legislature, from which it was already remarked that every measure of interest, every measure called energetic, originated. Numbers were not important in the National Legislature, the members of which were deputed to transact national, not local business; not to guard personal rights or property, but the interest of the nation. And were not an hundred or an hundred and fifty members, Mr. F. asked, as competent to transact business as double that number? He had, on this question, no views but such as resulted from a desire to fix on the most proper ratio. Independent of the representation of any of the Territories, if erected into States, if the ratio of forty thousand were fixed on, it would, at the lowest calculation, give one hundred and eighty-seven members; and, if the present ratio of thirty-three thousand were continued, there would be two hundred and twenty or two hundred and thirty members in the thirteenth Congress.

Mr. BOYD said he felt himself called upon to make some remarks, though he did not expect anything he could say would make any great impression. The argument of the incapacity of the House to contain a large number of members ought, he said, to have no effect. The room was built for their accommodation, and if it should prove, hereafter, too small, could be changed or altered. The Constitution, he apprehended, had intimated that thirty thousand was the proper ratio, and that so it ought to remain, until the people saw fit to amend the Constitution. He denied the right of Congress, by any act of theirs, to take away from a State one or more of the Representatives which it now has. He believed it would be contrary to the Constitution.

Mr. GOLD considered this bill as a very important one, as fixing the construction to be put on a provision of the Constitution. While, on the one hand, it might be admitted that business would be in general better done by a small number of Representatives, yet, on the other hand, there were important considerations in favor of a large number, as gentlemen would find by referring to the discussions at the period of the adoption of the Constitution. It was then feared by some that the representation of so great a people would be too small. If gentlemen would refer to a number of papers, drawn up by an association of gentlemen, at that time, and published under the title of "The Federalist," they would find various arguments used to induce the Legislature to make the representation full; so that, at that period, no apprehensions had existed of the Representatives becoming too numerous. On the contrary, it was supposed that the public confidence would be impaired by having a small delegation. In adverting to the relaxed state of the Union, and how much it was exposed to be shook by attempts to weaken it, it was supposed that public confidence would be inspired, and general satisfaction given, by the selection of a large number. It was true, Mr. G. said, that representation might swell so much as to operate to the exclusion of legislation; but the House of Representatives would not, even if the present ratio were retained, be so numerous as many other legislative bodies in the Union. He had no objection to increasing the numbers of the House of Representatives to such an amount as would permit public business to be done with facility. Gentlemen might differ as to the precise ratio; but, while they argued in favor of a small number, from the inconvenience of a large delegation, he hoped they would conceive with him that well-grounded apprehensions might be entertained of the evils which would result from its being too small.

Mr. PORTER expressed his belief that Mr. FISK had miscalculated the amount of the present population of the United States. He was also against so large a ratio as forty thousand, as, in all probability, Rhode Island would then have a fraction of thirty-nine thousand. He said, he could not conceive the necessity of acting on the subject at this time, or why gentlemen should be afraid of knowing what was the actual population of each State. He was himself in favor of the old ratio; for that which was proposed would probably deprive Rhode Island of one of her Representatives, and a State might as well be unrepresented as to have but one Delegate. It was impossible for one Representative to be omnipresent, and the interests of the State might sometimes suffer from his absence. The State of Delaware, well represented as she was, having but one Representative in Congress, was unrepresented half her time. The ratio of forty thousand, he apprehended, would not add one to the present number of the House of Representatives.

Mr. MITCHILL said he was in favor of the largest number proposed; and, not having been able to obtain that, he should vote for the largest on which a majority could agree. In the district represented by his colleague (Mr. MUMFORD) and himself, there were probably one hundred and twenty thousand souls, and yet he had not heard any murmuring that they were not adequately represented. Mr. M. said he was guided in his decision on this subject by considerations of various kinds; one of which was, the increased expense of Government from an enlarged representation. If gentlemen served, honoris gratia, as in the British Government, he said he should not have the same objection. There was there no great expense, and but a comparatively small attendance, the number necessary to form a quorum being much smaller. But, when it was taken into consideration that every Representative here drew a quantum of the public money, it became a serious question, on economical considerations, whether they ought to make so large a draught on the public funds as an increased representation would require. In a Government watching its treasury with so much care, and having but two modes of procuring revenue—from commerce and the public lands—they ought to be cautious how they consumed the finances of the country.

Another consideration in favor of a large ratio, Mr. M. said, was this: that this body was now, in his judgment, quite as numerous as was consistent with a distinct performance of the public business. He meant no reflection on the House when he remarked, that it now required all the skill of the Speaker to keep order, and as much exertion of the lungs as possible for a speaker to make himself heard. If this assembly became more multitudinous, he could not see how it was possible, under all the restrictions that could be devised, that public business could be performed. He believed an assembly of persons, however individually respectable and dignified, when they got together, under the influence of warm feelings, or party prejudices and excitements, would exhibit such a scene of disorder as to reflect no credit on themselves. A restriction to the number of the members composing the House of Representatives, would conduce extremely to the dignity of that body, to the dispatch of business, and to the comfort of their constituents.

Congress, Mr. M. said, did not convene here to legislate on all the subjects of the rights of citizens. Our Government is, he contended, a peculiar piece of machinery, an imperium in imperio. The Representatives to Congress left behind them Legislatures, whose province it was to take care of the personal rights and the rights of property of our citizens. With these concerns, said Mr. M., we have nothing to do. We meet here under a Constitution expressly framed and devised for legislating on select subjects, which, on account of the generality of their nature, could not be confided to the several States. When, then, we consider the narrow grounds we have to legislate on, that our great privileges are left at home, we shall be convinced that there is no occasion that this body should be as numerous as if we were concerned in the great questions of property and right, which are secured by the Constitution, under the guardianship of the State Legislatures, and of the courts for the furthering of justice. If I were to quote a precedent of a Legislature for commanding influence, and for wisdom and sagacity in carrying us through an arduous contest whilst struggling for our liberties, I should quote the Old Congress—limited in number, but remarkable for the honesty and fidelity, with which they performed what a more numerous body could not have accomplished. And, if I wished to cite an instance of the evils to be dreaded from a numerous assembly, I should quote the National Convention of France, where representatives, assembling in great number, exhibited such a spectacle of disorder as I hope we shall never, by a multitude of counsellors, run the risk of imitating. The great object is, that the people should be satisfied with their representation in this House, and that they should be perfectly informed of the character as to honesty, probity, and intelligence, which their Representative possesses. Now, sir, it is my opinion that if, from every forty thousand souls, the people select such a Representative as from his property is not likely to be swerved from his duty by the hope of office, if they are secure of his integrity, and satisfied of his capacity to perform the functions delegated to him, they will be as well satisfied that forty thousand souls should be represented by one, as that every thirty thousand should be entitled to a Representative. It is not in proportion to the number of legislators that advantages accrue to a nation, but in proportion to the weight of character of such persons. And in free Governments, predicated on such principles as ours, it is to be presumed that the people will choose such persons; and for this reason, that, in considering the theory of our Constitution, we must first suppose the electors are intelligent, and, in the next place, that they are virtuous. If these be not two pillars on which the Constitution rests, in its true theory, I know not what that Constitution is.

Under the impressions which he entertained on this subject, Mr. M. hoped, before the question was taken on the number forty thousand, that gentlemen would reflect on the serious consequences of rejecting this number and taking a smaller. Under the conviction that a representation on the ratio of one for every forty thousand would be entitled to the full confidence of the people, and under the serious apprehension that from an increased representation great detriment would result to the public business, he felt himself compelled to vote for the number now proposed.

The question on forty thousand was taken, and carried—yeas 78. The Committee of the Whole rose and reported the bill, and the question occurred of concurring with the report of the Committee.

Mr. PITKIN said that he had not expected that a bill of so much importance would have progressed so far, and gone through the Committee of the Whole in so rapid a manner as this had. What, he asked of the House, was settled by the passage of this bill? Nothing was, or could be settled by the present Congress, unless the returns were made from the different States of the number of inhabitants in each State, before the bill became a law; for Congress alone could designate and specify the number of Representatives which each State should send. The laws heretofore passed, designating the number of Representatives, had, at the same time, declared the ratio, and specified the number of Representatives of each State. Congress alone were competent to decide on the legality of the returns, and on their act alone could the State Legislatures proceed. Mr. P. presumed no member would say that it should be left to the Executive, or any Department of the Government, to say how many Representatives each State should send to Congress. The present Congress might fix the ratio as they pleased, but it would not be obligatory on the next Congress, who could, and undoubtedly would, modify or reverse it as they should think proper. This bill, was, therefore, premature, and, in fact, would not settle the principle which it proposed to decide. He was, therefore, on this ground, opposed to the passage of this bill; and he believed the inconvenience of deciding it now would be greater than if the business were to rest until after the returns were made.

With respect to the number by which the people of the United States should be represented for the ensuing ten years, Mr. P. said, he would agree that there was a considerable diversity of opinion, not only in this House, but in the nation. But he had been not a little astonished to hear the arguments of some gentlemen, evidently inconsistent with the principles of the Constitution. This is a Government of the people, and, as population increases, representation should also increase, in a certain proportion. This, Mr. P. considered one of the first maxims of Government. Gentlemen had asked whether the most important laws had not generally originated in the other branch of the Legislature, and had thence drawn the inference that a small number was best. If this argument proved anything, what was it? Why, as energy was the great principle, and as the Government of Bonaparte was, probably, the most energetic in the world, that his Government was, therefore, better than ours. Our Government, said Mr. P., is not a Government (in this branch especially) of energy. It is a Government of confidence; and when our population is double its present amount, the people will not be satisfied with the same number of Representatives as is now fixed. I was, therefore, sir, not a little surprised to see so many gentlemen vote for a ratio of fifty thousand, when, by fixing on that ratio, even our present number would be lessened. I ask whether this accords with the principles of republican Government? I apprehend not, sir. It is very well known, that the Constitution, when adopted, was a matter of compromise among the States; and that, in consequence of this compromise, the States, which were before in some measure independent of each other, sacrificed a part of their rights, agreeing to be represented in general Congress, but in a certain way. I do apprehend, sir, that, as respects fixing the ratio, it will be, at present, most for the interest of the United States, and our best policy, so to arrange it as that no State of the Union should be deprived of any part of its representation on this floor. This principle, at some future period, perhaps, will not be the one which will, or ought to govern this House; because inequalities are constantly arising, and new States are forming to the West and South, which, in course of time, would increase the representation in this House in such a degree as, at some distant day, to deprive some of the old thirteen States of a representation on this floor. But, whenever the time comes when the old States will be placed, in some measure, in a degraded situation, what will be their feelings? It will be a fruitful cause of jealousy, and will add another to the sources which already too much prevail.

I think, therefore, that gentlemen, when they reflect upon it, will be of opinion that the present is the most correct rule, that they will do nothing which shall tend to divide the States into sections of North, East, West, or South. I do not like these distinctions at all; they will come soon enough without our seeking them; and I fear they will come too soon. If the ratio be now fixed by which some States will be deprived of a part of their present representation, it will tend to excite jealousies which it will be difficult to allay. These States will feel themselves degraded; right or wrong, they will suppose that their influence is diminishing in the councils of the nation. I apprehend that, by fixing the ratio at forty thousand, this will be the case with three or four States. Unless there be some imperious necessity for this course, I ask gentlemen, whether it be wise or politic to pursue it? The great family of the nation was originally composed of thirteen branches, all of whom contributed stock to it. When the time comes when these branches see their members on this floor lopped off, very unpleasant feelings will be excited. The ratio of forty thousand, depriving some States of a part of their present representation, will probably leave them large fractions, which must remain for ten years unrepresented. I am willing to fix on such a ratio as shall place every State at least upon its present footing in this House. I apprehend, when the returns are received, that the ratio of thirty-seven or thirty-eight thousand will attain this object. In ten years more it may be politic to fix on such a ratio as shall take from some States one or more Representatives; but at that time such a course will be more readily acquiesced in than now.

As to the expense of an additional representation, Mr. P. said it ought not to be thought of a single moment. Whilst we have a representative Government, expense will attend it. In the State Legislatures, some of whose branches contain from two to five hundred members, no inconvenience of this kind had been found which had induced them to change the representation. Neither, Mr. P. said, could he consent to the argument that the matters which came before Congress were of such small importance compared with those which came before the State Legislatures, that therefore the number of Representatives ought to be diminished. The acts of Congress were vastly more important; they went to effect the liberty and property of every man in the nation, and to an infinite extent almost. That argument therefore had no weight.

Mr. P. concluded by hoping that the House would fix on some ratio between thirty-three and forty thousand, keeping in view State feelings as well as the principle that representation should gradually increase with population.

Mr. QUINCY said that the agitation of this question at the present moment had taken him as much by surprise as it had the gentleman from Connecticut. He had no idea that a question so pregnant with interest would be hurried through the House in this way. His object in rising was to obtain a postponement of the question till some time in the next week, for the consideration of a point, which to his mind was important. He objected to the bill on the principle that it would be a violation of the Constitution to pass it. It went to establish a ratio which, in its effect, must be abortive. The Constitution says:

"Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union, according to their respective numbers, which shall be determined by adding to the whole number of free persons, including those bound to service for a term of years, and, excluding Indians not taxed, three-fifths of all other persons. The actual enumeration shall be made within three years after the first meeting of the Congress of the United States, and within every subsequent term of ten years, in such manner as they shall by law direct. The number of Representatives shall not exceed one for every thirty thousand, but each State shall have at least one Representative."

The Constitution then had specifically made it the duty of the House to apportion the representation of each State according to its respective numbers. Was it not, he asked, infinitely absurd and a direct violation of the Constitution, to apportion the representation before these numbers were known? When the Constitution had made it a duty to do a thing according to a standard prescribed, would they do that thing before that standard could be in possession of the House? Suppose that in 1791, before the numbers of the States were known, Congress had undertaken to fix the ratio of representation—would not the Hall have rung with the exclamations that it was a violation of the Constitution? And how would this bill, Mr. Q. asked, less violate the Constitution than such an act would have done? For, as to the numbers to be ascertained by the present census, Congress were as little competent to decide as they were before any census was taken. This was the ground on which he objected to the bill as unconstitutional, and which he wished an opportunity thoroughly to examine. He therefore moved that the bill lie on the table.

Mr. FISK said, it had been deemed desirable to fix the ratio before the numbers of each State were ascertained, so as to avoid the difficulty which would arise from the fractions, and to afford an accommodation to the State Legislatures, which would be in session before the next meeting of Congress. It would indeed be necessary to pass a law declaring the number of Representatives to be sent by each State; but that would be a mere matter of form, if the ratio were previously ascertained by law.

Mr. F. treated the idea of this bill's being unconstitutional, as altogether unwarranted by fact; for it did not fix the apportionment, but merely the ratio, according to which the Representatives should be apportioned among the States when their respective numbers were known.

Mr. F. observed that it would seem that Congress had heretofore entertained a livelier idea of the importance of a numerous representation than the people, for, as far as the latter had acted, they had shown themselves averse to a large delegation. Mr. F. read the following paragraph:

"ART. 1. After the first enumeration required by the first article of the Constitution, there shall be one representative for every thirty thousand, until the number shall amount to one hundred, after which the proportion shall be so regulated by Congress that there shall be not less than one hundred Representatives, or less than one Representative for every forty thousand persons, until the number of Representatives shall amount to two hundred; after which the proportion shall be so regulated by Congress, that there shall be not less than two hundred Representatives, nor more than one Representative for every fifty thousand persons."

This he said was one of the two articles of the Constitution which had not been ratified. What was the inference but that the people were opposed to an enlarged representation?

It has been argued, as an objection to the bill, that the next Congress would not be bound by it, as they might repeal or amend it. Did not this argument apply with equal force against all legislation? It might with equal propriety be said that the apportionment act of 1802 was not obligatory on the several Congresses which succeeded it, because it might have been repealed. But as they did not see fit to repeal it, neither did he suppose the next Congress would see fit to repeal this, if passed into a law.

Mr. PIRKIN said he was only very sorry that the gentleman from New York did not see the difference between this and ordinary laws, which take effect immediately after their passage; whilst this law could have no effect until 1813, and was a dead letter until another law was passed to give it life. No State Legislature could with safety proceed to district a State according to the ratio prescribed by this bill, because it could not take effect till the next session of Congress. Gentlemen would find that the apportionment laws heretofore enacted had not been passed until the session preceding the 4th of March on which they were to have effect; and he could see no possible reason for changing the usual course.

Mr. WRIGHT was in favor of postponing, and decidedly opposed to the bill. He was against it, because it proposed to bestow on others a power residing in Congress. If this law were to pass, could the Secretary of State be authorized to declare the number of Representatives to which each State was entitled? Could Congress transfer to him legislative power, and authorize him to declare of how many members this body should consist? He presumed not. The power was vested in Congress, and not in the Secretary of State. But gentlemen were desirous now to fix the number of souls which should entitle to a Representative—and why? That the State Legislatures, understanding the number of Representatives to which they are entitled from knowing the census, may proceed to district their States, in anticipation of the law to be passed by Congress. But their acts would not be conclusive, because Congress might change the ratio, and they would have to undo all they had done. Mr. W. hoped that this business would be postponed, until, as heretofore, Congress should be possessed of all the information of which the nature of the case would admit. When the census was received from the President of the United States they would be much better able to act than now. In this case, Mr. W. said he held himself imperiously bound to follow the steps of his predecessors. He held it a correct maxim in general, that the practice of to-day should be the precedent for to-morrow. Why need they decide this business immediately? There were yet some months in the session, and time enough to reflect on the subject. Why legislate by halves? If this law were passed, Mr. W. asked, was it perfect? Did it declare to how many Representatives each State should be entitled? He said he could refer to cases in which errors had occurred in the census; and it was in the power of the House alone to correct any errors which might have escaped the Secretary of State. In Maryland a mistake had occurred in the last enumeration, of thirty or forty thousand souls. He believed that a great portion of the district comprising Cecil and Hartford counties had been omitted; and he recollected perfectly well that the error was corrected; and, by turning his eye to the proceedings of that day, he could see other errors. He wished, when the House acted, that they should do it understandingly, and with all the evidence before them of which the case was susceptible. He hoped the bill would be postponed until the returns of the census were received in the usual mode. He had no object in view but to exercise understandingly the functions delegated to Congress. Had the apportionment, he asked, ever before been fixed before the census was known? No; and he demanded of honorable gentlemen some reason why a new course should now be adopted. As to the idea of a conflict among the States for the ratio which should best suit their respective numbers, he should feel no difficulty on that score; he should be strongly inclined to favor the small States. He should be strongly disposed to give to Delaware and Rhode Island as large a representation as possible. The large States had so preponderating an influence in relation to them, that their rights ought to be much respected indeed.

Mr. W. said he was in favor of postponement, because he would not delegate to the Secretary of State, or to any other authority, the powers belonging to Congress; and because he was unwilling to do now what Congress thought it their duty not to do heretofore.

Mr. W. ALSTON opposed the postponement. He was as loth to depart from old practices as the gentleman from Maryland, if those practices were found to be good. But when they proved inconvenient or useless, it was certainly right to depart from them. What, then, had experience taught them on this subject? Why, that if the ratio was not fixed before the census was known, great inconvenience would result to many States. Congress, at their last session, being apprized of the circumstance, had in their law directed that complete returns should be made to the Secretary of State by the first of March next. It was well known that, if they did not fix the ratio before the first of March, they would not be able to fix it after; when the ratio was fixed, however, the apportionment would not be the work of an hour. If it became necessary to deprive a State of a Representative, he asked whether it would not be more palatable that it should be done now than after the census was known? The State deprived of a Representative could not complain; the ratio would affect it in the same proportion, whether it gave or took a member. That argument, therefore, was entitled to no consideration. Mr. A. expressed his surprise that the small States appeared to be opposed to a large ratio; for, if it would be an advantage on any side, it would be decidedly in favor of the small States. He thought, indeed, that the Representatives of the large States, in voting for a large ratio, had shown great magnanimity and liberality.

Mr. WRIGHT said the gentleman's intentions to the small States were benevolent indeed, but he was a little mistaken as to the comparative advantages to the small States of a large or small ratio. Virginia, in losing one Representative, would lose one-twentieth of her weight in this House. Rhode Island, under the same circumstances, would lose one-half. The sacrifice of a member would be unimportant to a large State; but to a small one, it would be important indeed. There were the strongest reasons on earth why they should wait patiently and see the returns before they acted, and thus have an opportunity to do the small States that justice to which they are entitled.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH was in favor of postponement, and was sorry to see the bill attempted to be hurried through. Gentlemen had not maturely considered the subject, and, on reflection, would be convinced that their votes were, if not a direct, at least an indirect, violation of the Constitution. This was premature legislation on what properly belonged to the next Congress, and which, act on it as they might, would unquestionably come before Congress at their next session. If it should be found that the ratio agreed on operated unfavorably on the numbers of any State or States, they would be anxious for a reconsideration of the subject. It would be immaterial whether the subject should be brought up by a bill de novo, or by a bill to repeal this, if it should indeed become a law; the ardor of discussion would be the same in either case. If this be admitted, the only argument in favor of the bill is done away. The Constitution having directed that apportionment should be made accordingly to the whole census, Mr. G. said that he could not see how Congress could fix it before they knew what that census was. He did not know that every gentleman on the floor was ignorant of any of the returns; some might be already apprized of the returns of their own State. Each one made estimates no doubt, in his own mind, as to the probable result; and, for himself, Mr. G. said he had been endeavoring to make some sort of a calculation; and if the bill passed, and the ratio should prove unfavorable to the numbers of the State which he had the honor to represent, he should feel himself bound to move a repeal of the law; and they would have the whole discussion over again. There was another reason, Mr. G. said, which had some weight on his mind: that it would be best to adopt such a ratio, after a knowledge of the respective numbers, as should leave each State the smallest possible surplus. Suppose several States were, after passing this bill, to be found to have a fraction of 35,000. He believed gentlemen would agree that it would not be proper to leave them unrepresented. The idea of a small State deriving advantage from a large ratio was entirely erroneous. For instance, by a large ratio, Delaware might keep only her present Representative, while, by a small ratio, she might perhaps have two. Upon the whole, Mr. G. said it would be best to leave the subject to the next Congress, who alone could act on it correctly, and whose act alone could guide the States in their proceedings.

Mr. TALLMADGE thought this was premature legislating and wasting the time of the House on this topic. He referred to the course pursued by former Congresses, which was quite different from that now proposed. There could be no other rational way of construing the Constitution but by saying that the enumeration must be made, and the census be before the House, before they determined what the ratio should be. All the benefit which could be derived from passing the present bill would be that the States, perceiving what the ratio was, might proceed to lay out the States into districts. But, if this law would be repealable, and all that was done might be undone, what possible advantage would there be in passing the law? This law would not only be useless, but really worse than nothing. He was, therefore, most decidedly in favor of postponement till Monday; and he thought it was already very fully ascertained, that all the members of the House had not given the subject that important consideration which it merited. In the Committee of the Whole, it had seemed as if it was going through almost with the rapidity of an unanimous vote. By this time, he was sure, however, that it had at least become a question whether this law was proper to pass at all, and the opinions of many on the subject had certainly changed as to the ratio. He, therefore, hoped the bill would be postponed till Monday, and then that it would be further postponed indefinitely.

The question on the bill's lying on the table was carried—65 to 43.

And on motion, the House adjourned until Monday.

MONDAY, December 17.

Another member, to wit: from New York, JOHN NICHOLSON, appeared, and took his seat in the House.

Mr. POYDRAS presented a petition of the Legislature of the Territory of Orleans, praying to have the said Territory erected into an independent State, to enjoy the same privileges and immunities enjoyed by the other States of the Union.—Referred to Mr. MACON, Mr. CLAY, Mr. HEISTER, Mr. NICHOLSON, Mr. BARRY, Mr. BIGELOW, and Mr. WINN; and that they have leave to report by bill, or otherwise.

The SPEAKER laid before the House two reports of the Secretary of the Navy, one of moneys transferred during the last recess of Congress, from certain branches of expenditure in the Navy Department to other branches of expenditure in the same Department; the other, a view of the state and disposition at this time of the Navy of the United States; which were read, and referred to the Committee on the Naval Establishment.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury, of the amount of duties and drawbacks on goods imported into and exported from the United States during the years 1807, 1808, 1809.—Ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. EPPES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, presented a bill to fix the compensation of the additional Assistant Postmaster General; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

On motion of Mr. MORROW,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be directed to consider and report on the expediency of making provision, by law, for laying out and making the two roads provided for by a treaty concluded at Brownstown, on the twenty-fifth day of November, 1808, and for the disposal of the public lands, the Indian title to which was extinguished by the said treaty; and that the committee have leave to report by bill, or otherwise.

Mr. BASSETT said, that it would be recollected that at the last session of Congress a report had been made by the Navy Committee, on the subject of a navy hospital, which report had not been acted upon. This subject, Mr. B. said, he did then and now believe to be one of great importance to the United States, and which ought to claim the serious attention of Congress. To bring it again before them, he moved to refer the papers relating to the subject to the Committee on the Naval Establishment. Agreed to.

YAZOO SETTLERS.

Mr. TROUP said, it would be recollected that, by the law of 1807, the President was authorized to remove by force, from the public lands, persons claiming under any other titles than such as were derived from the United States. He had no doubt but this law had been duly executed; but he was desirous of obtaining all the information he could acquire on this subject, and therefore moved a resolution to the following effect:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to lay before this House any information he may have touching any settlement, contrary to law, on the public lands in the Mississippi Territory; by whom, at what periods and extent, and what measures had been taken to remove such intruders on the public lands.

Mr. RHEA wished to see the resolution more general in its application, and therefore moved to strike upon the words "in the Mississippi Territory." He could not see any reason why this Territory alone should be included.

Mr. McKee could not see the propriety of calling upon the Secretary of the Treasury for the names, &c., of all unauthorized settlers on the public lands; for it was well understood that some settlements had been made on the public lands in Louisiana Territory, perhaps, which did not require the interposition of the Government—a proposition being now pending before the Committee of Public Lands for opening an office for the sale of the lands thus settled.

Mr. Troup said, his object was to obtain information as to certain lands in the Mississippi Territory; the title to which the United States had, on the one hand, declared to be vested in them, and the Supreme Court, on the other hand, had declared not to be in the United States, but in those persons claiming under the Yazoo speculation. This decision must either be acquiesced in or resisted by the United States. If acquiesced in, it must be in one of two ways. The United States must either permit the Supreme Court to execute its judgment in the ordinary course, or must permit quiet possession to be taken by the claimants. Whether they acquiesced in one way or the other, two distinct great rights were affected: first, the great interest of the whole people of the United States, claiming equal and common proprietorship of the soil; and, second, the great interest of the people of Georgia, to whom the United States had agreed to pay $1,250,000, out of the proceeds of the sales of these lands. If the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States was acquiesced in, the State of Georgia would be thus defrauded both of her land and money. But if the Government of the United States would not submit to this decision, but resist it to the last extremity, what course could be taken but to employ the whole military force of the United States to eject all persons not claiming under the authority of the United States? If that description of persons claiming the territory, in whose behalf a decision was lately made, taking forcible possession, should obtain such a footing as to be able to oppose to the authority of the United States a considerable force, there would perhaps be no alternative but for the United States to remove them by an exertion of its military power, or tamely to acquiesce in the lawless aggression. It was from these considerations that he was desirous to have information on the subject of the late settlements there.

Mr. Rhea was of opinion that the decision of the Supreme Court, and the questions arising from it, might have been left on their own bottom for the present; and assigned several reasons why he thought general information was desirable on this subject.

Mr. Rhea's motion to strike out the words, "in the Mississippi Territory," was negative—50 to 45, and the resolution then passed without opposition.

APPORTIONMENT BILL.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill for the apportionment of Representatives among the several States, according to the third enumeration.

The question pending was on concurrence with Committee of the Whole, in filling the blank with "40,000."

Mr. STURGES rose and said before he should sit down he intended to make a motion, which would supersede the one before the House. He agreed with several gentlemen who preceded him, that the subject now under consideration, was of the most serious importance to the United States. He regretted, that there had heretofore appeared a disinclination to deliberate upon it in proportion to its importance. He thought there had been a partial view in one respect, taken of this subject, which, if extended, might be useful in their decision. He considered it as almost a self-evident proposition that by establishing a large ratio, the large States would be gainers, at the expense of the small ones. He had prepared a statement, as to the apparent relative interest of the different States, and their fractions at the census in 1800, which, although not perfectly accurate, yet was sufficiently so for his purpose. Virginia had a fraction of about 16,000, North Carolina about 29,000. Pennsylvania, he understood, had a small one. Those of Massachusetts and New York he had not ascertained. The States he had mentioned may be considered as the large States. Two of them, New York and Pennsylvania, are not only large, but, owing to peculiarly favorable circumstances, have and will continue to increase in their population. Whether they are all progressing rapidly in their population or not, they are, so far as respects a preponderance in our councils, interested in fixing a large ratio. The States of Kentucky, Tennessee, and Ohio, although small at present, yet, owing to a variety of favorable circumstances, such as the quality of their soil, their geographical situation, and other encouragements to emigrations, must for fifty or one hundred years rapidly increase in population; they are also, therefore, interested in a large ratio. But look at some of the small States, which have been, and will continue to be, nearly stationary. Georgia at the last census, had a fraction of about 6,000, South Carolina 23,000, Delaware 31,000, New Jersey 9,000, Connecticut 20,000, Rhode Island 9,000. If the last States mentioned have not increased much in their population, as is generally supposed, the probability is, if the ratio now proposed, viz: 40,000, is agreed to, that each of them must lose one or more of their Representatives. In looking at the justice of such a ratio, compare, for instance, the State of Delaware with that of Virginia. The former, as she had before, will now have a fraction of 31,000. Supposing Virginia has the same, then the consequence will be, that nearly half of the population of Delaware will be unrepresented, and only a 22d part of that of Virginia. And here he said he would notice a statement or argument of a gentleman (Mr. W.

DECEMBER, 1810.

H. OF R:

ALSTON,) from North Carolina, the other day, who said a large ratio was in favor of the small States, and against the large ones; for, said he, if Delaware have a fraction of 39 000, and Virginia have the same, the former State will have half of their population unrepresented, and the latter State only a 22d part; therefore a large ratio is in favor of the small States. He thought it unnecessary to make any comment on this reasoning, and therefore would leave it.

Mr. S. observed, that he had said the apparent interest of the large States might be for a large ratio, but he would now address himself to a sense of the real interest of those gentlemen who represented the large States. He said it was in human nature, (and from that only could we reason) "when men feel power, they forget right." Was it to be expected, that the large States on this floor, having the power to control the small ones, will not be tempted to sacrifice their interests? What will be the consequence? Those whose rights are not regarded will soon become uneasy; jealousies will arise; the harmony of the members of this Family will be endangered; the perpetuity of this Union will be hazarded. He therefore, again appealed to the real sense which gentlemen felt respecting their true interest. He observed, that it had been said, the small States have a security from their equal representation in the Senate. He believed experience had already proved, and would continue hereafter to confirm the opinion, that very little security is to be expected from that circumstance. It afforded the small States very little consolation. From the construction of our Government, it will ever be the case, that the influence of the large States in this House will, upon great national and interesting questions, operate upon the deliberations of the Senate. If the large States shall happen to be united in their views as to the Chief Magistrate, the electoral votes which are to be given will always have the effect which they are calculated to produce.

Another reason which had been urged in favor of a large ratio was the difficulty of doing business with a large representation. Mr. S. said this, like many other theories, was delusive and would not bear the test of fact and experience. He said the State of Connecticut, which he had the honor to represent, proved the truth of his remark. He said the popular branch of the Legislature of that State was composed of about two hundred members, who sat three weeks only in the Spring, and the same in Autumn, in a room not more than half the size of this, and he would presume to say it, although he represented that State, and this statement would be corroborated by those who had attended the deliberations of that body, that, for order, decorum, and dispatch of business, they were not surpassed by any other deliberative body. He did not by this mean to imply any disparagement to other Legislatures. For aught he knew, they all conducted their business with equal decorum. He was not over anxious to confine the ratio to what it is at present. If the population shall amount to what it is generally supposed, viz: seven millions, a ratio of one for every 35,000 will give precisely 200 members, which he thought would be a convenient number.

He said, an honorable gentleman from New York the other day advanced a doctrine to which he could by no means subscribe. Mr. S. said, being a Republican himself, he thought it did not by any means comport with true Republicanism. The gentleman said, that our citizens were to look altogether to their State Legislatures, and not to the National Legislature, for the protection of their rights; he thought it highly important that the States should have a proper representation here, so as to guard against the encroachments of the General Government upon the personal rights of citizens.

He asked the gentleman from New York, whether he had not at any time heretofore been jealous of the encroachments of this Government on the personal rights of our citizens? As to the other gentleman from New York, (Mr. Fisk,) he said his remark was not applicable to him; for, he said, if he had been rightly informed, that gentleman had never at any time heretofore been jealous of any such encroachments.

Mr. S. said further, if harmony among the members of this Union, and perpetuity to the same, were desirable, the large States would take heed how they unnecessarily degraded the small ones. He then appealed to the small and stationary States, how they ought to act upon the present occasion.

He said he trusted all difficulty would be avoided, if we would consent to wait, and accommodate, as far as may be, the ratio to the actual numbers which shall be returned, and to the fractions which will then appear upon any ratio which shall be proposed. He therefore moved an indefinite postponement.

Mr. SAWYER said that, as he was a friend to a representative democracy, and for diffusing its blessings as generally as possible, he should vote for an indefinite postponement rather than for filling the blank with the number proposed. If any argument, on account of the increased delay in our proceedings from an increased number of members is to prevail, it would justify us likewise in reducing the present number to any contemptible amount. Did we consult dispatch more than public justice and safety, we had better commit our affairs to the hands of six or eight members; for we have as much right, under the Constitution, to diminish the present number, as to fix a ratio which would give no expression to the voices of our increased numbers. The Constitution, by requiring a frequent enumeration, either had an eye to the rights of our increasing population, or must contain a clause of supererogation. Shall we render the Constitution a dead letter? Shall we evade one of its most imperative clauses? Shall we lose sight of one of the greatest safeguards of the people, for fear that the present body might be a little incommoded, or the public business retarded, by fixing on a ratio adapted to our present numbers? Rather than derange a tawdry structure, the blessings of representation are to be withheld, and thousands of American citizens doomed to a political death. But gentlemen need not feel alarmed for the fate of this hall; it may conveniently contain many more than would be introduced by the lowest number proposed. As to any delay that might be occasioned in our proceedings, that is not owing to our numbers, but to a defect in our rules. The evil exists already, for, under our present regulations, six or eight members may at any time arrest our proceedings, and put the will of the majority at defiance, as long as their physical powers will hold them out. We hear of no such delay in the British Parliament, nor in our State Legislatures, that contain twice our numbers. And if a proper regulation existed here, as with them, by which some end might be put to the abuse of debate, we should find that a considerable influx of new members would produce little or no delay in our proceedings. But if it did, that should never be, with me, a reason for stifling the voice of my fellow-citizens, and of denying them one of the genuine attributes and proud appendages of their liberty. Let us carry that vital principle of the Constitution as far as it can be conveniently extended, and not, from a fear of a little delay in our proceedings, incur the danger and the shame of a poor and pitiful representation. Surely the rights of the United States are as important, require as many persons to manage them, as a common State. If the motion to fill the blank with forty thousand were to prevail, it would establish a representative aristocracy. Such a number would bear no just proportion. It would be a mere mockery of representation: an insult to a free people, which they would not willingly forgive; and if they submitted to it they would prepare themselves to be stripped of their power. I never expected to hear in this House (said Mr. S.) arguments that would justify the dissolution of it; and which, if I be not mistaken, were made use of by Cromwell and Bonaparte, as prologues to the political tragedies they were about to act. One gentleman says the State Legislatures are the proper guardians of our rights; another says, we can do nothing on account of our numbers. If so, it is high time the people were rid of the expense of this establishment. To such absurd conclusions do all arguments tend, when directed against reason and truth. Fortunately for mankind, they require only to be exposed to be refuted. They dissolve in the atmosphere of truth. As I think the proposition unjust, as I know it to be unconstitutional, and as I believe the State from which I came is not desirous of trusting its affairs in fewer hands, I am for postponing indefinitely, and against filling the blank with the number proposed.

Mr. MOSELEY said he hoped the motion of his honorable colleague for the indefinite postponement of the present bill would prevail. He said when he heard the chairman of the committee who reported the bill declare, when he offered his resolution for the appointment of that committee, that he should call it up at an early day, and every day, until it was disposed of, he did expect to hear some cogent reason assigned for the extraordinary dispatch which that gentleman seemed to consider necessary on so important a subject. But, so far from hearing from that or any other gentleman any satisfactory reason for precipitating the passage of this bill, the more the subject was discussed, the more he was convinced that it would be premature at least, if not unconstitutional, as contended by the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts on his left, to pass any law upon the subject at this time. It would certainly be a departure from all former precedent. Why not wait until we could get a complete return of the census, rather than act upon the partial light we now possess, which is worse than nothing, because it places us upon an unequal footing? Some gentlemen may have obtained accurate information respecting the present population of the States they represent, while others (which was the case with himself) had obtained none. He really could perceive no good reason why they should proceed to act in the dark upon a subject of so much consequence, when, by postponing it to a proper time, we shall have light which shall enable them to act understandingly. Unless, indeed, (which he was unwilling to suppose,) gentlemen loved darkness rather than light, because they feared, at least, that their deeds might be evil.

With regard to the ratio that it would be most expedient, upon general principles, to establish by the law, which they were about to pass, he was not prepared positively to say, but had heard no reason which convinced him that it was best to vary it essentially from what it at present is. He certainly should consider it inexpedient to increase the ratio so as to diminish the present representation of any of the States. The time may come, when, from our increased population, this might be necessary; but that time, he imagined, had not yet arrived. To fix the ratio with the present population, so as to retain the present representation in all the States, would not augment the number of Representatives to such a degree as to be attended with any great disadvantages in any point of view. From the best calculations that could be made, the number of Representatives, in such case, would not exceed two hundred, a less number than was to be found in several of the State Legislatures. But an objection had been made by some gentlemen that even this number would be inconvenient as it respected the personal accommodation of the members. He believed that the people would hear with surprise such an objection as this as to this spacious hall, which they then occupied, which had cost the nation such immense sums, and which was so large that it was with difficulty that gentlemen could make themselves heard from one side to the other of it. They would be led to suppose that, when a man becomes a member of Congress, he becomes not only nominally, but literally, a great man.

It had also been said that the public business could be transacted with more energy and dispatch in a body less numerous. And, if he rightly recollected, something like a comparison was made by an honorable gentleman from New York, whom he now saw in his place, and who was lately a distinguished member of the Senate, between the facility and dispatch with which business is transacted in that body and this.

Sir, said Mr. M., deliberation as well as dispatch is sometimes found useful in legislation. And he begged leave to remind that gentleman of an instance in which the candor of the gentleman would induce him to concede that the nation found safety in a multitude of counsellors. He alluded to the expeditious passage of a law, in the Senate, when that gentleman held a seat in that body, suspending the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus. Had that have passed with the same eclat through this House, he believed the nation would have thanked them if they had exercised a little less dispatch and energy, and a little more deliberation. He said he did not mention this by way of censure, because he believed the vote in the Senate was nearly unanimous, and his own political friends were implicated in it. This example, however, showed that there was more safety, at least, if not wisdom, in a multitude of counsellors.

But it had been said that by an increase of numbers debate would be increased. This, he said, was an evil which, if gentlemen would reflect, they really need not dread; for the present number, it had been already seen, could talk any subject the year in and the year out without any difficulty. He said he had not meant to say anything on this subject; and to allude to a remark of a worthy gentleman, lately a member of this House (Mr. UPHAM) who said that the cacoethes loquendi was contagious, and he had insensibly caught it; lest I should be thought to have caught it, said Mr. M., I will sit down. Indeed I should not have risen but for some remarks of gentlemen professing to be good Republicans, who have expressed sentiments not palatable to my constituents, who as well as myself are really Republicans; sentiments rather aristocratical, and tending to prove, if they prove anything, that a monarchy is the best form of Government.

Mr. MACON said that on this question he was not ashamed to avow that he had changed his mind; and he did so, because he had reason to believe that gentlemen from some of the States could calculate what ratio would best suit their population. Now, he knew nothing of what would suit the State he came from; and he was therefore for postponing the bill, that all might stand on the same ground when they came to decide this question. Try the gentlemen who were in favor of postponement, and they dreaded the ratio of forty thousand; but seven or eight and thirty thousand they thought would not be amiss. When he heard this, he thought that they must know a little more about it than he did; and he had accordingly written to the Marshal of the State of North Carolina, to know, as nearly as possible, what was the census of that State. Upon this, as upon many other questions, the true question was kept quite out of view; for if gentlemen would look back to the debates, and turn over the Journals for the yeas and nays on this question heretofore, they would find every member speaking and voting for the number which best suited the State which he represented.

With respect to what would be too great a number to do business with convenience, Mr. M. said he had some time ago stated his opinion. He believed there was always more danger of their legislating too fast than too slow; he believed that every majority that ever existed had always been in a hurry. When he first had a seat in this House, this was a maxim of one of the best legislators he had ever known: vote when you are in the majority, talk when you are in the minority.

Mr. M. said he disliked the act for the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus as much as the gentleman from Connecticut; but they should put to it its older brother, the sedition law; they ought not to be divided. All majorities, he said, would have this itch for legislating fast, and all minorities for talking a great deal; a majority always understood that it must put its acts against all a minority could say. He asked gentlemen, whether, in the present state of things, it was fair to press this question. He had stated what he had done, and another gentleman, who represented a State much nearer than North Carolina, had also written to his marshal, and probably would get the information he wanted to day or to-morrow, and, no doubt, would then be as well prepared to act as others were. As this would not be the case with himself, Mr. M. said he was in favor of postponement, that all might have an equal chance of acting understandingly.

Mr. PIRKIN said that the gentleman last up had mentioned that probably some gentlemen were acquainted with the census of their States, and therefore better prepared to act than others. So far as respected himself, Mr. P. said he could inform the gentleman that as to the census of Connecticut, he knew it not; he did not even know the number in his own little village. He knew, however, that from the year 1790 to the year 1800, the increase in that State was about 14,000; it was so small on account of the great emigration. The emigration had not been less for the last ten years. Of course, therefore, the increase would not be much greater than for the ten preceding years; it might be about fifteen or sixteen thousand. He knew also that the ratio of 40,000 would take an increase of 30,000 more to enable Connecticut to maintain its present footing in the House of Representatives; and, judging from the former increase, he knew that Connecticut at the ratio of 40,000 must lose one of her members. This to be sure might not, he said, be of great consequence to the Union; but at the same time it might be to Connecticut. Mr. P. said he had no other data, than this mode of estimating it, on which to judge of the census of Connecticut. Without at this time entering into the merits of the question of a large or small representation, he declared himself in favor of indefinite postponement.

Mr. FINDLEY said the question was taken in the Committee of the Whole with little discussion, because it met with little opposition, but he had since seriously reflected on the subject, and made up his mind to vote for the indefinite postponement of the question. He believed that Congress had power to determine the ratio in one law and the apportionment in another, but this had never before been done, and not being necessary he did not think it expedient to adopt a new method now. He was, however, in favor of increasing the ratio considerably, even though it might affect some States more than others; the States would always have unequal fractions when the ratio would be increased; therefore, this argument would always apply. This would be the case even by continuing the present ratio.

When the first census was taken, he was a member and attentive to the subject. The Federal Convention had agreed that the smallest ratio should be 40,000, but, on the suggestion of the President, it was finally fixed at 30,000. Himself and many other members endeavored to have this agreed to as the first ratio, believing that it would be increased with the population at every new enumeration. The Senate, however, agreed to begin with 40,000, and insisted on it, till it came to a conference, of which he was one of the conferees. Finally, however, 33,000, the present ratio was determined as that which left the smallest fraction in the whole unrepresented. Though he wished to increase it considerably, yet he was not so determined on any particular number, but what he was willing to vary it somewhat less or more, not in favor of any particular States, but so as to leave the smallest number of citizens on the whole unrepresented. He believed that this was their duty, and they could not do it till the enumeration was known. He did not think the two last days of the session was a suitable time to deliberate on making the apportionment; the House was then too much engaged with unfinished business, and generally too thin. He was in favor of leaving the whole to the next House as had been done always heretofore. If we did not do so he believed that the next House would have as much power to change our law as we had to make it; and as it required making two laws instead of one, he was not convinced of the necessity of changing the usual method which had heretofore given satisfaction, nor of any real advantage arising from the change.

The yeas and nays on indefinite postponement were taken: and were—yeas 55, nays 62, as follows:

YEAS—Joseph Allen, Abijah Bigelow, Daniel Blaisdell, Adam Boyd, James Breckenridge, John C. Chamberlain, William Chamberlin, Epaphroditus Champion, Martin Chittenden, Howell Cobb, John Davenport, jun., William Ely, James Emott, William Findley, Charles Goldsborough, Thomas R. So the motion was lost.

Mr. PITKIN said, as it was probable some gentlemen had voted against indefinite postponement, under an impression that the returns of the census would be received in sufficient time to act upon them during the present session, and thus save to some of the States the inconvenience of an extra session; he should move to postpone the further consideration of the subject to the second Monday in February, in the hope that we should obtain a majority in favor of such a course.

Mr. SMILIE declared himself opposed to the present motion and for the same reason for which he was opposed to indefinite postponement. Because he wished the ratio to be fixed before the returns were made, and before the members could have an opportunity of calculating the fractions which might be left to individual States. He was in the House when the last census was taken, and the existing apportionment made. On that occasion, when the result of the population was known, there was a kind of accommodation, in fixing the ratio, between those States who had fractions—they combined together to make that apportionment which would leave the smallest fraction of unrepresented population to the individual States which they represented. He saw no reason to induce an opinion that the same circumstance would not occur on the present occasion, were the returns to be made, previous to fixing the ratio. It has been observed that if the ratio was fixed now, injustice would be done to some of the small States. This he could not perceive, for the principle was equally impartial to all; and even if the interest of a small State should suffer, the interest of a part should yield to that of the whole. Mr. S. entered into a brief examination of the details of this subject, and concluded with expressing his hope that the bill would not be postponed.

DECEMBER, 1810.

Mr. MILNOR said, that when this subject had been first brought into view, and the reasons given which were now urged, he thought the reasoning in favor of the course proposed by the bill appeared so plausible, that he had himself been an advocate for fixing the ratio at the present time. Under that impression he had voted in Committee of the Whole; but the observations since made from various sides of the House had convinced him that this was not the time when the ratio ought to be fixed.

The gentleman last up had remarked that, fix the ratio as they would, the relative weight of each State would not be altered. This idea, said Mr. M., was not warranted by an examination into the subject. Rhode Island was now represented by two members; Virginia by 22. If the ratio was fixed at such a rate as to take one from each of these States, he asked whether their relative loss would be the same. If so, it was a truth of which he had no conception. It much astonished him to find that gentlemen who were the greatest sticklers for State rights, and extremely afraid that the General Government should encroach upon them; that these gentlemen were desirous to fix on a ratio which went to diminish the influence of the small States, and increase that of the larger ones. He was himself a sincere friend to the State governments, and deemed it all-important to preserve them in their purity. This is a confederated, not a consolidated, Government, and while we wish to preserve our freedom, it should remain as it is. The diminishing the influence of the small States would have a tendency to consolidate the Government—to do away the Confederation. Although this is a Government of limited powers, yet, in a variety of cases which come under the notice of the Government, there was great danger of the State governments being greatly infringed upon. It was, therefore, his view to preserve a full representation of the smaller States upon the floor of this House.

Mr. M. said he was equally ignorant with other gentlemen how the ratio would affect the numbers of the respective States; but he had an idea how a large ratio would affect a number of the States. At least he believed the ratio of forty thousand would probably deprive the State of New Hampshire of a Representative on this floor; Rhode Island would certainly lose one; New Jersey and Maryland might also lose one. With respect to his own State, he was at a loss whether it would or would not lose; but he confessed that he was doubtful whether it had so increased as to admit the ratio of forty thousand, and continue its present representation. He believed that the representatives of the Eastern States ought to be cautious how they increased the ratio to forty thousand, when they knew that the interests of Tennessee and Ohio would be so prominent when they had a representation on the floor according to the third census. There were a variety of considerations which ought to induce the House to be extremely cautious how they cut down the Middle and Eastern States to a less representation than they now possessed. Gentlemen ought, if possible, to avoid creating causes of jealousy between the several States. Mr. M. dwelt on the importance of preserving harmony. It was painful to urge these considerations; but he was so strongly impressed with them that he was compelled to press them upon the House.

Mr. M. said he believed the evils to be feared from a diminished representation were much stronger than from an increased one. He was, therefore, in favor of postponement till the result of the census was known.

Mr. TAYLOR objected to the bill because it was incomplete for the object it had in view; because it would be necessary to pass another law declaring to how many Representatives each State should be entitled. It was then demanded of the House, by the bill on the table, to legislate, as it were, abstractedly on this subject. He said he was not prepared to do so, for a very obvious reason at once staring him in the face—that, if they did legislate on it, the next Legislature would be competent to repeal the legislation of this day. Indeed, he believed it would be his bounden duty, if the law were now passed, and at the end of the session he should find that the ratio adopted would leave to South Carolina a fraction of thirty-five thousand unrepresented; if such proved to be the case, he could not dare to refuse to reconsider his vote and amend the law so as to make it more advantageous to his constituents or the State he represented. Did gentlemen suppose, if it should appear that five, or six, or seven States, might have an immense fraction; that he should so disregard the interest of his constituents as to consider binding this thing, which, if they regarded the Constitution and the practice under it, they had not a right to pronounce binding? The Constitution had directed that the apportionment should be made according to numbers; but the bill proposed to make it before the numbers were known. He called the attention of the House to a fact which would show pretty clearly what had been the opinion of the States on the subject of legislating abstractedly on this head. Congress had proposed, in 1787, soon after the adoption of the Constitution, several amendments, among which was one fixing limits to the ratio of apportionment, &c. This proposition, Mr. T. said, appeared to be a very reasonable one, taking it abstractedly; but what had the States, the people, to whom they were accountable, said on the subject? Had that article become a part of the Constitution? No; it had been rejected by the States. And would the House take upon itself to do that which the States had said it was expedient that they should not do? He hoped not. He thought, from the very circumstance of their refusing to adopt this article, that Congress were precluded from proceeding any further until they should be able, according to the letter of the Constitution, to apportion the representation according to the numbers legally ascertained. The great desideratum in this case was a fair and equal representation of the people. If this equality could be better attained by a ratio of thirty-five thousand than by a ratio of forty thousand, (and, by comparing the returns of each State, that would be ascertained,) it would become their bounden duty to further that principle, keeping in view the convenience of legislation, not making the House to consist of five or of two hundred at present. He was in favor of postponement, that the apportionment might be made according to the letter of the Constitution, apportioning the representation according to numbers.

Mr. W. ALSTON said, that postponement to a day within the session, was more objectionable to him than indefinite postponement. He wished to avoid the difficulty resulting from a knowledge of the numbers. If a particular ratio should suit the census of three or four of the larger States, they would unite and totally disregard the smaller States. If the large States would take a large ratio, he was willing to agree to it; for, take any ratio which should deprive North Carolina of one Representative, and they would deprive Virginia of two; and when they came to vote for President, Virginia would be nearer to her than if she had taken a small ratio. He defied gentlemen to show that the adoption of a large ratio would not have this bearing. Gentlemen must be convinced that whatever ratio reduced the representation of a small State would proportionably reduce that of a large one. For his own part, he was disposed to give a Representative to every State that had a large fraction.

Mr. MITCHELL said, that notwithstanding the various observations which had been made on this subject, it seemed to him to stand on its original basis. On the day to which it was proposed to postpone the bill, other matters would be found to occupy the House, calling for all its attention.

Mr. M. said, he was disposed to pursue this business and bring it to a close; that was, to pass or reject the bill by a direct vote. It seemed to him that a fundamental error had prevailed on this occasion; gentlemen having talked of the relative weight of the States being affected by the bill. If they consider the provisions of the Constitution with respect to the representation in this House, it was a representation per capita, as the Senate was a representation by States. When the States were brought into view by the Constitution on this point, according to the construction he put upon it, they were considered merely as organs to assist the General Government in taking the census. If this was the case, and he believed this view of the subject was correct, when they came to a calculation of the returns made of the polls, what cause was there for alarm on this occasion? He could see no cause for it; for if there was a diminution of numbers in any State, there was a correspondent increased number and representation in the portion of the Union to which they had emigrated; and it would be very unfair, when a portion of the population of a State or district had emigrated, that this district should be represented in the same proportion as when it possessed double its present population. This was a sort of two-fold representation which he could not reconcile with the Constitution.

But Mr. M. invited gentlemen to consider this question in relation to State influence. Experience had taught him that gentlemen did not vote by States, but by per capita. How often, he asked, did gentlemen, coming from the same State, vote as differently as if they came from the most remote part of the Union. The fact was, that the members of the House voted by polls, each according to what his sense of duty dictated. He considered, therefore, that there was no ground for this question about the influence of the States, as such, in the House. It struck him this was something held up to frighten the House; which, on examination, would be found to exhibit nothing terrific.

In another point of view, Mr. M. said, he thought the great interests of the Union were represented. He stated what these were. In the original settlement of this country, there were the interests of the first settlers on James River and that of the settlers at Plymouth—the Virginia and New England interests. These, said he, were the germs of the nation; the source whence have sprung up the great mass of the people whom we constitute and represent. What was the consequence? If from Virginia colonies had extended over the Southern and Western States, New England had also sent forth swarms which had spread over New York, Ohio, Pennsylvania, and everywhere that they had thought proper to plant themselves. When we reflect, said Mr. M., on the influence of the opinions which these emigrants from each State carry with them, and which will be brought into this House, the two interests may be considered as nearly balanced in this House. On that ground, therefore, as respects feeling and opinion, I view the provisions of this bill as exactly equal as they are in respect to the population of the several States.

Mr. M. said, his opinion was, that if they decided on the bill at all, they should do it promptly and might decide it as well now as at a future day.

Whilst on the floor, he said he would make a remark or two on what had fallen in relation to the smallness of bodies inclining them to act with a promptness not always consistent with wisdom. He said he did not contend that any body of men, associating under any form of Government, were infallible. As long as they labored under the infirmities of their nature, all bodies, whether large or small, would be subject to the errors incident to humanity. If they were not, they would approach the Divine Nature, and be no longer the frail creatures which they found themselves to be. As to the particular matter of the bill for the suspension of the habeas corpus law, Mr. M.

said, he had given it his honest and hearty approbation, under existing circumstances. A daring and desperate individual had undertaken a conspiracy against the peace and, he believed, the integrity of the United States. This conspiracy was known to have been extended and ramified to a great extent. It was not known how far. But it became a wise and provident Legislature to aid the Executive against any evil; and there were certain persons who blew the trumpet of fame at that time, who made the alarm much greater than it was in reality. Besides, said Mr. M., it will be remembered, that that was not a general suspension of the habeas corpus law: it interfered with none but those concerned in treasonable projects. But the gentleman from Connecticut exulted that the storm blew over; that the House of Representatives did not agree to the bill, and it was, therefore, crushed. It may have been, said Mr. M., that the mere numbers of the House prevented its passage; I should have ascribed it to the wisdom of the House—and I will explain why they might with wisdom have rejected it. They received it some days after the Senate had enacted it. They took it into consideration, and got further intelligence what the States were doing to oppose it; and permit me here to remark, that the result of this business showed the strength of the Government when the States were in union with it. Without their co-operation it would be as weak as a rope of sand. What, sir, took place at that time? The Legislature of Kentucky arrayed its forces with promptitude; Tennessee prepared, and Ohio was actually in arms. Here was a confederacy of States, and this mischief was arrested, but not owing to any act of the Government of the United States, unless by the Executive in calling on the State authorities to act. This is the history of the case; and, after this view of the subject, I hope my friend from Connecticut will reconsider what he has thought proper to offer, and take into consideration, also, that multitudinous bodies sometimes do things of a serious nature without deliberation. I need not call to his recollection the precipitancy with which the Parliament of England beheaded the last of the Stuarts; and with which the multitude crucified the Saviour of the World. There are many instances on record, in which numerous bodies have acted with that promptitude and indiscretion which is ascribed to the Senate of the United States. When gentlemen considered this question, and reflected on the great mass of business before them, he was persuaded they would not consider the bill a proper subject for further postponement.

Mr. POTTER spoke in favor of postponement. He could not see any good, but a great deal of evil, to result from now acting on the subject. The census of Rhode Island, he said, would probably prove to be seventy eight or seventy-nine thousand; and to fix arbitrarily on a ratio which should deprive her of one of her present Representatives would be a hardship, and an act of injustice.

Mr. SHEFFEY said, he had been induced to be in favor of the bill heretofore, from a belief that those collisions arising from State interests would be entirely done away by it; and with another view, that the States might be enabled to make provision for the election of their members. He found, however, upon reflection, that this, like every other subject, ought to be determined on all the information in the power of the persons determining it; that this case did not differ from the general rule requiring that they should legislate with their eyes open. He had, therefore, now changed the opinion to which he had strongly attached himself at the last session. He had been under the erroneous impression that fixing the ratio closed the subject forever; but on reflection, he found, that but half what was necessary would be accomplished by passing this bill. Let us see (said he) how fixing the ratio might operate; and then I ask any gentleman attached to liberality and justice, whether he would feel himself bound by the determination of this House, if he should be a member of the next Congress. Suppose the population of Virginia should prove to be nine hundred and nineteen thousand, and that of Rhode Island seventy-nine thousand. Each of those States at the rate of forty thousand, would have the same fraction of thirty-nine thousand. Could I, sir, who consider the predominant motives for action to be principles of justice, be in favor of such a ratio? Putting State influence entirely out of the question in this case, I should, although in favor of a very large ratio, on a question of that kind, determine on the ratio of thirty-nine thousand; if a ratio of forty or fifty thousand would produce the same result, I should be governed by the same principle.

The gentleman from New York had told them that the representation in this House, was a representation per capita. Would it be so, if in one quarter of it forty thousand were represented by one man, whilst, in another quarter, seventy-nine thousand had only the same representation, because they lay in a different section of the Union? Mr. S. said, the representation was not per capita, but by States. The whole Union was not thrown into election districts, without regard to State limits. Each State sent here the number of Representatives decreed to it, according to a rule fixed by the Constitution.

Mr. S. was in favor of postponement to a day within the session, because the returns might arrive in time to enable the House to decide on it. It had been observed, that there would be so much business before the House they would not be able to take up the subject. What did this prove, but that this was an object of secondary moment, and did not imperiously demand the attention of the House at this time? If it should hereafter imperiously call for a decision, the majority of the House had here control and would be able to take it up.

The question was then taken on postponing the bill to the second Monday in February, and carried—yeas 66, nays 51, as follows:

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, presented a bill for the relief of George Armroyd and Company; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

GENERAL WILKINSON.

Mr. PEARSON said that during the last session of Congress a committee had been appointed by this House to inquire into the conduct of Brigadier General James Wilkinson; but from a part of the report, which he read, the House would recollect that the committee had not brought their investigation to a conclusion. In order to perfect what had been thus commenced, he moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the conduct of Brigadier General James Wilkinson, in relation to his having at any time, whilst in the service of the United States, corruptly received money from the Government of Spain or its agents, or in relation to his having, during the time aforesaid, been an accomplice, or in any way concerned with the agents of any foreign Power, or with Aaron Burr, in a project against the dominions of the King of Spain, or to dismember these United States. And that the said committee inquire generally into the conduct of the said James Wilkinson as Brigadier General of the Army of the United States: That the said committee have power to send for persons and papers and compel their attendance and production, and that they report the result of their inquiry to this House.

Mr. P. said he would barely remark that having been a member of the committee at the last session he was well convinced that the committee had not drawn their investigation to a conclusion; for although he had studiously avoided conversing on this subject, or communicating with any one in relation to it, yet evidence unsought for had come to his knowledge, which had not been before the committee, and which, if to be relied on, he deemed material to the investigation.

The House agreed to consider the resolution, 61 to 35.

Mr. ROOR said, he hoped this question would not be taken very hastily. He wished the motion might lie on the table for two or three days. He believed one member of the resolution to be unnecessary, nay, improper. He said he was not now prepared to refer to documents or reports, or to the sentence of a military court of inquiry to prove it. He alluded to that member of the resolution, which regarded the Spanish business. There had been causes, he said, unfolded to the Committee, at the last session, which would show the impropriety of inquiring into the business of the Spanish pension. It would be premature now to state the reasons which governed his mind in wishing to strike it out. He moved that the resolution should lie on the table.

Mr. TAYLOR said he had always been of opinion that the power of this House did not extend to the subject of this inquiry. That opinion, however, had not been in coincidence with the opinion of a majority of this House. Neither should he now attempt to argue this ground over again. He was, and he believed a great majority of the House was, pretty well tired of this subject; and, if the investigation was to come to anything, he would be for giving to the committee, who were to have the subject in charge, the earliest possible opportunity to commence their labors. For, he said, he believed if this individual possessed a grain of popularity, a penny-weight of weight of character, this mode of bringing forward this subject, so late in the session that it was impossible to come to a conclusion; this holding up his character on the tenter-hooks of public opinion, the course pursued throughout the whole business, would make the worse the better side. He said he was unwilling, if this person was unworthy the confidence of the Government, that he should hold a situation where the Government could not take hold of him, and he would, therefore, not postpone the subject a day or an hour, but give it to the committee, if it was the sense of the House; for, he would say, that the Government of the United States, in respect to this individual, from the time of his being ordered from command, had their hands tied, not having the power of dismissing him from service, even if it had been proper. If he had done so, it would have been said that he had snatched the victim from public opinion, and had dismissed him from service lest his improper actions should implicate the Executive, who had so long continued him in command. Censure has been passed upon this officer by the Government, inasmuch as he has been superseded in an important command, previously, too, as it appears, to the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. PEARSON,) at the last session. Mr. T. said, he was not for putting it off; he was for meeting the thing. If gentlemen of the House were determined to inquire, he said, let it be speedily, so that there might be an end to the business, and to the unjust imputations on the Government for keeping him in employ, when it was the opinion of many (he had already expressed his) that he should be removed. Mr. T. said, he was against postponement for a day or an hour. Even if he were anxious for the reputation of the individual, he should be of the same opinion. He was anxious also for the reputation of the Executive retaining him in office, which would be committed by keeping him in command, if Congress, by a sort of committee of safety, an unconstitutional court or committee of inquiry, had not stepped in between him and them. He was extremely averse to postponement.

General Wilkinson.

Mr. SMILIE said he agreed with his friend from South Carolina in one respect, but could not vote with him on this question, because he considered this business, from its commencement to this day, as an unconstitutional proceeding on the part of this House. The House appeared determined to go on; so let them, but it should not be with the aid of his vote. When a few more difficulties had been created by the proceeding, they would come to a proper understanding of the subject. He was not sorry, he said, but so far from it was glad, that this subject had been renewed; for the excess of the evil would correct itself most effectually, when every man would turn his eye upon himself, and reflect upon the precariousness of his own situation, if a committee of this House could hang him up before the public, at the same time that he was liable to be brought to trial before another authority. He could not aid the progress of the inquiry by any vote of his, though he rejoiced that the matter was again taken up.

Mr. PITKIN said, that if this subject were new, and now for the first time agitated, he presumed there would be no objection to its lying on the table. But as it was not new, the subject having been particularly before the House at the last session, and an inquiry partially had, and a report made on the subject, he could see no sufficient reason for its lying on the table. If the majority was determined that there should be no further inquiry, it ought to be decided immediately, for the reasons mentioned by the gentleman from South Carolina: for the honor of the Executive, and of the person whose conduct was the subject of inquiry. The limited duration of the session was also a strong argument in favor of an early decision.

The question on the resolution's lying on the table was lost—yeas 33, nays 78, as follows:

Mr. LOVE moved to postpone the further consideration until to-morrow. Lost—46 to 53.

Mr. TROUP moved to amend the resolution by adding thereto the following: "and further, that the said James Wilkinson be notified of the time and place of meeting of said committee, and be heard in his defence."

Mr. STANFORD said he had never doubted, as well from the Constitution as from the plainest dictates of common sense, that the House had the right to inquire into the state and conduct of the Army, or that of one of its commanding officers, and had more than once authorized committees for that purpose; but the form of a court to sit, collect testimony, hear and try a military officer, had never before been attempted, because to the mere purpose of inquiry no such thing was necessary, if proper. If the committee is to go into this form in the business, and then again the House in like manner, there would be no end to the business. The amendment now proposed assuming the form of trying General Wilkinson, he hoped it would not be adopted. He had no idea of a committee of this House calling a gentleman of the military garb before them; hear him, as it is said, in his defence, and it would seem, as a thing of course, afterwards to pronounce guilty or not guilty.

Mr. PEARSON said it had been believed by the committee at the last session of Congress that they had the power to receive any evidence General Wilkinson might think proper to bring forward, and in the manner which should have been deemed most consistent with the duty of the committee, and the honor of the House who appointed them; and he believed that every member of the committee had been at all times during the session perfectly willing to receive any communication which General Wilkinson might have thought proper to offer. If it was the object of the mover merely that the committee should receive any evidence relative to the subject, he conceived that the amendment of the gentleman, though not improper, was unnecessary. He believed it was the understanding of all gentlemen who were in favor of the resolution that testimony should not be entirely ex parte; but the committee ought not, he conceived, to be bound to receive the evidence, unless they deemed it conducive to the end of the inquiry. He was opposed to the amendment more because it was unnecessary than improper.

Mr. TROUP supported his amendment. Was it possible, he asked, that this House could ever think of coming to a decision on the character and conduct of an individual without hearing him in his defence? If they heard ex parte testimony, was it possible that they would come to an ex parte conclusion? General Wilkinson must either be heard by the committee appointed or by the House in his defence before they pronounced on his conduct, or acted in relation to him as if they had done so. Suppose the House should on this occasion choose to consider itself as an inquisitorial tribunal—as the grand inquest of the nation as it was called—why, it might happen that the General might be tried twice for the same offence, by what was called the grand inquest of this House, and by what was called the grand and petty jury of his country. The House would observe that, in the case of their proceeding, although there was a grand jury to find the bill, there was not a petty jury to determine the question of guilty or not guilty. After pronouncing as far as they could, the House were to turn him over to the laws, according to which he must appear before another grand inquest, and afterwards, be tried whether guilty or not guilty, before a petty jury. If they proceeded in this way there would be a double prosecution for the same offence. Mr. T. was therefore decidedly of opinion that if the House pursued the subject, General Wilkinson ought to have his Constitutional and legal right to confront his accusers.

Mr. RHEA said this amendment would cap the climax of the unconstitutionality of their proceeding; for it would give to the inquiry all the formality of trial. General Wilkinson was to put in his plea of guilty or not guilty; the committee must rejoin; evidence must be taken, on which the committee would pronounce. This would be a trial to all intents and purposes, except that in other cases the party was not called upon to answer before bills were found. If there was any provision contained in the Constitution to warrant such a proceeding, it was unknown to him. If he were desirous to add to the absurdity of the original resolution, he should vote for the amendment, but he had no such disposition. He had risen for the purpose of requiring the yeas and nays on the question.

Mr. W. ALSTON said that unquestionably if the House had a right to inquire into the guilt, they had a right to inquire also into the innocence of General Wilkinson. It was admitted on all hands that the House were not to proceed to final judgment on General Wilkinson. Would it be right or just to collect everything against an individual, to blast his character forever, without hearing his side of the question? Who knew, if they heard him in his defence, but the charges against him might be all disproved? If truth were the only thing they were in search of, could any man object to hearing both sides of the question? Every one, who had ever attended courts, must have been satisfied that one story was good until another was told. The objections to this amendment showed that one side of the question was wanted and not the other.

Mr. SMILE said he wished to know one thing of the gentlemen who patronised this resolution: what was their object? The business had arrived to that stage that it was time to declare what they ultimately meant. Did they mean, after the inquiry was finished, that the House was to decide on the guilt or innocence of this officer? If this was what was meant, they ought to tell it, and in that case the amendment was necessary. If the committee passed sentence, they ought to show whence the power was derived. From the Constitution it could not be, for there was no such power there. He supposed, however, that they did not mean to carry the matter so far, but merely to pursue the inquiry, and blast the man's character by publishing the result of a one-sided inquiry. Mr. S. appealed to gentlemen whether after this General Wilkinson could have a fair trial before either of the courts, civil or military, before whom he might be called. He hoped at all events they would declare what was their object; either to judge the man and pronounce sentence on him, or publish to the world everything they could collect against the character of the man. Indeed, in his opinion, the House had got into a situation in which they would always find themselves when they took a wrong step. His opinion had uniformly been that the House did not possess an inquisitorial power as such; that where they had no power to impeach they had no power to make inquiry into the conduct of an individual.

Mr. PEARSON said on further reflection he had thought proper to accept the amendment offered by Mr. TROUP as a part of his motion.

The amendment of Mr. TROUP having thus become a part of Mr. PEARSON'S resolution—

Mr. T. MOORE said that now this amendment was incorporated in the original motion, he found himself under the necessity of voting against the whole. He had always considered that the House had a right to inquire into the conduct of General Wilkinson, but he could never agree that they had a right to try him. The gentleman from Pennsylvania had stated, that if the House proceeded and sent that officer before a court-martial with the sentence of the House on his back, it would be holding him up to public view in a way which would be very unfavorable. For his part, Mr. M. said, he could see that officer in no other point of view than as a person before a grand jury, against whom a bill was to be found. How would that operate? Would it prevent justice? No; every day's experience proves to the contrary. The amendment carried with it the appearance of putting General Wilkinson on his trial. Mr. M. was therefore against it.

Mr. STANFORD said he had no idea that the House had a right to go into the full form of trying a military officer by one of its committees. Believing the amendment had given the proposition a form which rendered it questionable whether in passing it they were borne out by the Constitution or not, he must vote against the resolution in that character. The House had on a former occasion collected testimony and sent it to the Executive—on which testimony, he presumed, the court of inquiry had been held in due form. He was not disposed to go farther in this case than sending the testimony to be collected to the Executive. He therefore moved to strike out those words which had been inserted in the resolution at the suggestion of the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. BUTLER said, that situated as he had been during the last session of Congress, he found himself called upon to answer the question of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who asked what gentlemen meant by this inquiry. I trust, Mr. Speaker, (said he) I shall be among the last either in this House, or elsewhere, that would say or do any act that would unjustly detract from the merits of the man that is brave and virtuous; and the General's bravery was not doubted. But, whilst I am anxious to guard the reputation of the individual, I wish to pay some attention to the honor and independence of the American Republic; and believing as I now do, that General Wilkinson, as Commander-in-Chief of the American Army, has been guilty of improper conduct, I am willing this House shall make the inquiry, and, after hearing the evidence on both sides, if the charges exhibited against General Wilkinson shall be refuted, I wish to say to the world that he is an innocent and persecuted man; and if, on the other hand, after mature investigation, the facts as already stated in the report of the committee, of which I was last session a member, should appear to be correct, as a Representative of the people of the United States I will not hesitate to say, that General Wilkinson ought to be made a public example. That was my meaning when on the committee last session; what may be the idea of the committee of this session is not for me to say.

The question was then taken on Mr. STANFORD'S motion, and lost—yeas 20, nays 89, as follows:

The question recurring on the resolution as amended—

Mr. MITCHELL said he was opposed to it on the broad ground that it had already occupied too much of the attention of the House. He therefore wished it dismissed, and that the person concerned might be left to be dealt with by the Executive as the Constitution directs; and as he would be if it were not for the interference of the House. Mr. M. said he thought the House had better adhere to its legislative functions, in which it had enough to do, and to leave to the Executive to perform his functions as Commander-in-Chief of the Armies of the United States.

Mr. ROOT said he would not detain the House by moving to strike out any part of the resolution, for he was convinced from the votes which had been taken that the resolution would pass as it now stood; but as he had at the last session voted for a resolution similar to that under consideration, and had the honor to be appointed one of the committee, he felt it a duty which he owed to himself and the House to state some of the reasons which had induced him to change his opinion on the subject. An aged and honorable friend (Mr. SMILIE) had at the last session given admonition of the impropriety of their proceeding, and Mr. R. said the longer he sat upon the committee the more he became convinced of the incorrectness of his vote. At that time the popular clamor had been loud; the public had appeared to demand the inquiry; and he had heard of the lamentable destruction of the Army in the marshes of Terre au Boeuf. Without much reflection on the constitutionality of the question, Mr. R. said, he voted for the inquiry; and he had thought that perhaps something might grow out of it; that the House might withhold supplies as long as the Executive continued in command a man whom the House on a full investigation should deem unworthy of the public confidence. He had thought, also, that it might lead to another object—the repeal of the law creating the office of Brigadier General. This inquiry by the House, Mr. R. said, he believed had prevented the dismissal of General Wilkinson, or at least an Executive inquiry into his conduct. He said that he had found that a committee would be unable, and must of necessity be unable, to do justice to the character of the individual and justice to the nation. By what means, he asked, could the committee compel the attendance of witnesses; and how were they to be informed of the persons proper to be subpoenaed unless from officers who had been, or now were, under the command of General Wilkinson, and were willing to volunteer their services against him? How should these things be known, unless from those whose object it was, instead of allaying, to increase the popular clamor? To be sure the resolution now looked as if General Wilkinson was to be heard before the committee. But were the House certain that he would avail himself of the opportunity? He had not at the last session asked to be heard by the committee, because the powers of that committee did not extend to declaring his guilt or innocence.

This resolution, Mr. R. said, embraced three objects, two of which had been already sufficiently examined. His conduct on the marshes below New Orleans had been sufficiently investigated by a committee appointed at the last session expressly to inquire into that subject. His conduct as to the Spanish pension had been investigated before a military court instituted for the purpose; and by that court it had been reported that there was no evidence of his having been a Spanish pensioner, but that his having received money from the Spanish Government was on account of a tobacco contract. But even if that were not the fact, the length of time elapsed, and the circumstances attending the transaction, would be sufficient to render an investigation on that point inexpedient. As long ago as 1786 or 1787, when the mouths of the Mississippi were held by Spain, the inhabitants on its waters were taking measures, if not for independence of the United States, at least for a connexion with Spain. But was this anything new? Had it not been communicated to General WASHINGTON, and also to Mr. Adams? Yes; and what had they done? They had given instructions to search into the matter; but, when the treaty had been made with Spain in 1796, and the association was dissolved, there having been many persons involved whose names had been heard on this side the Alleghany, the Government had thought proper not to make the investigation. At the last session, Mr. R. said he had seen letters communicated to Mr. McHenry, when Secretary of War, giving information on the subject. Those letters had not been put upon the files of the War office, but had been retained among his private papers. It had been deemed prudent by WASHINGTON and ADAMS to suffer the matter to go to rest. What occasion, then, was there now to revive this inquiry; to rake up the ashes of the dead? With a knowledge of every thing relating to the subject, General Wilkinson had been permitted by three successive administrations to remain in office.

Mr. R. said he felt a confidence that, if, upon investigation, the charges against him had been found to be well grounded, General Wilkinson would have been, before this time, removed from the command from which he had been suspended but for the inquiry. He was unwilling that another inquiry by the House should protract the time when a proper inquiry should take place, and his dismissal from service ensue, if it should then appear necessary. He was therefore opposed to the resolution.

Mr. GHOLSON said he had voted in favor of the motion to lay the resolution before the House on the table. He had also voted for its postponement until to-morrow. But he was not governed by any of the reasons which had been assigned by some of the gentlemen with whom he had the honor of being associated in these votes. So far from it, he could not question the Constitutional authority of the House to pass the resolution. He had been induced to support the two first motions that were made, because a want of preparation to act on this subject had been expressed on the floor, and because he saw no necessity for precipitancy in its disposition.

As it regards the Constitutional competency of this House to investigate the misprisions, tortfeasances, and mal-conduct, generally, of any officer, whether civil or military, belonging to this Government, my opinion, said Mr. G., has been long since satisfactorily formed. I not only believe that the House possesses this power, as incidental to its right of impeachment, but to me it would seem most clear that the right to inquire into the conduct of any officer Constitutionally inheres in and appertains to this House, as the immediate delegates and agents of the people, who expect from their Representatives a vigilant superintendence over all their public concerns.

An honorable and very venerable gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. SMILIE) has said that inquiries such as are contemplated by the present motion are confined to civil officers only. Without going at large into this doctrine, will that gentleman allow me to state to him a case, and ask of him how he would act in it. I know he is incapable of any other than a candid answer. Suppose, then, the United States, in a critical emergency, had embodied an army of fifty or an hundred thousand men, and its commander was suspected of traitorism or corruption, would the gentleman, under such circumstances, appropriate money and vote supplies for such a General, or for an army commanded by him? I do not attempt to show, that in point of enormity, the case of General Wilkinson bears any proportion to the case which I have supposed very possibly might exist. The principle however in either case is precisely the same, and I make no doubt the worthy gentleman, in the case which I have imagined, would consider an inquiry necessary, with a view to appropriation; for I know he would not vote supplies for an army to be commanded as the one I have mentioned. On Constitutional principles, therefore, I have no doubt whatever but we have a right to make this inquiry.

The question then occurs, will this right be judiciously and discreetly exercised in the adoption of the resolution? The steps which were taken at the last session on this subject were insufficient and incomplete. If it was right to commence the inquiry, it is much more so to conclude it, and the resolution is only designed to consummate the investigation. In this view, then, I think it ought to be adopted. But, sir, in my opinion, we ought to proceed in this inquiry as an act of justice to General Wilkinson. Some of the testimony which has been taken may have an unfavorable bearing on that officer—it was ex parte. He had no opportunity of confronting his accusers. The present resolution, with the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia, (Mr. TROUP,) will lead to a full and fair examination; and under it General Wilkinson will have that opportunity—a right which I thought at the last session ought to have been yielded to him. Is it not better, therefore, that the whole truth should be known. Perhaps the very next deposition that may be taken will contain evidence in favor of the accused. If so, should we be warranted in excluding it? I think not.

I will avail myself, Mr. Speaker, of this occasion to advert to an imputation which has been made against this body in relation to the present subject. It has been often alleged, and has been suggested in debate to-day, that General Wilkinson is persecuted by this House. I, sir, have no hesitation in protesting against this insinuation. For all the actions of men we must look somewhere for motives. Where there is persecution there must be some design; and wherein, let me ask, can, according to any human probability, exist the inducements for this numerous assembly, collected from the various sections of this extended country, to combine and confederate against a single individual, occupying the sphere of a Brigadier General? Sir, when the thing is examined, it will appear at once irrational. I do not believe it. As for my own part, while I at this time forbear to give any opinion as to either the guilt or innocence of General Wilkinson, I disclaim any disposition to treat him with injustice. I feel no sentiment of enmity towards him; I only wish a fair disclosure of all the circumstances respecting the charges against him, and, when the evidence shall have been fully developed, I will then decide impartially upon it.

Mr. PEARSON said he should not have addressed the Speaker, had it not been for the observations which fell from the gentleman (Mr. Root) from New York. That gentleman appears desirous of suppressing an important part of the inquiry contemplated by the present resolution—a part, too, which has already undergone considerable investigation by the committee of the last session, and upon which more evidence has been reported than either of the other points of their inquiry. A volume of testimony has been collected, tending to prove the connexion of General Wilkinson with the agents of Spain—testimony important in its nature, and which has been almost providentially preserved. Is this alleged offence so trifling or the evidence so imperfect as to be totally disregarded; or does the gentleman suppose or wish, by striking off that part of the resolution to which his observations refer, to put to rest all future investigation, and quiet the public mind on a theme which has excited so much sensibility and so much indignation?

The gentleman, however, has stated that this is an old affair; that the administrations of Washington and Adams had some knowledge of it; that the Spanish connexion, if any existed, had long been at an end, and therefore it ought to be consigned to oblivion. He has also thought proper to state that Colonel McHenry, former Secretary of War, had received private letters on the subject of Wilkinson's connexion with the Spanish Government; that those letters were not deposited in the War office, and that no investigation did take place. It is true, sir, that this is an old affair—at least it had its origin many years ago—but that it has long been at an end is not equally certain; indeed, the documents before me—the report of the committee of last session—afford strong, if not incontestable evidence, of the existence of this Spanish connexion as late as the year 1804.

[Here Mr. P. read extracts from the depositions of James M. Bradford of New Orleans, Isaac Briggs, and William Simmons, Esq., Accountant of the War Department.]

From these depositions it appears, that in the year 1804, General Wilkinson expended about ten thousand dollars in the purchase of sugars at New Orleans; that this circumstance excited some suspicion as to the manner of General Wilkinson's obtaining so large a sum of money. He was questioned on the subject, and alleged that he had received it from Lieutenant Taylor, then military agent, for drafts on the United States. The Accountant of the War Department expressly states, that no such drafts were drawn, and that the only money that he appears to have received from Taylor, at any time, was three thousand dollars in April, 1804. Mr. Briggs, however, states that General Wilkinson did admit that he had received about the sum of ten thousand dollars, of a late Mexican coinage, in Campeachy bags, from the officers of Spain, but that it was due to him on account of former mercantile contracts with the Spanish Government.

Thus, sir, it appears that this "old business," as the gentleman terms it, has been continued, at least, to the year 1804. But, sir, had it ended at a period as distinct as its commencement, is it, therefore, expiated by the length of time? Does the statute of limitation bar an investigation? Is there a period when crimes are to be forgotten, and punishments not to be thought of? If so, I trust the period has not arrived, and the antiquity of the subject, hidden as this has been, adds additional claims to investigation. And the gentleman, by introducing his remarks, has afforded a strong reason in favor of our adopting the resolution in its present form. As to any information which may have been given to the two first Administrations, as far as I am able to understand, it was of that uncertain and questionable kind which could not, probably, lead to any certain result. It is, also, true, that information was given on the subject to Mr. Jefferson whilst President, and nothing was done, except, indeed, the mock court of inquiry, in 1808, which resulted in less than nothing. Not a record of their proceedings is now to be found, and the person accused has been permitted to pocket the papers. Part of these were, indeed, obtained from General Wilkinson, by the committee of last session, but they were deemed by the committee so unimportant and irrelevant (with the exception of A. Elliott's deposition, which was taken on the part of General Wilkinson,) as not to deserve a place in this report.

As to the private letters, which the gentleman has alluded to, in the possession of Colonel Mc-

Henry, I feel it my duty to remark that Colonel McHenry was summoned to attend the committee at the last session; that he produced several letters which were addressed to him in his private capacity, from persons in the Western country, stating their suspicions of General Wilkinson's connexion with the agents of Spain; those letters were laid before the committee, and they were allowed to use them as they thought proper. The committee (of which the gentleman from New York was a member) unanimously determined that those letters were not at all material to their inquiry, and it was deemed unnecessary even to take copies of them, which were frankly offered by Mr. McHenry. I think it, also, proper to state that Colonel McHenry informed the committee that the then Administration were not free from suspicion as to the purity of General Wilkinson; but, as mutual criminations were made by General Wayne and General Wilkinson, the Executive had directed an inquiry against General Wayne, and intended, at its termination, to proceed against General Wilkinson, but the death of General Wayne, and the change of Administration, prevented this determination from being carried into effect. If it should be that those who have gone before us have not done their duty, let us do ours.

Mr. Fisk said as it was his intention to give a different vote upon this question from that which he had given at the last session, he would state some of the reasons which had induced him to change his opinion. Whenever, said he, I have reflected upon the vote I gave upon that occasion, I have been more dissatisfied with it than with any vote I ever gave before or since. A similar resolution to this did pass this House during the last session, without much discussion, and by a large majority. It was referred to a committee, who, after much investigation, reported. What more was done, or what more, indeed, can be done by this House in relation to this subject, I am unable to say. And, without questioning the constitutionality of this proceeding, it may be inquired what good is to result from it? What is its object? And unless gentlemen will point out the probable benefit of this inquiry, and specify some object to which it is to be directed, why shall we go into it?

But, sir, it is not, in my opinion, perfectly clear and settled, that the Constitutional powers of this House do extend to inquiries of this nature. For, no one will pretend that it is a power to be found among those specifically delegated to Congress by the Constitution. If we do possess the power, it is by implication. And for what purpose is it implied? May it not, sir, well be questioned, whether the Constitution has delegated to Congress power to act in any case in which that act shall not be effectual and conclusive; in any matter in which their acts create no obligations, or impose no duty? If we proceed to the utmost extent contended for in this case, whose rights will be concluded by anything we shall do? Shall we impose an obligation, or enjoin a duty upon the President, or the officer into whose conduct it is proposed to inquire? Certainly not. Then, sir, for what purpose this laborious, expensive inquiry?

If the Constitution warrants us to make an inquiry of this kind, in any case, it must be on some great, urgent, and serious occasion; at a time when some evident danger may be averted by it, and some obvious good result from it. These investigations are not to be lightly instituted, for we may readily imagine cases in which such an inquiry as is now proposed would be productive of the most serious and fatal consequences, not only to the individual, but to this nation. When the inquiry commences, the officer is to be notified to attend. He is to be heard before the committee in his defence. This supposes the presence of the officer, and if he is not here, he is, I presume, to be ordered from the Army and his command to appear before us; any orders he may have from his superior officer to the contrary notwithstanding. He cannot, during the investigation, if it last two years, as this has, or will, if this resolution pass, be tried by any other tribunal, suspended, or cashiered; because it will not be contended even that any two tribunals of concurrent jurisdictions shall, in this country, proceed at the same time to try the same person for one and the same offence. For, if one should acquit, and the other convict, the accused is certain to be punished. To suspend or cashier him would be to prejudge his cause. He must, then, be retained in the service, whether guilty or not, till Congress shall proceed (and all large bodies move slowly) to determine their opinion upon the committee's report.

But suppose, sir, this House should, after their inquiry, form an opinion highly unfavorable to this officer, and even express that opinion in the form of a resolution, charging him with a violation of the orders of the Secretary of War. Has this officer not a right to deny the charge, and demand a trial by a court of inquiry, or a court martial? Certainly he has. If that court has a right to try, it has to acquit. Suppose it acquit the accused of the charge; to which must he submit? Shall he be acquitted by a court martial for a charge touching his conduct as an officer, and, after that acquittal, be removed by the President, and thus disgraced and sacrificed, because this House have expressed an unfavorable opinion concerning him, which opinion a competent tribunal to decide shall have declared to be incorrect and unjust? Really, sir, this is supposing no extreme case, but a case which may occur; and, if it should, in what manner would our proceedings be viewed by this nation? The rigorous and cruel operation of the precedent we are about to establish by adopting this resolution, may be such as cannot and will not be borne by the citizens of this community.

Why, then, sir, shall we be pressed into it? Nothing effectual and beneficial can result from it to the nation during this Congress, if ever. The scene of action is at a great distance. The inquiry is vastly extensive. Your committee are to inquire generally into the conduct of General

Wilkinson, and to send for persons and papers. To send where, but to New Orleans, the Mississippi Territory, and to places more distant? Is it expected that evidence can be procured from these places, examined, reported, and acted upon by this House before the fourth of March? It is impossible. In what, then, is all this proceeding to result but in an expense of the time of this House, and the money of this nation? At the last session, this inquiry was commenced, and, when Congress adjourned, it was left unfinished, and this is to be its fate the present session. We shall but leave it for the next Congress to finish or neglect, as they, in their wisdom, may decide. Therefore, sir, without expressing any opinion upon what may be called the merits of the case—the conduct which is to be the subject of this inquiry—I am decidedly opposed to the adopting of this resolution. It is recording a precedent, the constitutionality of which may be seriously questioned; the influence and operation of which, in other cases, and upon other occasions, if not in this case, may be productive of mutiny and disorder in your armies, embarrassment to the Executive, and of oppression and ruin to the individuals who may have the misfortune to be subjected to it. Let general rumor and common fame accuse any officer, however distinguished by his services, or honored with confidence, if this House direct an inquiry, the trial must be tremendous to that individual, although we have neither the power to acquit or convict him. It ought not to be instituted, unless there is, at least, a prospect that it may be concluded by the same Congress who commence it; which, in this instance, cannot be expected. It is to be a trial without end, and the officer, whether guilty or innocent, is neither to be dismissed, punished, or restored to his command, but, to remain in pay to defend his conduct for twenty years of his life, till Congress are ready to express an opinion, in answer to common fame, concerning him. And, as we cannot pretend to do more than express an opinion, I am willing to forbear even that, and vote against the passage of this resolution.

Mr. MACON said he was sorry that they had changed the form of the resolution. If he had been in the House at the time it was done, he should have objected to it, because the General could as well have attended that committee without a summons as he did last session the committee appointed to inquire into the state of the Army. It could not be possible, in the nature of things, that any committee which had been appointed could have refused to hear General Wilkinson if he had wished to have been heard. Mr. M. said he would not give any opinion as to the guilt or innocence of General Wilkinson. He wished not only him but every man in the nation to be innocent, and more particularly did he feel this wish in relation to one who had gone through the Revolution with as much honor as General Wilkinson did. Whenever such a man was convicted of any species of crime, it lessened the national character, which ought to be dear to every man. It was impossible that there could be anything like persecution in this case. Of what materials must a man be composed in this country, who was desirous of persecuting a man that went through the Revolution with glory? Every one must wish him to be innocent.

H. OF R.

General Wilkinson.

DECEMBER, 1810.

Upon the whole, Mr. M. said he should vote for the resolution, though he disapproved of part of it. He said it seemed to him as though it would be something like a censure on the former committee not to pursue the inquiry.

The Constitutional question he considered as settled. It had been again stirred, however, and gentlemen who last year had thought the inquiry Constitutional now seemed doubtful. But it had been said, that if they had the Constitutional power to inquire, it was a power which should not be exercised unless on great occasions, especially at a time when no man can tell how long the nation will now be in peace. If this were not one of those questions which demanded an immediate inquiry, he should like to know what was. What the President might have intended to do, Mr. M. said he knew not, unless from what had been suggested to-day. But whatever the President might do was nothing to him. If he wished his intention to be known to the House, he ought himself to communicate it by a message in writing. To whom did the Army belong? Was it a National or Executive army? It was the army of the nation, and the Legislature had a right to inquire into the state of it. If it was the army of the Executive, as in Monarchies, where the King can say my army, my navy, and everything was of the Executive and not of the nation, then he would admit that the House had not the right of inquiry. Suppose Aaron Burr had been Commander-in-Chief, and they could not have got clear of him in any other way; would not Congress have been justified in withholding his pay and that of the army? If they had not done so, they would have deserved the halter he was preparing for them. Everything belonging to appropriation, Mr. M. said, was peculiarly the property of this House; and in times of old the Republicans had been so tenacious of the rights of this House that they did not like an appropriation to originate in the Senate.

Another objection to the inquiry was, that it would not be completed within the session. This objection, Mr. M. said, would go to a vast many things at every second session of Congress. If it could not be finished, it might progress. A man who waits for lucky days on his plantation scarcely ever makes anything. It had been said too that the inquiry was ex parte. Was it more so than everything else in the House? Was it more so than the inquiry into the sickness at New Orleans—and yet no complaint had been made on that head. If the committee appointed on this subject had in view to take testimony to exculpate Wilkinson, they would, in Mr. M.'s opinion, not only deserve censure but expulsion. In every case of inquiry occurring in the House testimony was taken as it was last year and as proposed now. The argument of expense was equally weak. It was not the expense of inquiry, or even of the civil list, which made the nations of the earth groan under taxes too burdensome to be borne. It was something far different—it was armies and navies—the force which enabled some men to rise to greatness on the liberties of their country. It is these which produce taxes. The civil list and the expenses of inquiry are scarcely a drop in the bucket. It so happens, that we, like all other nations, make more to do about little expenses than about millions. If we cannot get along with this expense, we ought to put down some establishments much more expensive and certainly of no very great benefit. There are perhaps, even on the civil list, useless offices enough, if put down, to save sufficient to pay all the expenses of inquiry. He meant the loan officers of the different States. None of the objections to it having weight on his mind, he said he should vote for the resolution.

Mr. PITKIN said he rose simply to call the attention of gentlemen to a part of the report of a committee at the last session; about which he had heard nothing said as yet. It was that part relating to the mode of General Wilkinson's obtaining money from the public Treasury; not only, as it appeared to him from the documents, contrary to the Constitution, but directly contrary to every principle of law—and this was a part about which he presumed there was no question of the right of the House to make inquiry. And he thought, if gentlemen had read the report of the committee, it would be impossible for them, as guardians of the people's money, to hesitate to vote for further inquiry on the subject. That committee had before them, among other depositions, that of the Accountant of the War Department—and Mr. P. undertook to say, that it appeared from that deposition and the documents accompanying it, that General Wilkinson had got into his hands and still held thousands and tens of thousands of dollars of the public money, contrary to law. Mr. P. here quoted the deposition of Mr. Simmons on the subject. General Wilkinson had also, he said, drawn money from the Paymaster of the Army contrary to law; for which he had given only his receipt, and for which he had never accounted. He called the attention of the House also to another fact. It was stated by the Accountant of the War Department, that General Wilkinson had seen fit to direct the payment of money from the Treasury for the freight of his own flour from Baltimore to Charleston and Havana, during the time of the embargo. He had certified an account to be correct, and ordered the payment of the money, for the freight of a cargo of flour which was afterwards carried to Havana and there distributed by himself. Mr. P. wished to know whether it was understood that General Wilkinson was authorized to draw money from the Treasury for the freight of his own property from one part of the United States to another? Another thing in these documents, Mr. P. said, he would call the attention of gentleman to, of three or four years standing—to the case of General Wilkinson's directing payment out of the public money for the transportation of three or four thousand pounds weight of what was called his baggage to Pittsburg; loading therewith three or four wagons. Mr. P. quoted the deposition of Captain Peter, stating that payment had been made for the transportation of his private property by the public agent. Now he wished to know of gentlemen, if these depositions were correct, (and they had never been contradicted,) whether the House ought not to proceed in this inquiry? Ought they not to give to General Wilkinson at least an opportunity to refute them? And was it not their duty to inquire whether this money had been applied agreeably to law?

DECEMBER, 1810.

Proceedings.

H. OF R.

He said he could not refrain from calling the attention of the House to one other fact in relation to illegal drafts of money from the Treasury. It was a charge for horses purchased for the United States. [Mr. P. quoted the documents on this subject, relating to an alleged purchase of horses unnecessarily and at an extravagant price for the public service, in the sale of which it is insinuated in one of the depositions that the General was himself interested.] If the House are not to inquire into these things, (said Mr. P.) why let us all have an equal chance with the Commander of the Army, to freight our flour, transport our goods, and sell our horses. If these facts, stated in the documents, are true, on that ground, if on no other, we ought to prosecute the inquiry, and ascertain whether money is thus to be drawn from the Treasury contrary to the Constitution, and to law.

The final question on the resolution was decided as follows:

WEDNESDAY, December 19.

On motion of Mr. BASSETT,

Ordered, That the petitions of Amilie Eugenie Beaumarchais, heir and representative of the late Caron de Beaumarchais, deceased, by J. A. Chevallie, her attorney, presented the twenty-fourth of December, 1805, and the second of April, 1806; together with the Message of the sixth of February, 1807, from the President of the United States, and a report from the Secretary of State, of the fourteenth of December, 1807, upon the subject of the claim of the said representative, be referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. JOHN SMITH presented a petition of John Brumbach and others, of the State of Virginia, stating, that, in consequence of the renewal of the patent granted to Oliver Evans, for an improvement in mills for manufacturing flour, they have been and will be subjected to much inconvenience and expense in having, after the expiration and prior to the renewal of the patent, used the said improvement, and praying that Congress will exempt them, and all others similarly situated, from all damages which the said Evans may recover against them, and that they may continue to use the said improvement free of expense.—Referred to the committee appointed, on the twelfth instant, to inquire what alterations are necessary in the acts respecting patents.

Mr. MORROW, from the Committee on the Public Lands, presented a bill providing for the final adjustment of claims to lands, and for the sale of the public lands in the Territories of Orleans and Louisiana; which were read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Friday next.

On motion of Mr. JENNINGS,

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of extending the United States' road from Vincennes, Indiana Territory, to the Western boundary of the county of Dearborn, in the said Territory, so as to meet the State road from Chillicothe, in the State of Ohio, to the Western boundary of said State; with leave to report thereon by bill, or otherwise.

Mr. JENNINGS, Mr. KNICKERBACKER, and Mr. THOMPSON, were then appointed the said committee.

Mr. EPPES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, to whom was referred the President's Message of the twelfth instant, presented a bill making an additional appropriation for the relief and protection of distressed American seamen; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Friday next.

Mr. EPPES, from the same committee, also presented a bill to continue in force, for a further time, the first section of the act, entitled "An act further to protect the commerce and seamen of the United States against the Barbary Powers;" which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Friday next.

Ordered, That Mr. TROUP be excused from serving on the committee appointed yesterday, to inquire into the conduct of General James Wilkinson, and that Mr. BIBB be appointed in his place.

A motion was made by Mr. LOVE, that the House do come to the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to lay before this House information, first, of the amount of debts due from individuals and bodies corporate to the Bank of the United States, distinguishing the amount due by bond, mortgage, or other specialty, from that payable by notes, bills of exchange, or other surety, not under seal to the said bank and its branches, and what portion of said debts are considered as standing accommodation to the customers of said bank and its branches: Second, of the amount of notes of the said bank and its branches now in circulation: Thirdly, whether the revenue of the United States, or what portions of it, are ordered to be deposited in the said bank and its branches; whether any portion of it is ordered to be deposited in other, and, if so, what other banks; and what will be the probable amount of deposits in favor of the United States, in any of the said banks or their branches, and which of them, on the first day of March, in the year one thousand eight hundred and eleven.

The resolution was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. GOLD, from the committee appointed on the fourteenth instant, presented a bill to authorize the Secretary of War to ascertain and settle, by the appointment of Commissioners, the exterior line of the public land at West Point, with the adjoining proprietor; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. EPPES presented to the House a report from the Secretary of State to the Committee of Ways and Means, of the application of the moneys appropriated for the relief and protection of distressed American seamen; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. VAN HORN, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, presented a bill for continuing the charter of the Bank of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Friday next.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill fixing the compensation of the additional Assistant Postmaster General.

On motion of Mr. EPPES, the blank in the bill for the salary was filled with "$1,600."

The Committee rose and reported the bill as amended; which was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

STATE OF THE ARMY.

Mr. NEWTON said it would be recollected that the report of the committee appointed at the last session, to inquire into the cause or causes of the mortality in the army at New Orleans, owing to the late hour at which it had been introduced (the 27th April,) was not acted upon; he would, therefore, move that the report be referred to a Committee of the whole House.—Agreed to, 67 to 17.

Mr. SMILIE hoped that the vote on the reference might be reconsidered; as he considered it a procedure totally without precedent, that an unfinished act of the last session should be made the subject of reference in this informal way.

On this question of order, considerable debate took place; in which Messrs. SMILIE, PITKIN, WRIGHT, TAYLOR, W. ALSTON, and SOUTHARD, advocated the reconsideration, and Messrs. NEWTON, MILNOR, and MILLER, opposed it. The question was decided in favor of reconsideration; 49 to 39.

The question being taken on the reference of the report to a Committee of the Whole, it was lost.

Mr. NEWTON moved to refer it to a select committee.

This motion was declared to stand on the same ground in point of order as a motion to refer to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. NEWTON then introduced the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the cause or causes which produced the great mortality in the detachment of the Army of the United States, stationed at New Orleans, and that they have power to send for persons and papers.

Mr. TAYLOR moved an amendment to the resolution, which went to refer the consideration of this subject to the committee yesterday appointed to inquire into the conduct of General Wilkinson. He made this motion with a view, as General Wilkinson was evidently as much the object of this inquiry as of the other, that two committees should not sit at the same time for the same purpose; that two torturing irons should not be applied to the victim at the same time. Messrs. NEWTON, FINDLEY, and BACON, opposed the amendment offered by Mr. TAYLOR, on the ground that the subjects of inquiry were separate and distinct. It was not agreed to.

The question on the resolution of Mr. NEWTON was decided in its favor, yeas 66; and a committee of seven was appointed.

Mr. NEWTON, Mr. COCHRAN, Mr. WINN, Mr. MUMFORD, Mr. CRAWFORD, and Mr. CHAMPION, were then appointed a committee, pursuant to the said resolution.

THURSDAY, December 20.

A motion was made by Mr. JENNINGS, that the House do come to the following resolutions:

Resolved, That it is expedient that the Executive authorities of the several States and Territories, of the United States, respectively, should be authorized and directed, by law, to apprehend, secure, and deliver to the Governor of the Indiana Territory, for the time being, or his agent, any fugitive or fugitives from justice, upon demand being made of the Executive authority of any such State or Territory to which such fugitive or fugitives shall have fled, and upon producing an indictment found, or an affidavit made, before a magistrate of said Territory, charging the person so demanded with having committed treason, felony, or other crime, within the jurisdiction of the same.

Resolved, likewise, That it is expedient that any person holding an office or offices of profit or trust from the Governor of the Indiana Territory, (justices of the peace and militia officers excepted,) should be, by law, declared ineligible to and disqualified to act in either the House of Representatives or Legislative Council of said Territory, as members thereof, until such office or offices shall have been resigned, and such commission, with the resignation, shall have been transmitted to the office of the Secretary of the Territory aforesaid.

The resolution was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

An engrossed bill to fix the compensation of the additional Assistant Postmaster General was read the third time, and passed.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the bill for the relief of George Armroyd and Company.

No amendment being made, the bill was ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time tomorrow.

Mr. VAN HORN, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, presented a bill to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of Washington; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

Mr. BASSETT, from the committee appointed the nineteenth instant, presented a bill to incorporate the Protestant Episcopal Church in the town of Alexandria; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Tuesday next.

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION.

On motion of Mr. MACON, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, on the motion introduced by Mr. MACON, for adding to the Constitution the following article:

"No Senator or Representative, after having taken his seat, shall, during the time for which he was elected, be eligible to any civil appointment under the authority of the United States, nor shall any person be eligible to any such appointment until the expiration of the Presidential term, during which such person shall have been a Senator or Representative."

Mr. RHEA said that this amendment would go to curtail the privileges of our citizens, and to introduce an innovation of the Constitution. For these two ample reasons he moved to amend it by striking out the following words: "nor shall any person be eligible to any such appointment until the expiration of the Presidential term, during which such person shall have been a Senator or Representative."

Mr. MACON defended his proposition and opposed Mr. RHEA's motion. He said that the objection to his proposition because it was new, was not sound, if the motion was reasonable in itself. The amendment went to complete the intention of the framers of the Constitution, which was that no member of Congress should be appointed to any office. It would prevent party spirit from going too far for office; from making places when going out of office, to secure to itself some sort of power in other departments, when it could not retain it in the Legislature. As to depriving men of their right by coming to Congress, it was an empty argument; according to which the Constitution deprived men of their right by prohibiting a member from holding an office whilst in that capacity, or from serving in any office created while he was a member. But in what respect would this restriction affect the community? Could not offices as well be filled out of Congress as in it? Congress had already legislated as far as in their power on this subject by passing a law to prevent contractors from holding a seat on this floor.

The independence of the Legislature was the object. If there was no covetousness of office, if human nature was perfect, we should want no laws. But laws become necessary to check the frailties of our nature, and this provision would serve to repress the inordinate desire of man for office. Indeed, said he, it is as necessary almost to guard against a virtue as against a vice. Take the case of a man who has long been in Congress, whose worth all acknowledge, about to retire, and we know that he has not wherewithal to support himself—we should almost, forgetting our duty to the Constitution, be willing to make a place expressly for him.

Mr. M. said, it appeared to him that nothing could be more incorrect, as related to the independence of the Legislature, than for men to be sitting here, knowing that when they retired they were to have an office. Knowing that they were to have it, was not worse than wishing to have it; because in either case the independence of the expectant was destroyed. The practice of bestowing offices on members of the Legislature had already obtained to an extent not before known. It was a practice pleasing to members, and it would grow. Suppose any member wanted an appointment, and should go to his friends and get recommendations from twenty, thirty, or forty of them. Would it not operate almost as a command on the Executive, when he saw a majority of the Legislature declaring that this man ought to have an office? If he were to refuse he would soon feel the consequences.

Believing the purity of the Legislature to depend on the existence of such a provision as he had proposed, Mr. M. said, he could not consent to strike it out. Everything, said he, depends on the Legislature. Make the members of the Legislature office-hunters, and you make the nation so. If the Executive archives could be consulted, it would be seen that the applications for office in the nation at large had progressed much in the same proportion as those from the members of Congress. And is it not natural, sir, that the people who send a man to Congress, seeing him provided with a snug place, would want the same thing? I am willing to extend the principle; I am almost willing to go as far as upon the jury principle in trials for life. I am willing not only to exclude ourselves, but to exclude our kindred. Could anything be more mortifying, Mr. M. asked, than to see every little appointment in the nation given to the Legislature? To him it was a mortifying circumstance. He could mention names; but that it was always painful to him to do so. He had seen this practice growing with our growth; and, if not checked, it would come to be one of the greatest of evils. If the gentleman from Tennessee could demonstrate that there was such a poverty of talent in the nation, that, by the exclusion of members of Congress from office, the business of the nation would be arrested, he would vote for his motion, and not otherwise.

It had been said that the proposed amendment to the Constitution went to deprive the citizen of his right. It appeared to Mr. M. that this right of office was not a good thing. He knew that no man in the House was farther from office-hunting than the gentleman who made the motion—his remark applied to the subject, and had no particular application to men. If experience had not convinced gentlemen that something wanted doing, he despaired of convincing them. He hoped the motion would not be agreed to.

Mr. BOYD said that of the Republican principles of the gentleman last up, he had no doubt; but these principles might be carried too far to support themselves. The gentleman's argument supposed that the ability of those persons sent here being known to the President, they, therefore, ought not to be appointed to office. The argument was, because a person was recommended to office by the best men in the nation, he ought, therefore, not to be appointed. It went upon the supposition that the President, an officer chosen from the people for his superior virtue, would appoint venally. But let us beware, said Mr. B., of tinkering the Constitution. From the very innovation which the amendment proposes, I should oppose it; because it is necessary to the life and vigor of the Constitution that we meddle with it as little as possible. By so frequently altering the Constitution, we shall keep the people in a perpetual ferment, not knowing whether they have a polar star or not.

Mr. BURWELL considered the part proposed to be struck out as the most valuable part of the amendment. If that were struck out, there would be hardly any part of it worth retaining. This question, he said, was particularly fortunate for those composing the majority of Congress. It furnished them an opportunity to convince the world at large, that they were not governed by mercenary motives; that the course they pursued was dictated by their judgment alone. What could tend more to reconcile all parties in the nation, than a perfect confidence that no sinister motives governed the vote of any member of this House? And who could charge any member with corrupt motives when the Constitution had precluded him from office? This was indeed an occasion at which gentlemen ought to rejoice, as it would show the disinterestedness with which they supported the present or future President of the United States; and that, in giving their suffrage for a President, they were not influenced by interested motives. Mr. B. was willing himself to give this pledge.

The objection of the gentleman from Tennessee that this provision would abridge the privileges of the members, was entitled to very little weight indeed. The Constitution had already in this way abridged their privileges. It had already disqualified the members of Congress in a certain degree from holding office; this proposition went to extend the principle. The strength of a Government like this depends in a great degree on the confidence of the people in those who for the time being control its operations. He trusted that a majority of this House would prove to the people and to the world that they were governed by the purest motives. He called the attention of the House to the British Government. Was it not notorious, he asked, that whoever was prime minister could always command a majority in Parliament? Had it not been frequently seen that men one day in a small minority, could the next day, when raised to office, wield a majority of the same men as had before opposed them? What did this arise from? Was it not from the influence of the Treasury, not only on the borough part of the House of Commons, but on that part elected by the people themselves, the Government in the latter case acting not only on the Representative but on the people whom he represented? This example showed the importance of guarding at an early day against a similar corruption here.

There was but a single objection, in the opinion of Mr. B., to the adoption of the resolution—that gentlemen who were members of the House, whose talents and personal deportment might be known to the Executive, might advantageously be selected to office. But could the Executive have a thorough knowledge of such persons? Were there not reasons to induce them to hide their motives and character, and, desiring office, to regulate everything they said or did by their views to that object? Mr. B. said, he had himself supposed that talents were dispersed in every part of the Union, and that nothing was more absurd than to suppose that only one individual in the nation was competent to fill any office. Characters for office might be found in every part of the nation equally as fit and as well qualified as those who came here. Another consideration had great weight with him. However the Constitution might have guarded against the influence of members of Congress, it was nevertheless a fact that members, from their situation and knowledge of the nation at large had more influence than any individuals scattered through the country. There were few men of so much celebrity, so great talents, whose transcendent worth was so generally acknowledged that they were extensively known through the community. There was scarcely an individual, that had not been in Congress, that was known out of the State in which he resided. What was more important, he asked, in the selection of a person to fill the Chief Magistracy, than to make the members of Congress as impartial as possible, and to induce them to inquire accurately into the character of the person proposed for that high office. This was a time, in his opinion, when they should fortify themselves against the danger apprehended, and justly apprehended, by the gentleman from North Carolina. Mr. B. said he hoped there was virtue enough in this House to sanction this principle, although the gentleman from Tennessee supposed it would abridge the privileges of the citizen. It was a principle which might secure the purity of this House for many years to come. He hoped, therefore, the amendment would not succeed.

Amendment to the Constitution.

Mr. RHEA said he felt himself under considerable obligations to the gentleman from North Carolina for exempting him from the charge of office-hunting. He did not know that he should ever ask for or hold an office under the Government; but that would not prevent him from saying what he thought on this subject. A material objection against this proposition was one which had not yet been noticed. If it became a part of the Constitution, it would constantly create a powerful league among influential citizens, against the President of the United States, combined to get him out as soon as possible. The framers of the Constitution had completed this matter, as far as necessary, by declaring that no members of Congress should be eligible to any office created, or the emoluments whereof had been raised during the time for which he was elected. He had no objections to that part of the resolution which went on that ground; but he believed it should be with serious deliberation that anything like the remainder of the proposition was adopted. He was willing, without sacrificing his ideas of propriety and expediency, to leave to the world to judge of the propriety of his motives. The vote on this proposition would be but a bad criterion. His conduct should be judged by his votes in general, and not on this proposition. If such a vote as this was to purify all bad qualities, the Legislature which had taken the head of Charles the First, alluded to by the gentleman from North Carolina, might have passed this vote, and thus absolved themselves of the wrong they had done. If they went on in this way altering the Constitution, its form would in time be so much changed that the people would not recognise it. Instead of strengthening the principles of freedom, they might be frittered away till they were lost in chaos. Amendments ought to be made with a sparing hand. In the opinion of Mr. R. the present mode of election secured the purity of the House as far as the gentleman could desire. There were but two States in the Union in which Representatives were not elected long before their term of service commenced; during the whole of which time of probation they were precluded from office.

Mr. SMILIE made some observations favorable to the motion of Mr. MACON. He thought the purity of the representative body was essential to the existence of the Government; that the exclusion from office established by the Constitution was not sufficient, the abuses now being nearly as great as if no such exclusion existed—for there was but little difference in principle between a man's accepting an office, while a member, and his expecting to receive it at the end of the two years he had to serve.

The motion of Mr. RHEA was negatived, yeas 12.

Mr. BACON suggested some amendment in the phraseology of the resolution; and, doubts existing on the subject—

On motion, the Committee rose, and the resolution was, on the suggestion of Mr. SHEFFEY, referred to a select committee, with directions to report their opinion thereon.

Mr. MACON, Mr. PITKIN, Mr. BACON, Mr. SHEFFEY, and Mr. MITCHILL, were then appointed the said committee.

FRIDAY, December 21.

Two other members, to wit: from Virginia, JOHN CLOPTON, and WALTER JONES, appeared and took their seats; a new member, to wit: WILLIAM MCKINLEY, also from Virginia, appeared, was qualified, and took his seat.

On motion of Mr. SOUTHARD,

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the propriety of passing a law to prescribe the mode of taking evidence in cases of contested elections for members of the House of Representatives of the United States, and to compel the attendance of witnesses; and that the committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. SOUTHARD, Mr. LEWIS, and Mr. TURNER, were appointed.

On motion of Mr. MORROW,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the propriety of providing, by law, for the removal of the land office at Nashville, and the land office at Canton, so that they shall respectively be kept within the districts for which they were established; and that they inquire into the propriety of dispensing with the attendance of the Governor of the Mississippi Territory, at the public sales of the public land in the district East of Pearl river, as now directed by law; and that the committee report by bill, or otherwise.

Mr. PEARSON, Mr. QUINCY, Mr. JENNINGS, Mr. MCKIM, and Mr. GARLAND, were appointed the committee.

An engrossed bill for the relief of George Armroyd and Company was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MORROW, from the Committee on the Public Lands, presented a bill for the removal of the land office established at Nashville, in the State of Tennessee, and at Canton in the State of Ohio; and to authorize the register and receiver of public moneys to superintend the public sales of land in the district east of Pearl river; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

On motion of Mr. BACON,

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to lay before this House a statement of all such sums as may have been paid to the Consuls, Vice Consuls, Commercial Agents, or Vice Commercial Agents of the United States in foreign countries, by the masters or commanders of American vessels, for the purpose of constituting a fund for the relief of destitute American seamen in foreign ports, under the third section of the act supplementary to the act concerning Consuls and Vice Consuls, passed the twenty-eighth day of February, 1803.

On motion of Mr. SWOPE,

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before this House such information as he may possess relative to the duties as at present imposed by the Emperor of France, on all articles, the importation of which into the dominions of France is permitted on board of American vessels; and whether all articles, the produce of the American soil, will, on their exportation from the United States, obtain a free admission into the ports of France; and, if not, what articles of said produce are prohibited.

Mr. SWOPE and Mr. BLAISDELL were appointed a committee to present the said resolution to the President of the United States.

On motion of Mr. VAN HORN, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, 44 to 43, on the bill to continue the charter of the Bank of Alexandria.

A desultory discussion arose on the bill, it being objected to it that it barely recited the title of the law which it was proposed to continue, without specifying any of its provisions; and that a law on such a subject, giving exclusive privileges to a corporate body, should be enacted with the greatest precision and caution.

After an hour's discussion, in which Messrs. LOVE, TAYLOR, MILNOR, VAN HORN, QUINCY, TALLMADGE, BACON, SMILIE, and LEWIS partook; on motion of Mr. TAYLOR, the Committee rose and reported progress; and, leave to sit again being refused, the bill was recommitted to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

On motion of Mr. EPPES, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill making up the deficiency in the appropriation of 1810, for the relief of distressed American seamen in foreign countries. After some detailed statements from Mr. E. of the objects of this expenditure, the blank in the bill for the appropriation was filled with $75,559 89.

The Committee rose and reported the bill, which was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

On motion of Mr. EPPES, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for continuing in force the first section of an act entitled "An act further to protect the commerce and seamen of the United States against the Barbary Powers."

The Committee rose and reported the bill without amendment, which was passed to a third reading without opposition.

On motion of Mr. JENNINGS, the House took up for consideration the resolution offered by him yesterday.

On the suggestion of Messrs. QUINCY and PEARSON, the resolution was so varied as to refer the subject to a select committee, with a view to embrace an inquiry into the general state of the laws relative to fugitives from justice; which, it now stated, were very defective.

Mr. PEARSON, Mr. QUINCY, Mr. JENNINGS, Mr. McKIM, and Mr. GARLAND, were appointed the committee.

CULTURE OF HEMP.

Mr. SHEFFEY remarked that the interruption of commerce to the Baltic had given a spring to the culture of hemp in this country, which would be much relaxed if the commerce should be opened. He was, he said, one of those who had always considered the encouragement of agriculture as one of the first objects of a good Government. He, therefore, proposed, with a view to ascertain how far it was proper to encourage the culture of hemp, to offer a resolution to inquire into the subject. He did not know how far it would be proper to adopt the measure which he contemplated; he was not advised whether the culture in the United States was sufficient for the consumption. If so, he should feel disposed to restrict the importation from abroad. The Committee of Commerce and Manufactures would be best able to ascertain how far it was proper to protect the culture of our own raw material. He, therefore, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures be instructed to inquire into the expediency of encouraging the culture of hemp, by protecting impost duties, or prohibiting the importation of that article into the United States; and that the Committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. MITCHELL said he had no inclination to oppose the passage of the resolution, its object being merely to inquire; and resolutions for inquiry, generally speaking, were those which, of all others, the House ought to pass. He would just mention, however, his perfect conviction that the resources for the supply of this article were ample, and that enough could be raised on the Genessee flats and Walkill river in the State of New York, to supply the north, and in the State of Kentucky, to supply the South. The interruption of commerce with the Baltic, created an extraordinary price, which was bounty enough for the present. How far it might be necessary to extend the principle during free commerce, he did not say.

The resolution was agreed to without a division.

DECEMBER, 1810.

Titles to Land.

H. OF R.

TITLE TO LANDS.

Mr. VAN HORN presented the memorial of the United Wabash and Illinois Company, stating, that they purchased certain lands from the Indians in the year 1773, and praying from the United States a confirmation of their title to such part of the same as Congress shall deem expedient. Mr. VAN H. moved to refer the memorial to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. McKEE objected to the reference on the ground that it was a subject on which Congress had frequently legislated, and had shown their indisposition to comply with the wishes of the memorialists; and that it, therefore, would be a waste of time to refer a petition on the principle of which the House had so frequently decided.

Mr. VAN HORN replied, that the right of petition was one secured to every citizen by the Constitution; and that the House was bound to listen to their prayers; that this was a subject of great importance to the petitioners, and their claim was one which a committee of Congress had so far recognised, in 1801, as to recommend a compromise of it. Besides, the reference of every petition was a matter of course.

The reference as proposed was agreed to.

And, on motion, the House adjourned until Monday.

MONDAY, December 24.

Three other members, to wit: WILLIAM HALE, from New Hampshire; BENJAMIN PICKMAN, JR., from Massachusetts; and THOMAS NEWBOLD, from New Jersey; appeared, and took their seats.

Mr. SEYBERT presented a petition of the members of the Chamber of Commerce, in the city of Philadelphia, praying the renewal of the charter of incorporation of the Bank of the United States.—Referred to the committee appointed, on the eighteenth instant, on the petition of the stockholders of the said bank.

An engrossed bill making an additional appropriation to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for the relief and protection of distressed American seamen, during the year one thousand eight hundred and ten, was read the third time, and passed.

An engrossed bill to continue in force, for a further time, the first section of the act, entitled "An act further to protect the commerce and seamen of the United States against the Barbary Powers," was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HOLLAND, from the committee appointed on the petition of Return J. Meigs and others, presented a bill giving a further compensation to the witnesses who attended the trial of Aaron Burr, before the circuit court of the United States, for the district of Virginia; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Thursday next.

The House went into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill providing for final adjustment of claims to lands, and for the sale of the public lands in the Territories of Orleans and Indiana. After some inconsiderable amendments to the bill, the Committee rose and reported the bill, which was ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. SHEFFEY,

Ordered, That the several memorials and petitions of the late Revolutionary army, presented in December, 1808, and January 1809, be referred to a select committee.

Mr. SHEFFEY, Mr. HALE, Mr. SHAW, Mr. TRACY, and Mr. WILLIS ALSTON, were then appointed the said committee.

On motion of Mr. POINDEXTER,

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to lay before this House such information as he may possess relative to the claim of the Board of Commissioners west of Pearl river, in the Mississippi Territory, to additional compensation for their services; together with his opinion as to the equity of said claim.

The House went into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill authorizing the Secretary of War, by the appointment of Commissioners, to ascertain the exterior line of the public lands at West Point, &c. The bill was so amended as to leave the ultimate decision on the report of the Commissioners to Congress. The Committee reported the bill as amended, which was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The SPEAKER presented a letter and memorial of Peter Landais, praying to be allowed and paid his share of prize money in three vessels captured by him in the Revolutionary war, while commander of the United States' frigate Albion.

A motion was made by Mr. MONTGOMERY, that the said letter and memorial be referred to the Committee of Claims; and the question being taken thereon, it passed in the negative.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, prepared in obedience to the act regulating the currency of foreign coins in the United States; which was read, and referred to the committee appointed, the fourteenth instant, on the bill from the Senate further to suspend, in part, the act, entitled "An act regulating foreign coins, and for other purposes."

On motion of Mr. BACON,

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of providing for the formation and printing of a complete general index to the several volumes of the laws of the United States, as now published, including those which may be passed at the present session of Congress; and that they have leave to report by bill, or otherwise.

Mr. BACON, Mr. MATTHEWS, and Mr. JONES, were appointed.

On motion of Mr. MORROW, the Committee of the Whole was discharged from the consideration of the bill for the removal of the land office established at Nashville, in the State of Tennessee, and Canton, in the State of Ohio, and to authorize the Register and Receiver of Public Moneys to superintend the public sales of lands in the district east of Pearl river; and it was re-committed to the Committee on Public Lands.

CLAIMS FOR MILITARY SERVICES.

Mr. MORROW, from the Committee on the Public Lands, made a report on the several petitions of the officers and soldiers, and the heirs of officers and soldiers who served in the British army in America, in the war between Great Britain and France; which was read, and the resolution therein contained concurred in by the House.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred several petitions, claiming lands for military services, performed in the war of 1755, between Great Britain and France, report:

That, considering the subject-matter of the said petitions highly important, on account of the interest it has recently excited, and the speculation it has given rise to in various parts of the United States, the committee have carefully examined the State papers and public documents, of the period of the above war, to ascertain the original foundation of the supposed claim. In pursuing this investigation, the committee have not been able to discover that any engagement or contract whatever was made or entered into by the Government, or under the authority of Great Britain, with the officers and soldiers of the provincial troops, serving in the war aforesaid, for a grant of lands, either as an encouragement to their entering into the service, or as a compensation for services. All that the committee have been able to find on the subject is in a proclamation of the King of Great Britain, of the 7th of October, 1763, (after the closing of the war and disbanding of the troops,) and is in the following words:

"And whereas we are desirous, upon all occasions, to testify our royal sense and approbation of the conduct and bravery of the officers and soldiers of our army, and to reward the same, we do hereby command and empower our Governors of the several provinces on the continent of North America to grant, without fee or reward, to such reduced officers as have served in North America during the late war, and are actually residing there, and shall personally apply for the same, the following quantities of land, subject, at the expiration of ten years, to the same quit-rents as other lands are subject to, in the province within which they are granted, as also subject to the same conditions of cultivation and improvement, viz:

"To every person having the rank of a field officer, 5,000 acres.

"To every captain, 3,000 acres.

"To every subaltern or staff officer, 2,600 acres.

"To every non-commissioned officer, 200 acres.

"To every private man, 50 acres.

"We do likewise authorize and require the Governors and commanders-in-chief of all our said colonies, upon the continent of North America, to grant the like quantities of land, and upon the same conditions, to such reduced officers of our navy of like rank, as served on board of our ships of war, in North America, at the times of the reduction of Louisbourg and Quebec, in the late war, and who shall personally apply to our respective Governors for such grants."

In this State paper, the committee can perceive no foundation whatever for the present claim upon the United States. Instead of a contract with the officers and soldiers for land, the proclamation contains a mere instruction to the provincial Governors—an instruction emanating from the munificence of the Sovereign, and for conferring a gratuity, not issued for the satisfaction of any previous claim or demand upon Government. That the grant intended by the above proclamation was rather a testimony of respect and approbation, than a donation of value, appears from the prescribed terms on which it was to be made, they being the same on which lands were granted to others in the provinces, with the exception, that the military grants were to be made free of office fees, and exempt from payment of quit-rents for ten years. Had application been made to the land offices of the provincial governments, as was the duty of all the claimants, there can be no doubt but that grants would have been readily made to the full extent of the bounty intended by the proclamation, subject, however, to the usual condition for settlement and improvement. Forty-seven years have now elapsed since the foregoing proclamation, during which period the above claims have laid dormant, and the committee do conceive, that, upon fair and just principles, those claims would have been considered derelict and abandoned had the Government, under which they arose, continued; but to admit them against the United States, placed as they now are, under a Government founded on a revolution, which has intervened, is required by no principle of justice, and would, in the opinion of the committee, be an unauthorized disposition and sacrifice of the public property of the United States. On no principle of national law, or by any treaty or convention between the United States and Great Britain, are the United States bound to perform the engagements of the former Government of Great Britain, especially for mere bounties; nor would the purposes for which the several States have ceded land, within their respective jurisdictions, to the United States, warrant the appropriation of those lands for the satisfaction of the claims in question, were the same better founded than by the committee they are conceived to be. The committee, therefore, beg leave to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the prayer of the petitioners ought not to be granted.

NAVY AGENTS' ACCOUNTS.

Mr. SWOOPÉ said that in the course of the session of Congress held in June, 1809, a report in part had been made by a committee generally called the investigating committee. Among the accounts comprised in this report, he said he had found two which bore mystery on the face of them; a desire to unravel which was the motive for his rising. The accounts to which he referred were those of Degen, Purviance, and Company, Navy Agents at Leghorn. By settlement the first, at the Navy Department, on the 30th June, 1808, the United States appeared to be indebted to them more than $23,000. By a reference to an account settled in March, 1809, he found that bills to the amount of $256,000, bearing date prior to the first settlement (viz: from May 1805, to February 1807,) were charged to them. For the purpose of obtaining the means of reconciling these apparent inconsistencies, he moved the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to explain to this House the cause wherefore the several bills of exchange amounting to $256,000, and of various dates, from May 10th, 1805, to February 21, 1807, were charged in account No. 2, of Degen, Purviance, and Company, Navy Agents, at Leghorn, as settled at the Navy Department on the 17th day of March, 1809, and for what reasons the same were not included in the account of the said Degen and Company, which was settled in the Navy Department on the 30th of June, 1808; and also to inform this House whether the said bills were purchased by the then Secretary of the Navy, or by a Navy Agent, if by the latter, that a copy of the said Navy Agent's accounts embracing the period of purchase, also accompany the information required.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to lay before the House any information which he may have obtained through our Minister in France, in answer to the letter addressed to him on the 26th day of June, 1809, (or from any other source,) relative to the funds which the drawers of bills (from May 10, 1805, to February 21, 1807,) on Degen, Purviance, and Company, Navy Agents at Leghorn, had in the hands of the said Degen and Company, at the time of the transmission of said bills, or, at the time when they were passed to the credit of the United States by the said Navy Agents.

These resolutions were agreed to without opposition.

To-morrow being Christmas day, the House adjourned to Wednesday—62 to 23.

WEDNESDAY, December 26.

On motion of Mr. MORROW,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire what provision ought to be made respecting the location of Virginia land warrants, west of the boundary line designated by the act of the twenty-third day of March, 1804, and that they report by bill, or otherwise.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON,

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to revise and bring in a bill to amend the several laws and parts of laws of Congress, establishing trading-houses with the Indian tribes, and for other purposes of Indian trade and intercourse.

Mr. JOHNSON, Mr. P. B. PORTER, Mr. LYLE, Mr. MCKINLEY, and Mr. STANLEY, were then appointed the said committee.

A motion was made by Mr. MCKINLEY, that the House do come to the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of appropriating a sum of money, not exceeding — dollars, for the purpose of improving the post road leading from Washington City to Marietta, in the State of Ohio, to be laid out under the direction of the President of the United States, and to be repaid out of the fund "for opening turnpike and other roads leading from the waters of the Atlantic to the Ohio river, and to the State of Ohio;" and that they report by bill, or otherwise.

And the question being taken thereon, it was determined in the negative.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for incorporating the Protestant Episcopal Church of the town of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose, and had leave to sit again.

Mr. MORROW, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to whom was recommended the bill providing for the removal of the land office established at Nashville, in the State of Tennessee, and Canton, in the State of Ohio, and to authorize the Register and Receiver of Public Moneys to superintend the public sales of land in the district east of Pearl river, reported several amendments thereto; which were read, and, together with the bill, committed to a Committee of the Whole on Friday next.

Mr. BURWELL offered the following resolution, remarking that a similar resolution had been adopted in 1804, and a bill reported, but not acted on from the pressure of other business; and he presumed there could be no objection to providing a remedy in a case where the omission had been entirely by accident. This limitation of time for entering claims, Mr. B. said, was almost unknown in any other country than the United States, and generally affected most severely those who were particularly entitled to indulgence. All those persons who might be supposed to be disposed to defraud the public were always attentive to their interests; but there was a class of honest claimants who were inattentive, and who were generally the sufferers by the act of limitation.

The following is the resolution offered by Mr. BURWELL, which was referred, on the suggestion of Mr. POINDEXTER, to the Committee on Public Lands:

"Resolved, That a further time of six months ought to be allowed to claimants to land in the State of Georgia, south of the State of Tennessee, to register the evidences of their titles with the Secretary of State of the United States."

THURSDAY, December 27.

Ordered, That the representation of the Legislature of the State of Georgia, in relation to their disputed boundary with North Carolina, presented the twenty-sixth of April last, be referred to a select committee.

Messrs. BIBB, MACON, CALHOUN, STEPHENSON, and RINGGOLD, were appointed the said committee.

Mr. MACON, from the committee appointed, on the seventeenth instant, on a petition of the Legislature of the Territory of Orleans, presented a bill to enable the people of the Territory of Orleans to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, and for other purposes; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill providing for the final adjustment of claims to lands and for the sale of the public lands in the Territories of Orleans and Indiana.

After several abortive attempts to amend the bill, viz. by Mr. POINDEXTER, to insert a provision respecting the mode of taking evidence in relation to land titles; by Mr. BIBB, to strike out so much of the bill as gives to settlers on these lands a right of pre-emption; and by Mr. JOHNSON, to add a provision giving an advantage to persons having erected mills on the lands—the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

An engrossed bill to authorize the Secretary of War to ascertain and settle, by the appointment of Commissioners, the exterior line of the public land at West Point with the adjoining proprietor, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ROOT, from the Committee of Claims, reported unfavorably to the petition of Richard Taylor, and favorably to the petitions of Amey Dardin and Jared Shattuck.—Reports committed.

NAVY AGENT AT LEGHORN.

Mr. MONTGOMERY said it would be remembered that on the 24th of the present month two resolutions had been adopted on the subject of bills of exchange on the Navy Agent at Leghorn. He confessed he was much gratified at the subject's having been brought forward, as it had been much agitated in some parts of the United States. He was desirous of a full development of the transaction. He had examined the resolutions, and did not think, from the language of them, that all the information would be procured by them that was desirable. He therefore rose to submit the following resolution, to which he presumed there could be no objection:

Resolved, That, in addition to the statement required by the two resolutions of this House, passed the twenty-fourth of this month, in relation to certain bills of exchange drawn on the Navy agents at Leghorn, the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of the Navy be severally directed to lay before this House such further information relative to the case as may be in their possession, and as may be necessary to a full knowledge of the subject.

WITNESSES ON BURR'S TRIAL.

On motion of Mr. HOLLAND, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill making further compensation to the witnesses attending on Burr's trial at Richmond.

The following is the bill:

"Be it enacted, &c., That the witnesses who attended at Richmond, on the trial of Aaron Burr, be allowed — per day, and — cents per mile, in addition to their former compensation: Provided, That the same does not exceed three dollars per day, for their attendance at Richmond, and twelve and a half cents per mile, travelling from and returning to their respective places of residence."

The bill having gone through the Committee, was reported to the House.

On the question of filling the first blank with the sum of one dollar and seventy-five cents—

Messrs. MACON and PITKIN opposed it on the ground that it was improper to distinguish this case from others occurring before the Supreme Court. If compensation was due from the Government in one case, it was doubtless due in others also. No doubt, it was said, sacrifices were made by some of those gentlemen who attended, and it was a heavy tax on them; but it was a tax which all citizens of the United States were liable to pay when called upon to give testimony—it was a tax which they paid for their liberty. If the general provision by law was not adequate, it ought to be increased; but the witnesses had attended with a full knowledge of what they had to expect, and it would be improper to make this case an exception from the general rule.

Mr. HOLLAND and Mr. POINDEXTER contended, in reply, that this was a case different from all others and therefore ought to be taken out of the general rule; that the Attorney General of Virginia and the clerk of the court had each actually received $1,000 for additional services, though they had no occasion to move a step from home in the business, and one thousand dollars had been given by the Government to a reporter for a fair report of the case. It was said that it could not be argued that this was a case inferior in importance to the impeachment of Chase; and yet in that case as much had been allowed as was here asked. It was also said that in this case a particular request had been made to each individual to attend, in order to insure a trial; and that the witnesses had therefore attended, though at great loss.

The question on filling the blank was negatived, 46 to 27.

The question on filling the second blank with seven and a half or with five was also lost.

Mr. LEWIS moved to fill the blank with one dollar and fifty cents.

Mr. BASSETT made a motion superseding that, viz. to postpone the bill indefinitely. For indefinite postponement 54; against it 25.

So the bill was lost.

CURRENCY OF FOREIGN COINS.

Mr. QUINCY, from the committee to whom was referred, on the fourteenth instant, the bill sent from the Senate to suspend the second section of the act, entitled "An act regulating foreign coins, and for other purposes," made a report; which was read, and, together with the bill, referred to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

The report is as follows:

That the general design of the bill being to increase the current money of the United States, by authorizing foreign gold and silver coins again to become a legal tender, is important in its object, and may be beneficial in its consequences. It is very apparent, that the denial to foreign coins of the privileges of currency, and of being a legal tender, has, at once, the combined effect of circumscribing the just sphere of mercantile action, and of encouraging the exportation of that species of coin, to which these privileges are denied. In the present circumstances of the United States, it seems particularly inadvisable to permit any statute prohibitions to continue, which have a tendency to produce such an effect. The statute currency of the United States, which now consists only of the coinage of the Mint of the United States, and of Spanish milled dollars and parts of dollars, is, also, probably insufficient for the ordinary purposes of domestic exchange, and is certainly wholly inadequate to support any peculiar embarrassment of our circulating medium, which, in the event of the dissolution of the Bank of the United States, cannot but be anticipated. Your committee were, therefore, of opinion, that foreign gold coins ought to be made current money and a legal tender.

DECEMBER, 1810.

Currency of Foreign Coins.

Your committee, having caused a letter to be addressed to the Secretary of the Treasury, in relation to the former statute rate at which foreign coins were made current, received from him the two letters accompanying this report. From which it appears, that the gold coins of Spain and its dominions, had been estimated by the former statute of the United States, at a rate of four per cent. above their intrinsic value; in other words, that the quantity of pure gold contained in twenty-seven grains and two-fifths of a grain of Spanish standard coin, instead of being equal to one hundred cents, the statute rate, was only equal in value to about ninety-six cents.

Upon receiving this information, two general inquiries were suggested for the consideration of the committee. 1st. Whether, in again vesting Spanish gold coin with the character of current money of the United States, it were expedient to establish the old statute rate, now discovered to be erroneous, or, whether a new statute rate for it should be established, which should conform to its intrinsic value? 2d. Upon the supposition that it should be deemed advisable to enact a new statute rate for it, conformable to its intrinsic value, whether, as a loss of four per cent. upon all the Spanish gold in the United States, would thus be incurred, by the present holders, in consequence of no fault of theirs, but solely by reason of the erroneous estimate of a law of the United States, any moral or equitable considerations required that this loss should be assumed by the United States?

Concerning the first object of inquiry, the committee will attempt to add nothing to the satisfactory elucidation contained in the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, and only express their entire concurrence with his opinion, that "the statute rate of these coins should be made to conform with their intrinsic value."

With respect to the second inquiry, which the Secretary represents as "of a more doubtful nature," the committee were of opinion, that, whatever equitable considerations might exist, the attempt to apply relief under the particular circumstances of this loss, was inexpedient, and, for the most part, impracticable. For, it is very apparent, that there is no foundation or color for indemnification, on account of any receipts of these coins, subsequent to the 10th of April, 1809, when the law making them a legal tender expired. Now, so far as it respects individuals, the cases (if such in fact exist) in which the present holders of those coins received them, antecedent to that period, must be so extremely rare, as to render a general provision for their relief scarcely necessary. And, as to banks, such is the successive circulation of specie through their vaults, that it is hardly to be supposed, that any one institution in the United States could distinguish the amount of this species of coin, which it had received prior to the 10th of April, 1809, from that which it had received subsequently. And, although, in a few instances, this might be the case, yet, it seems far better that in these, the loss should remain where it has fallen, than that the community should be exposed to the multiplied frauds and inconveniences which the attempt to indemnify, upon any general principle, would inevitably introduce.

Your committee, upon recurring to the acts existing on the subject of the bill from the Senate, in connexion with the proposed alteration in the rate of Spanish gold coins, found that the operation of the respective provisions would be embarrassed and confused, in their nature, and inconvenient in their form. The bill from the Senate, proposed to suspend the second section of "An act regulating foreign coins and for other purposes." This act passed on the 9th of February, 1793, and the effect of this suspension was, to revive the provisions of the act passed on the 10th of April, 1806. Whether the intended, would be the legal result, your committee had some doubt. But they had none that the proposed, was a very inconvenient circuit, to a direct object. They were also of opinion, that it was highly expedient that all the provisions, touching a subject of such universal concern, should be concentrated in one bill, and divested of everything which might embarrass research. They, therefore, report the whole bill from the Senate stricken out, after the enacting clause, and propose an amendment, comprehending all the provisions necessary on the subject of the currency of foreign coins.

Strike out from the word "that," in the second line, and insert,

From and after the passage of this act, foreign gold and silver coins shall pass current as money within the United States, and be a legal tender for the payment of all debts and demands, at the several and respective rates following, and not otherwise, viz :

The gold coins of Great Britain and Portugal, of their present standard, at the rate of one hundred cents for every twenty-seven grains of the actual weight thereof; the gold coins of Spain, and the dominions of Spain, of their present standard, at the rate of one hundred cents for every twenty-eight grains and sixty hundredths of a grain of the actual weight thereof. Spanish milled dollars, at the rate of one hundred cents for each, the actual weight whereof shall not be less than seventeen pennyweights and seven grains, and in proportion for the parts of a dollar. Crowns of France, at the rate of one hundred and ten cents for each crown, the actual weight whereof shall not be less than eighteen pennyweights and fifteen grains and an half of a grain, and in proportion for the parts of a crown. And it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, to cause assays of the foreign gold and silver coins made current by this act, to be had at the Mint of the United States at least once in every year, and to make a report of the result thereof to Congress, for the purpose of enabling them to make such alterations in this act as may become requisite from the real standard value of such foreign coins. And it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, to cause assays of the foreign gold and silver coins, of the description made current by this act, which shall issue subsequently to the passage of this act, and shall circulate in the United States, at the Mint aforesaid, at least once in every year, and to make report of the result thereof to Congress, for the purpose of enabling Congress to make such coins current, if they shall deem the same proper, at their real standard value.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That, at the expiration of three years from and after the passing of this act, all foreign gold coins, and all foreign silver coins, except Spanish milled dollars, and parts of such dollars, shall cease to be a legal tender as aforesaid.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the act, entitled "An act regulating the currency of foreign coins in the United States," and also every section and parts of sections of any act or acts heretofore passed relative to the currency of foreign coins in the United States, be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Dec. 17, 1810.

SIR: I had the honor to receive your letter of the 14th and 15th instant. The assays for the year 1810 are daily expected, but not yet received. I, therefore, beg leave to refer the committee to those made according to law, in the year 1809, the result of which is exhibited in the letter of 29th June, 1809, from the Director of the Mint, annexed to the report from this Department, of 8th December, 1809.

It appears from those assays that the intrinsic value of all foreign coins, the gold coins of Spain excepted, which were made a legal tender by the act of 10th of April, 1806, either agrees precisely with the legal value fixed by that act, or differs from it by so small a fraction, as to render any alteration in that respect unnecessary. But the difference in the value of Spanish gold coins is considerable.

It will be recollected, that the value of gold coins of the United States is established in conformity with the following principles, viz:

1st. The unit, or silver dollar, contains  $371\frac{1}{4}$  grains of pure silver.

2d. The comparative value of gold and silver is in the ratio of 15 to 1; that is to say, that fifteen ounces of pure silver, are, according to law, equal in value to one ounce of pure gold.

3d. The standard gold, or that of which gold coins of the United States are made, contains eleven parts of pure gold and one part of alloy; or one-twelfth part of its weight is alloy.

Thence it follows, 1st, that  $24\frac{1}{2}$  (being the 15th part of  $371\frac{1}{4}$ ) pure gold, are equal to one dollar. 2dly, that 27 grains of standard gold of the United States, containing  $24\frac{1}{2}$  grains of pure gold, are also equal to one dollar.

In fixing the rate at which foreign coins should pass, the object was to ascertain the standard, or quantity of pure gold contained in a given weight, and to place them, according to that intrinsic value, exactly on a par with coins of the United States. The act of 10th of April, 1806, was predicated on the supposition that 27 2-5 grains of Spanish standard gold contained  $24\frac{1}{2}$  grains of pure gold, and were, therefore, equal in value to 27 grains standard gold of the United States, or to one dollar current money of the United States. But that supposition is proven by the assays to have been erroneous; the standard of Spanish gold coins being worse, or containing more alloy, than was then believed. That standard varies according to the years of the coinage. The coins of the year 1806, are the lowest and worst by more than four and a half per cent., than the value fixed by the act of 10th of May, 1806. Those of the year 1807, are worse than those of the year prior to 1806; and those of the year 1808, are worse than those of 1807. Those of the years prior to 1806, though better than the subsequent coinages, are almost three and a half per cent. worse than the value fixed by the act of May, 1806.

Taking the general average of the several coinages, it appears that they should be taken at the rate of 28 53-100 grains, (instead of 27 40-100) for one dollar; and that the difference between their intrinsic value and that fixed by the act of April, 1806, is almost four per cent. (3 986-1000 per cent.)

If, therefore, the act should be revived, without any alteration, every person receiving those coins in payment, would, in fact, be compelled to receive only ninety-six instead of one hundred cents on every dollar paid to him. The unavoidable effect of putting in circulation any one species of coin, at a rate higher than its known intrinsic value, is to invite its importation and increased circulation, and to drive out of circulation the other species. Every bank, if called to pay its notes in specie, will, in that case, pay with that species of coin; and the whole paper circulating medium must, after a while, be depreciated in the same proportion. The only guard against the abuse, and consequent depreciation of bank paper, is a strict adherence to the principle, that payment may, at any time, be demanded in specie, rated at its intrinsic value.

On the other hand, it is not less true, that the gold coins of Spain, were made a legal tender by law, for a certain number of years, at a higher rate than they were really worth; that, to the very last day of that period, every person was compelled to receive them in payment, at that rate; and that, at the expiration of the period, a quantity of that gold necessarily remained in the hands of some persons, on whom the loss falls, by the unavoidable effect of the law, and without any fault of theirs. It is in order to relieve those persons, that it is proposed to make the loss fall on the community, by reviving the law, without alteration; that is to say, by putting again the coins in circulation, at a higher rate than their intrinsic value.

The two questions put by the committee, are, whether, the statute rate of these coins should not be made to conform with their intrinsic value, and whether, in order to relieve individuals from the loss resulting from the late erroneous legal estimate of their value, it would not be eligible that the difference should be paid by Government.

To the first question, I can have no hesitation, for the above-mentioned reasons, to answer in the affirmative. The second question is of a more doubtful nature. But if it shall be thought just, that the loss should fall on the community, rather than on individuals, it will certainly be preferable to pay at once the difference, rather than knowingly to make the coins again a legal tender, at a higher rate than they are worth. Should that measure be adopted, the mode proposed by the committee, viz: to direct the Mint to receive that species of gold, for a short time, at the former statute rate, the United States paying the difference, appears also the most simple and eligible manner of effecting the object. The following provisions are, in that case, respectfully suggested:

1st. That, as the assays of the coins of the years 1809 and 1810, have not yet been received, and, as Spanish gold ceased to be a legal tender early in the year 1809, the revival of the law making them a legal tender should apply only to coins coined prior to the year 1809.

2d. That, for the same reasons, the statute value should be fixed at a rate not higher than the average, of the assays heretofore made; that is to say, that they should pass at a rate not higher than 28 53-100 grains, for one hundred cents.

3d. That, for the same reasons, the obligation on the Mint to receive those coins, at their former statute rate, should be limited to coins coined prior to the year 1809.

coins shall be received at the Mint, at their former statute value, be made so short as to preclude the possibility of embracing speculative importations. One month from the passing of the law would seem sufficient.

5th. That no such coin shall be thus received at the Mint, at its former statute value, unless proof, or at least an affidavit be made, that the persons claiming the benefit of the provision, had actually received the same at that value prior to the time when the law making it a legal tender expired.

It will also be necessary, in that case, that an appropriation should be made to enable the Mint to carry the provision into effect. The amount of that appropriation should be at the rate of four per cent. on the supposed amount of Spanish gold now in the United States, which may be embraced by such provisions. But, having no knowledge whatever of that amount, I cannot suggest any precise sum.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Dec. 24, 1810.

SIR: This year's assays have been received, and will be sent to-morrow to Congress. These make the average for French gold coins 27 52-100 grains, and for Spanish coins, 28 62-100. It must also be observed, that French crowns were rated too low. Instead of its being necessary that they should weigh 18 penny-weights and 17 grains, they ought to be received, if weighing 18 penny-weights and 15½ grains; it appearing from the assays, that, if of the first-mentioned weight, they are worth 110 cents and 36-100 of a cent, instead of 110 cents.

I have the honor to be, &c.

FRIDAY, December 28.

Mr. McKIM presented a petition from the merchants of Baltimore, in the State of Maryland, to the same effect with the petition from the merchants of the city of New York, presented the thirteenth instant.—Referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

On motion of Mr. W. ALSTON,

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before this House an account of the expenditure of the money appropriated on the first of May, one thousand eight hundred and ten, for completing the Capitol, and for other purposes, distinguishing the sums expended for each item of appropriation, and the sums expended in payment of debts previously incurred.

Messrs. ALSTON and RICHARDS were appointed a committee to present the foregoing resolution to the President of the United States.

Mr. BASSETT, from the Committee on the Naval Establishment, to whom was referred the several petitions of the officers of the Navy, presented a bill in relation to the pensions and rations of the officers of the Navy; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

Mr. BACON, from the committee appointed on the twenty-fourth instant, presented a bill authorizing the Secretary of State to cause a general index to the laws of the United States to be made, printed, and distributed; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Tuesday next.

Mr. MORROW, from the Committee on the Public Lands, made a report respecting the location of Virginia military land warrants, in pursuance of a resolution of the twenty-sixth instant; which was read, and referred to a Committee of the Whole on Tuesday next.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of a select committee on the petition of Alexander Scott, of South Carolina; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose, and had leave to sit again.

MISSISSIPPI TERRITORY.

Mr. POINDEXTER offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the people of the Mississippi Territory to elect a convention to form a constitution, preparatory to the admission of that Territory into the Union as a separate and independent State: and that the committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. PITKIN expressed a wish that it should lie on the table a few days, for the purpose of further consideration.

Mr. POINDEXTER asked what objection there could be to the adoption of a resolution to inquire. Why, when the object of the resolution itself was merely inquiry, should it lie on the table for inquiry? If the House were disposed to inquire, the sooner they did it the better; and a committee, if appointed, would make it a particular duty to investigate all the points in relation to the subject.

Mr. WRIGHT said that this resolution did not go to fix a new principle; it was already fixed by the Constitution, that the Territories should, of right, become States whenever their population amounted to sixty thousand. When it is probable that their numbers had reached this point, it was the duty of the House to investigate; and when they found it to be so, they had nothing to do but declare the fact, according to which, by the Constitution, they were entitled to become States. He could see no possible objection to the inquiry.

Mr. PITKIN said, the idea of the Mississippi Territory becoming a State at this time was new to him. It was entitled when it contained sixty thousand inhabitants, but ought not to take rank as a State before that period arrived. He was opposed to discussing or passing the resolution at this time, because it would be holding out the idea that the people of this Territory were of course to be admitted as a State, and that this committee was appointed merely to enable them to form a constitution before their time. Perhaps there were not as many inhabitants in the Territory as in many counties of Pennsylvania and some other States. This resolution would be considered as a sort of pledge to the people; and all this, Mr. P. said, without there being in fact any petition from the Territory on the subject.

Mr. BIBB said he would barely remark, that he suspected the gentleman from Maryland had misunderstood the object of the delegate from Mississippi. It was certainly true, that the Mississippi Territory could claim, as a right, to be admitted, as a State, into the Union whenever it should contain sixty thousand souls. It was perfectly well understood that it did not, at present, contain more than half that number. Consequently, the only question for a committee to inquire into would be, shall the Mississippi Territory be admitted as a State before she has the requisite number? This must be the only object of the resolution.

Mr. POINDEXTER said the gentleman had misunderstood his object, and had been misinformed as to the fact. Two counties in the Territory would give half the number required to constitute it a State, and the Territory contained ten counties. Investigation was his sole object. The gentleman from Connecticut had said it was a novel subject. To him, the opposition of the gentleman was very novel. When a proposition was made to investigate a subject of importance to any section of the Union, were gentlemen to say they would not investigate, when they might withhold from the people absolute rights by refusing to make the inquiry? The difference of opinion appeared to be whether they should make the inquiry fully or ineffectually. The latter would be the effect of its lying on the table. Even admitting that the population of the Territory was not sixty thousand, it was a question for the discretion of the House, whether it would be proper to admit them earlier or not. But if precedent were wanted for this proposition, it might be found in the report by a committee of the House of a bill for the admission of the Territory of Orleans as a State; and he would venture to affirm that there was no official account of the population of that Territory. Mr. P. said he was informed that there was a memorial on this subject on its way from the Mississippi Territory. He solicited inquiry, not only into the numbers, but the political character of the Territory, and into their conduct towards the General Government whenever it had been assailed. When the borders had been invaded by the Spaniards, in a few days, two hundred and fifty militia were half way on their march. When the choice spirits of the East, wearied with the dull pursuits of civil life, were desirous of establishing an empire in the West, the citizens of the Mississippi Territory rallied around the standard of the Constitution, and put them down. These circumstances had proved their disposition.

Mr. TROUP said he wished the resolution to lie on the table, not because he was unfriendly to the admission of the Territory into the Union; far from it; but it was obvious that there was no information before the House on which it could act. It was true that a population of sixty thousand was not necessary, but a certain amount must be. What that amount was, Congress could not ascertain, because it had no information. How, then, could the House, with any propriety, direct a committee to inquire into a subject, which it was morally impossible for it to do, even if in a Committee of the Whole, for the purpose, having no information before it?

Mr. BIBB said he was not opposed to the admission of the Territory into the Union, but he wished the House to understand the nature of the inquiry. He would ask the gentleman from Mississippi Territory whether he did not know there were not sixty thousand people within the Territory. He was aware that Congress might admit any Territory to the rights of a State before it attained a population of sixty thousand souls; and the only question into which an inquiry would really be made, after the adoption of the resolution, would be whether the Territory should be admitted as a State with a less population than sixty thousand, or not.

Mr. POINDEXTER said the census of the Territory had not been returned; consequently, he could not say anything as to the precise population.

The motion for the resolution to lie on the table was lost—54 to 51.

The resolution was then modified, on the suggestion of Mr. PITKIN, to read as follows:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of admitting the Mississippi Territory into the Union, as a separate and independent State.

The resolution, as amended, being under consideration, Messrs. PITKIN, TALLMADGE, GOLDSBOROUGH, and QUINCY, opposed its passage, and Messrs. SMILIE, MACON, RHEA, of Tennessee, WRIGHT, BARRY, and POINDEXTER, supported it.

The arguments against the resolution were, generally, that it would be giving a pledge to the people of the Mississippi Territory, that they should become a State before their numbers entitled them to claim that distinction; that there was no memorial or petition from these people, praying admission into the Union, which was presumptive proof that they were not very anxious for that event; that, as every State in the Union was entitled to at least one Representative, these people would be represented (even if but thirty thousand) as fully as though they had a sufficient population to entitle them to one Representative; that, without information as to the population, it was improper to act at all, as so acting might excite hopes which could not but be met by disappointment.

On the other hand, it was argued, in favor of the resolution, that Territorial governments were uncongenial to the spirit of our Government, being in some measure controlled by arbitrary power, having no voice in the choice of their councillors; that, although there was no memorial from the Territory, the sense of the people was decidedly expressed through the medium of their Delegate on this floor, who was the legitimate organ for the conveyance of their sentiments to the House; that the national affairs required at least as much attention as the House could bestow on them, and it was therefore expedient, as soon as possible, to give to the Territory, by making it a State, the right of regulating its own municipal concerns; that, supposing all these arguments to have no weight, the resolution merely proposed inquiry, which was scarcely ever liable to objection.

The following are the yeas and nays on the resolution:

Messrs. POINDEXTER, MCKIM, HUFTY, ANDERSON, STURGES, VAN RENSSELAER, and CLOPTON, were appointed the committee.

SATURDAY, December 29.

On motion of Mr. SAWYER,

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of altering or extending the times of holding the Federal District Courts of North Carolina; and that they have leave to report by bill, or otherwise.

Messrs. SAWYER, SHEFFEY, and HEISTER, were appointed a committee pursuant to the said resolution.

Mr. VAN HORN, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, presented a bill concerning the Bank of Alexandria; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

Mr. MORROW presented petitions from sundry inhabitants of the State of Ohio, praying that Congress will reduce the price of certain lands lying within the first purchase, which said lands are of a very inferior quality.—Referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

MONDAY, December 31.

Another member, to wit: from Delaware, NICHOLAS VAN DYKE, appeared, and took his seat.

Mr. SOUTHARD, from the committee appointed on the twenty-first instant, presented a bill to revive "An act to prescribe the mode of taking evidence in cases of contested election for members of the House of Representatives of the United States, and to compel the attendance of witnesses," and in addition to the same; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Wednesday next.

A motion was made by Mr. BACON, that the House do come to the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Claims be instructed to inquire into the expediency of repealing or suspending the operation of the several acts of limitation, so far as they now operate to bar the payment of the following description of claims against the United States, to wit:

First, Loan office certificates.

Second, Indents for interest on the public debt.

Third, Final settlement certificates.

Fourth, Commissioners' certificates.

Fifth, Army certificates.

Sixth, Credits given in lieu of army certificates cancelled.

Seventh, Credits for the pay of the Army for which no certificates were issued; and

Eighth, Invalid pensions: and that the committee have leave to report by bill, or otherwise.

The resolution was read and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SAWYER, from the committee appointed on the twenty-ninth instant, presented a bill to alter the times for holding the district courts of the district of North Carolina; which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time on Monday next.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

I lay before the House a report from the Secretary of State, complying with their resolution of the twenty-first instant.

JAMES MADISON.

DECEMBER 28, 1810.

The Message was read, and that part of the same which relates to a tariff of duties, referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, and the residue thereof referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. JENNINGS, from the committee appointed on the nineteenth instant, presented a bill to authorize the laying out a public road from the line established by the treaty of Greenville to the Northend, in the State of Ohio; which was twice read, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Wednesday next.

On motion of Mr. NEWTON,

Resolved, That the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures be instructed to inquire into the expediency and propriety of confining the benefit of drawback of duties to merchandise imported into and exported from, the United States, to vessels belonging to citizens of the United States.

An engrossed bill providing for the final adjustment of claims to lands, and for the sale of the public lands in the Territories of Orleans and Louisiana, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. QUINCY, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the amendments reported by the select committee to the bill from the Senate respecting foreign coins. [The amendments go to make all foreign coin current at its standard value, and to repeal all other acts relating to the currency of foreign coins in the United States. This bill to continue in force three years.] The bill went through a Committee of the Whole, and was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

A bill for the removal of certain land offices, and regulating certain sales of lands in the district east of Pearl river, went through a Committee of the Whole, and was ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

A Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, as follows:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

I lay before the House of Representatives a supplemental report of the Secretary of State, containing information received since the date of my late Message on the subject of their resolution of the twenty-first instant.

JAMES MADISON.

DECEMBER 31, 1810.

The Message was read, and referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

On motion of Mr. SWOOPÉ, three thousand copies of the said Message and documents were ordered to be printed for the use of the members of the House.

• APPROPRIATIONS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, of the estimates of appropriations necessary for the service of the year 1811; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The report is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Dec. 31, 1810.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit, herewith, the estimates of the appropriations proposed for the service of the year 1811; also a statement of the receipts and expenditures at the Treasury, for the year ending on the 30th day of September, 1810.

The appropriations, as detailed in the estimates, amounting in the whole to five millions nine hundred thousand five hundred and ninety-five dollars and twenty-five cents, viz:

For the civil list - - - -	638,360	61
For miscellaneous expenses - - - -	471,958	12
For intercourse with foreign nations - - - -	128,392	68
For Military Establishments, including one hundred and forty-six thousand five hundred dollars, for the Indian Department, - - - -	2,791,600	80
For the Naval Establishment, including the Marine Corps, - - - -	1,870,274	05
Total - - - -	$5,900,595	25

The estimate of the Secretary of the War Department is calculated on the whole number of troops authorized by law; but it does not include the permanent annuities to certain Indian tribes, nor the annual appropriation of two hundred thousand dollars for furnishing arms for the militia, those objects being provided for by permanent laws. Nor is any estimate made, of the sum which may be wanted during the ensuing year, for completing fortifications. The sums which may be actually expended in the year 1811, for those several objects, are not, therefore, included in the aggregate above stated.

The funds out of which appropriations may be made, for the purposes before mentioned, are,

1. The sum of six hundred thousand dollars of the proceeds of duties on imports and tonnage, which will accrue in the year 1811; which sum is by law annually reserved for the support of Government.

2. So much of the balances of appropriations unexpended on the 31st of December, 1810, as is not wanted to defray the expenses of that year.

3. The surplus of the revenue and income of the United States, which may accrue to the end of the year 1811, after satisfying the objects for which appropriations have been heretofore made.

4. The proceeds of such loan or loans as may be authorized by Congress.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

ALBERT GALLATIN.

Hon. SPEAKER of the House of Reps.

TUESDAY, January 1, 1811.

The House met, but a quorum not being present, adjourned until to-morrow morning.

WEDNESDAY, January 2.

Two other new members, to wit: from New Hampshire, NATHANIEL A. HAYEN; and from Maryland, JOHN CAMPBELL; appeared and took their seats.

On motion of Mr. STANLEY,

Resolved, That the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing, by law, for a remission of penalties involuntarily incurred by infractions of the laws prohibiting commercial intercourse with Great Britain and France, and their dependencies.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from JOHN TAYLOR, resigning his seat as a member of this House, from the State of South Carolina, in consequence of having accepted an appointment as a Senator of the United States.

H. OF R.

Mr. JENNINGS presented a resolution of the Legislature of the Indiana Territory, instructing him to procure the passage of an act authorizing the people of the said Territory to elect the sheriffs of the respective counties in said Territory.

The resolution was read, and referred to Mr. JENNINGS, Mr. HAVEN, and Mr. NICHOLSON.

On motion of Mr. Root,

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to lay before this House a statement of the whole expense to the Government of the Mint of the United States, since its first establishment; the profits on the copper coinage; the amount of gold coined at the Mint; and the rate per centum of expense in refining gold bullion below the standard fineness.

An engrossed bill providing for the removal of the land office established at Nashville, in the State of Tennessee, and Canton, in the State of Ohio, and to authorize the register and receiver of public moneys to superintend the public sales of land in the district east of Pearl river, was read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a report of the Commissioners appointed for the purpose of examining the claims of persons claiming lands in the District of Kaskaskia; which were read, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

FOREIGN COIN.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to suspend the second section of the act, entitled 'An act regulating foreign coins, and for other purposes,'" as amended, was read the third time.

A motion was made by Mr. BOYD, that the bill be recommitted to a Committee of the whole House; and the question being taken, it was determined in the negative. The question was then taken that the same do pass, and resolved in the affirmative—yeas 82, nays 20, as follows:

On motion of Mr. QUINCY, the title of the bill was amended to read as follows: "An act regulating the currency of foreign coins, and providing for their assay."

ORLEANS TERRITORY.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill for admitting the Territory of Orleans as a State into the Union.

Mr. MITCHILL rose to ask for information as to the population, &c. of that Territory.

Mr. POINDEXTER said he had no doubt, from the knowledge that he had of the Territory, that it contained at least sixty thousand souls. On the subject of population therefore there could be no difficulty. How far it would be proper to postpone the consideration of the bill till the bill before the Senate (respecting the West Florida Territory) was decided on, he would not undertake to say.

Mr. POYDRAS corroborated the statement of Mr. POINDEXTER. He said he derived his statement from the Governor of the Territory himself. The Territory contained at least 60,000 souls. It had a right to become a State; and he could not see the least pretence for an objection to it. Congress, however, would act as in their wisdom they should deem it fit.

Mr. TROUP moved for the Committee to rise, urging as a reason for the motion the evident want of preparation in the House to act on the subject. He also alluded to the difficulty arising from including within a State the territory between the Mississippi and the Perdido, yet in dispute and subject to negotiation.

Mr. GHOLSON opposed the Committee's rising. He considered the bill before the Senate merely as a declaratory bill, and not at all altering the present state of that Territory.

Mr. W. ALSTON said there could be no question of the propriety of admitting the Territory as a State, whilst it was in the power of Congress to make conditions with them. After the population was ascertained to amount to 60,000, they would become a State without asking the leave of Congress.

Mr. BIBB said it was very far from his intention to oppose the passage of the bill. On the contrary, he was favorably disposed to it; but a difficulty had occurred to him which he would state as a reason for delaying a decision on the bill for the present. The bill proposed including in the State all that part of the Territory which lay west of the Perdido, &c. The President, by his Proclamation, although he had required its occupation, had declared that the right should be subject to negotiation. Now, if it became a State, would not all right of negotiation on the subject be taken from the President?

Mr. TROUP said he had made the motion to rise, because he saw that the Committee were obviously not ready to decide. Independent of other considerations, Mr. T. said the ratio of representation was not yet fixed—and did it not become Congress to take care that the population of the Territory did not fall short of that ratio? Would it be proper that 30,000 inhabitants in Orleans should have a representative when forty or fifty thousand were required for the same privilege in other parts of the Union?

Mr. BARRY said that the necessity of State government, the want of proper control by the General Government, and its inability to attend to the municipal concerns of the Territory, imperiously called upon Congress to erect it into a State. It was unimportant, as respected the ratio, that the bill should be delayed till that was ascertained. Although the precise population could not be ascertained, yet, from what had fallen from the gentlemen from Orleans and Mississippi Territories, it was probable that the Territory had already a right to become a State. Mr. B. said it was important that Congress should act on this subject, for a variety of reasons. It was a point of the Union particularly important to the country which he represented. New Orleans commanded the river through which the whole productions of the Western and of some part of the Southern country were carried to market. It became important in another respect, that the people in that country should have the power of self-government. He alluded to the necessity, in the present posture of affairs, that they should have the power of self-preservation to protect themselves in the enjoyment of their rights, and that the powers resulting from State sovereignty ought therefore to be extended to them at this time. The objection which had been urged, respecting the question of title, was equally unimportant. Admitted in its full force, it would only require a modification of the bill, reserving to Congress the power of changing the boundary of the Territory; and this would be a desirable modification because of the undefined limits of the Territory. This objection did not meet the merits of the bill, but merely suggested a modification. It was important now to act on the subject, because Congress had the power to impose conditions on the Territory. If they waited until it had attained a population of 60,000, they could not say no to the demands of these people. Passing this bill would tend to show that an attachment to them and a disposition to conciliate them existed in Congress; and would at the same time admit of imposing conditions on them. And when it should become necessary to discuss the details of the bill, the reasons would be found cogent for retaining the conditions it contained. One very important condition was, that their laws should be enacted and records kept in the language common to all the States; as, after they became a State, a great part of the population being French, they might prefer that language. All the objections which had been made to an immediate decision on this subject, Mr. B. said, were unsubstantial. The State of Ohio had been admitted into the Union before she had attained the population designated by the Constitution. The situation of the Orleans Territory to a great part of the Western country was infinitely more important than that of any other Territory; and the people of that portion of the Union of course felt greater anxiety in relation to it than in relation to any other.

Mr. SHEFFEY said he was not prepared to act on the subject, because the materials on which to decide were not before the House. Whilst he was disposed to treat the inhabitants of the Orleans Territory, as brothers, and not as vassals, he was not ready to transfer the inheritance purchased by the blood of our fathers to foreigners. While he looked upon these people as equals, and was disposed to do them justice, he thought all they could demand at his hands was to be placed on that equality to which they were entitled. It had been said that the population was this much or that much. How much?—Mr. S. asked. Sixty thousand? Forty thousand? Thirty thousand? Would any gentleman who regarded his honor tell the House that there were 30,000 inhabitants in the undisputed Territory? He believed not. And would gentlemen favor this French population at the expense of their own interests and rights? It was true indeed that Ohio became a State before she had 60,000; but the ratio of representation was then but 30,000. If he were to reason on this subject, Mr. S. said he would say, under the fostering hand of the General Government, let them become accustomed to our Government, before those were permitted to govern themselves who had so lately emerged from despotism. He was not, he said, directly hostile to the admission of this Territory into the Union; but he made these observations in answer to speculations ushered in to lead the House from its duty. They ought to have the necessary information. The idea of a gentleman from Georgia had also occurred to him, respecting the extension of the limits to the Perdido. When the Executive had directed the occupation of that Territory it had given a pledge that it should be subject to future negotiation. And would gentlemen say, that the Executive could convey away any part of a State? Although it should be hereafter clearly proved, that the Territory was not ceded, what is he bound to do? To establish a doctrine spurned at by all, that the treaty-making power has a right to cede a State or any part of a State? Certainly not. This consideration was sufficient to induce the House to look about them before they proceeded. Why should they be hurried on without information? The particular situation of the Territory had been mentioned as a ground for an immediate decision. What was its situation? It is far distant; so is the Mississippi Territory. The latter has been nursed in the principles of civil liberty; the former has not. The latter is composed chiefly of our own citizens; the former is not. Mr. S. said he had always understood that New Orleans was the most vulnerable point of the Union, and it was therefore the more proper still to keep the power in our own hands.

Territories of the United States.

Mr. MACON said he would treat these people as he would the people of every other Territory. They were a part of the nation, and so ought to be considered. There ought to be no question as to what stock they sprung from; the true question was, ought they to be a State? The true policy, Mr. M. thought, was, as they were to become a part of the United States, to make them one and indivisible as soon as possible. They had already served a sufficient apprenticeship to the United States, but not under a free Government, for the Territorial governments were not free. The advantage of exacting of them the condition of using the same language, was a great one. How could they be made one with the United States unless by the use of the same language? Mr. M. wished to treat this Territory as well as the others, and no better; he would not treat one as a daughter and the other as a step-daughter. He was as willing now to make Orleans a State as he had been to make Ohio a State. The great object is to make us one people; to make this nation one. As to the Mississippi Territory, it had not served a much longer apprenticeship than Orleans, having only been acquired by the treaty with Spain in 1795. The people of Orleans possessed certainly as strong an attachment to the nation as could be expected from the time they had belonged to it. When the Spaniards invaded the Territory, they stepped forward promptly to repel them; and when some citizens of the old States forgot the love every honest heart owes to his country, they showed their attachment to the Union by the readiness with which they lent their aid to repel them. To make them a State would make that attachment still greater, and it was therefore advisable to act on the subject.

The Committee now rose, reported progress, and asked leave to sit again; but before leave was granted, the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, January 3.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be directed to inquire into the propriety of designating a portion of the public land, west of the Mississippi river, to satisfy the claims of individuals holding under the act of Virginia of one thousand seven hundred and seventy-nine, and report their opinion to this House.

On motion of Mr. WITHERSPOON,

Resolved, That the Speaker address a letter to the Executive of the State of South Carolina, communicating information of the resignation of John Taylor, one of the members returned from that State to serve in this House, that measures may be taken to supply the vacancy occasioned thereby in the representation of that State.

Mr. SEYBERT presented a petition of sundry merchants, manufacturers, mechanics, traders, and other inhabitants of Philadelphia, praying the renewal of the charter of the Bank of the United States.—Ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. LOVE, the House proceeded to consider a resolution submitted by him on the nineteenth ultimo; which was again read, and agreed to by the House.

Mr. RHEA, of Tennessee, from the committee appointed on the eleventh ultimo, presented a bill further providing for the government of the Territory of Louisiana; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

Mr. PEARSON, from the committee appointed on the twenty-first ultimo, presented a bill supplementary to an act passed the twelfth of February, 1793, entitled "An act respecting fugitives from justice and persons escaping from the service of their masters, and for other purposes;" which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

TERRITORIES OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. BABB said it would be recollected that in the course of the discussion yesterday on the subject of admitting the Territory of Orleans as a State into the Union, he had explicitly declared himself in favor of such a course whenever there was information before the House to justify it. The bill now before the House on that subject provided for including in that Territory the tract of country the occupation whereof had recently been directed by the President of the United States. He had said yesterday that, although this step had been taken, the President had given a pledge that the Territory should hereafter be a subject of negotiation; and that in making it a State they would forever preclude negotiation on the subject. Mr. B. said, when the bill again came up, it was his intention to move to strike out the provision relating to this Territory; but before that bill came up, he thought proper to move the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of annexing to the Mississippi Territory, or of creating into a separate Territorial government, the tract of country lying south of the 31st degree of north latitude, and extending from the river Perdido, to a line drawn along the middle of the lakes Maurepas and Pontchartrain, and the river Iberville, to its junction with the river Mississippi.

The discussion of this resolution had progressed to some extent, when a Message was received from the President of the United States.

The SPEAKER, having opened the Message, declared it to be of a confidential nature.

The subject then under discussion was postponed; the galleries were immediately cleared, and all strangers excluded.

The doors were closed the remainder of the sitting; which continued till 4 o'clock.

FRIDAY, January 4.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting an account of the sale of public arms to the State of Maryland, in obedience to an act of the second of April, which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. JENNINGS,

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of opening a road from Vincennes, in the Indiana Territory, to Dayton, in the State of Ohio, and report their opinion thereon to the House.

Mr. JENNINGS, Mr. BOYD, and Mr. CAMPBELL, were appointed the said committee.

Mr. FINDLEY presented a petition of the Synod of Pittsburg, in the State of Pennsylvania, praying that the laws and regulations for the government of the Post Office Establishment may be so altered or amended as to prohibit mail stages and post riders from travelling, and post offices being kept open, on Sunday.—Referred to the Postmaster General.

Mr. BASSETT, from the Committee on the Naval Establishment, presented a bill establishing Navy Hospitals; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Wednesday next.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act making an additional appropriation to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for the relief and protection of distressed American seamen, during the year 1810," with an amendment; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The said amendment was read, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-day.

Another message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act to fix the compensation of the additional Assistant Postmaster General," with an amendment; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The amendment was read, and committed to the Committee of the Whole on the amendment to the bill "making an additional appropriation to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for the relief and protection of distressed American seamen, during the year 1808.

On motion of Mr. STURGES,

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to lay before this House a copy of his Proclamation issued the 2d November, 1810; and also a copy of the circular letter of the Secretary of the Treasury to the Collectors of the Customs, in pursuance of said Proclamation.

Mr. STURGES and Mr. CAMPBELL were appointed a committee to present the said resolution to the President.

Mr. VAN HORN presented a petition of the inhabitants of Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, praying that Congress will authorize the corporation of said town to clear out and deepen the channel of the Potomac river between said town and the mouth of the Eastern Branch.—Referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The House resumed the consideration of the unfinished business of the 2d instant; and the question that the Committee of the Whole House have leave to sit again on the said bill being taken, it was resolved in the affirmative.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the amendments of the Senate to the bills, entitled "An act making an additional appropriation to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for the relief and protection of distressed American seamen, during the year 1810," and "An act to fix the compensation of the additional Assistant Postmaster General;" and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose, and reported their agreement to the amendment to the first mentioned and their disagreement to the last mentioned bill.

The House proceeded to consider the said report of the Committee of the Whole, and the question being taken thereon, it was concurred in by the House.

Mr. MACON, from the committee to whom was referred his proposed amendment to the Constitution, reported the following in lieu thereof, which was referred to a Committee of the Whole:

"No Senator or Representative shall be appointed to any civil office, place, or appointment under the authority of the United States until the expiration of the Presidential term in which such person shall have served as a Senator or Representative."

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. BURWELL reported the following bill:

A Bill continuing in force for the term of — the act entitled "An act to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States," on the terms and conditions therein mentioned.

Be it enacted, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That the act to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States, passed the 25th day of February, in the year of our Lord 1791, be and the same is hereby continued in force, subject to the provisions and conditions in this act specified, for and during the further term of — years, from and after the 4th day of March next.

SEC. 2. Provided, however, and be it further enacted, That the President and Directors of the said Bank of the United States shall, on or before the — day of — next, pay into the Treasury of the United States, for the use thereof, one million two hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the President and Directors of the said Bank shall, at all times, from and after the passing of this act, and during the continuance of the same, be holden and bound to make a loan or loans to the United States, if required and authorized by law, of any sum or sums of money, not exceeding at any one time five millions of dollars, reimbursable at the pleasure of the United States, and at a rate of interest not exceeding six per centum per year: Provided, That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to make his application in writing to the President and Directors of the said Bank, for such loan or loans, at least three calendar months prior to the time when such loan or loans shall be required: Provided, also, That the sum of two millions seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars, borrowed during the year eighteen hundred and ten, shall be considered as part thereof, and that no greater amount shall be required in any quarter of a year than one million of dollars: And provided, further, That all such loans shall be reimbursable at or before the expiration of the said term of — years, unless it shall be otherwise agreed between the said corporation and the United States.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That, if the said President and Directors shall on any occasion fail to furnish any loan or loans, to be required by the United States, in the manner hereinbefore enacted, their corporation shall forthwith be dissolved, and the power thereof shall cease and terminate, anything in this act, or in the act hereby continued in force, to the contrary thereof in anywise notwithstanding.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the directors chosen by the stockholders of the said corporation on the first Monday of January in the present year, and the president chosen by the directors at the first meeting after such election, shall be capable of serving, by virtue of such elections, until the first Monday in January, eighteen hundred and twelve.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the act, entitled "An act to punish frauds committed on the Bank of the United States," passed the twenty-fourth day of February, eighteen hundred and seven, be and the same is hereby continued in force during the continuance of the said corporation; and the same shall at all times hereafter, and in all respects, be deemed and taken to apply to the said corporation, in the same manner that it has been deemed and taken to apply to the same heretofore.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the President and Directors of the said Bank shall, after the fourth day of March next, pay to the United States an interest at the rate of three per centum per year on all sums of money above the sum of — millions of dollars, which shall accumulate to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States in said bank, or in the branches of the same, and which shall remain there for —: Provided, It shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, from time to time, to give notice in writing to the President and Directors, at least — days before the term or time at which the said interest shall begin to accrue and be computed; which notice in writing shall specify the exact amount of deposit so to remain for the whole year as aforesaid.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That the United States shall be authorized, at any time during the continuance of this act, to increase the capital stock of the said corporation, in such manner as may be hereafter prescribed by law, and for which the United States shall be the subscriber, and own to an amount not exceeding in the whole — shares, and not exceeding in any one year — shares: Provided, That, during the time the United States shall so hold stock in the said corporation, they shall have the right to appoint, in such manner as shall hereafter be declared by law, a number not exceeding — of the directors: And provided, also, That the shares thus to be subscribed and added, by and on behalf of the United States, shall not be sold at a price less than — per centum advance on each share.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That the twelfth section of the before-mentioned act, entitled "An act to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States, passed the second March, seventeen hundred and ninety-one, be and the same is hereby repealed.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the President and Directors of the said Bank, on or before the — day of — next, to signify to the President of the United States, in writing, their acceptance, in behalf of the said corporation, of the terms and conditions in this act contained; and if they shall fail to do so, on or before the day above-mentioned, then this act shall cease to be in force.

Mr. BASSETT said he had a Constitutional objection to the bill, and could not by his vote, sanction it in any shape. He therefore moved that the bill be rejected. He did not wish to discuss the motion to-day, but would rather it should lie over till Monday. He made his motion now, to enter his protest at the threshold against the bill on Constitutional grounds. He had hoped the committee, who had the subject under consideration, would have submitted the question of constitutionality, in some shape, before they had gone into details; that not having been the case, he was compelled to make this motion.

Mr. BURWELL concurred with his colleague in his objections to the principle of the bill. It was his decided conviction that the Constitution did not give to Congress the power to establish a Bank of the United States. This being his impression, and a most deliberate one, because he had viewed the subject in every light he could, in the situation he occupied as a member of the committee, he could not but vote for the rejection of the bill; although he had intended to move that it should take the usual course of all bills. In this whole business he said he had been guided by the instructions of the committee. When first the subject had been presented to the committee, he had urged the same objections as were now stated; but without effect. On the details of the bill the committee had differed very materially, and reporting it in its present form was the result of a mutual accommodation, in order to bring the subject before the House. The bill as now reported, he said, was very similar to the one reported to this House at the last session; it differed but in two points, the one was, in repealing the 12th section of the act of 1791, which precluded the Government from establishing any other bank, the other in authorizing the Government to increase the capital and take shares itself with a proportionate direction. If the question of rejection was put, he was bound to vote for it, because he could not vote for the renewal either on the grounds of constitutionality or expediency. But he thought it would be fair to take up the discussion at a future day; and, if a majority should be really of opinion that the Constitution had given to Congress the power of establishing corporations within the limits of the States, without their consent, that they might have an opportunity of making the bill as favorable as they could, and guard against all the abuses to which such an institution was liable. It was important in every point of view that it should be decided as speedily as possible, whether as it regarded the people, the stockholders, or the pecuniary arrangements of the Government. If the gentleman would consent to postpone the discussion of his motion to Monday, it would meet his approbation.

Mr. BASSETT, complying with the wishes of his friend, withdrew his motion for rejection, and moved to postpone the further consideration of the bill to Monday. One of the great arguments used in favor of the renewal and against the Constitutional objection, was the acquiescence of the States in the act; he was desirous to reject this bill before arguments of an acquiescence on the part of this House could be drawn from their consideration of it.

Mr. MITCHILL said he was against the motion for postponement; the chairman of the committee, he said, had well expressed the reasons which had induced the committee to report this bill. They had been disposed to bring this subject before the House, that it might be there acted on in Committee of the whole House. The gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. BASSETT,) who had first spoken, had expressed his manly and honest disapprobation of the bill, and had protested against it as unconstitutional. Mr. M. said he wished, after having expressed his opinion, that the gentleman would have permitted this bill to take the ordinary course of bills. That was the wish of the committee. The bill contained an insulated section for renewing the charter, a motion to strike out which would give ample scope to debate on the Constitutional question.

Mr. GHOLSON rose to make a question of order, whether, when objection was made to its passing to a second reading, any motion in relation to the bill could be received, unless to reject it. Believing the bill to be unconstitutional, and feeling himself bound by his oath to vote against it in all its stages, he was desirous to take a vote on rejection.

MESSRS. BASSETT, GHOLSON, PITKIN, BURWELL, NEWTON, and SHEFFEY, spoke to the question of order.

The SPEAKER decided that, when opposition was made to the second reading of a bill, the motion of rejection superseded every other motion, except a motion of adjournment.

Mr. GHOLSON renewed the motion to reject the bill.

Mr. SHEFFEY intimated that as he was not satisfied that it was within the power of Congress to pass such a law, and therefore wished the subject discussed, he should vote against rejection.

Mr. MACON said this was a great question, touching the whole moneyed interest of the nation, and materially affecting the collection of the revenue. He was as clearly of opinion that it was expedient to renew the charter, as he was that it was unconstitutional. He did not believe the wisest men among them could tell the evils which would result from the dissolution of the bank. Nothing but the most perfect conviction in his own mind that they had not the power to pass the bill would compel him, when the question was put, to vote against it. A decision ought not to be delayed. They must decide whether they would take the paper of the State banks or leave a power in the Secretary of the Treasury, or somebody else—as great a power almost as could be given—to say what State paper should be received, in payment of the revenue, or whether nothing but specie. He was against any postponement.

Mr. SOUTHARD said, he thought it would be proper to permit this bill to take the common course. He could not see anything so very obnoxious in it as to induce the House to reject it. He was himself unfriendly to the renewal of the charter; but, as the people were much interested, and petitions on the subject have been received from many respectable citizens, it was their duty to meet the question fairly, to give it that consideration which the importance of the subject required. His reason for voting against the rejection was, that they should meet the question fairly.

Mr. SEYBERT said, if he was compelled to give a decisive vote, he must vote for the rejection of the bill. Nevertheless, he was very willing to hear the subject discussed, and to receive light on it. He thought gentlemen were too much in a hurry. This was a subject in which the whole Union was much interested, and ought to be fully discussed.

Mr. DAWSON said, that although he believed the bill unconstitutional, he must vote against rejection, because he believed it ought to be fully discussed.

Mr. BACON said he was opposed to the bill on Constitutional grounds; but his mind was not so fully made up; he had not so much confidence in his own infallibility, that he would reject all discussion. He should therefore vote against rejection; but he hoped that this vote would not be considered as precluding him from voting against the bill.

Mr. SMILIE said, whatever they might ultimately do, the question was of too great magnitude to be decided without debate. It was a respect due to the interest which the subject had excited in the public mind that it should take the usual course of business. He hoped the House would not reject the bill without hearing the arguments in favor of it. By voting against rejection, he did not consider himself committed as to his future vote.

Mr. WRIGHT said, he wished the subject postponed to Wednesday next. If the gentleman from Virginia would consent to withdraw his motion for rejection, it would be a great accommodation, and give an opportunity to examine the subject. His present impression was, that no charter ought to be granted.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH said, that the vote on this question would not be conclusive of anything. He had been happy that gentlemen, in principle opposed to the bill, had declared that they should vote against rejection because they wished for discussion. He hoped no gentleman would consider himself committed by this vote; he certainly should not.

Mr. MCKEE said he had not expected that so great a question as this was to have been decided in a few hours. He had reserved to himself time to examine difficulties in relation to the subject; and, not having done so, must now for that reason vote against rejection.

JANUARY, 1811.

Territory of Orleans.

H. OF R.

Mr. GHOLSON had supposed, that, as the question of constitutionality had been the subject of discussion for twenty years past, every gentleman's mind was made up on it; but, seeing so many gentlemen unfriendly to the bill about to vote against rejection, and finding that the question, when taken, would decide nothing, he withdrew the motion for rejection.

The bill went to a second reading of course, and was referred to a Committee of the Whole.

TERRITORY OF ORLEANS.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for admitting the Territory of Orleans into the Union as an independent State, &c.

Mr. WHEATON.—Whenever a bill is offered for our sanction, in order that it may become a law, it is proper, before we give it such sanction, that we should inquire whether the subject of it is such as we have Constitutional authority to legislate upon; and if so, whether, from a consideration of time and circumstances, it be expedient so to do.

It appears to me that the bill now before us is objectionable on both these grounds, and, if so, there is a double reason why it should not pass. A few moments will be sufficient for the remarks I have to make upon either; and, if they shall be deemed of no consequence, there will be this consolation, that they will have occupied but very little time.

The subject of this bill is the Orleans Territory, and the object of it, to form that Territory into a State, the people of which are to be subject to the same duties, and entitled to the same privileges, as the people of the United States in their federative capacity. It will be observed that our Constitution, by its enacting clause, was ordained and established for the then United States of America. The United States being thus included, implies an exclusion of all others. It may, therefore, be fairly concluded that those that framed this Constitution, and those that adopted it, never intended that its immediate operation should extend to any people that did not then, or that should not thereafter be included within the limits of the United States; that they did not intend to enter into a partnership of this sort without some knowledge of those that should compose it, lest the improper conduct of some might end in the ruin of all. The Territory of Orleans certainly was not within the limits of the United States when the Constitution was established. It was known to be otherwise. The people there were foreigners to us, and subjects of another Government. That it could not have been intended that the Constitution should embrace these people and this Territory, may be argued from the extreme danger of carrying the principle into operation. If we may extend our limits at all, without the consent of the people, further than what is expressed in the Constitution, who can tell where will be our ultimate bounds, or what number of States we may have in the Union? Purchase and conquest are objects of ambition. The great Napoleon may have more land to sell, and Spain now possess what she cannot retain. May we not, in time, have the whole of South America, some of the West India islands, and, possibly, Great Britain? And if so, upon the same principle that we form the Territory of Orleans into a State, we may form these Territories into as many separate States as we please, and admit them into the Union with all the powers and privileges that any of our States now possess and enjoy. Then, what will become of the Old United States, who first entered into the compact contained in the Constitution, and for whose benefit alone that instrument was made and executed. Instead of these new States being annexed to us, we shall be annexed to them, lose our independence, and become altogether subject to their control. Besides, it may be recollected, that, when our independence and national existence was acknowledged by the other nations of the world, the Territory now proposed to be received into the Union made no part of the United States so acknowledged; if, therefore, this be done, a jealousy may be created in those other nations, and, possibly, they may have some reason to complain that, in addition to the immense increase of population within our ancient limits, we should extend our boundaries so far as to include other-countries. This, however, by those who justify the Governments of other nations in the pursuit of their projects for universal domination, will be thought deserving of very little consideration. But, it may be well questioned how far the taking of positions that may lead to war comports with that pacific disposition which the people of the United States have been so anxious to maintain; and, whether the obligation they have placed themselves under, by adopting the Constitution, to guaranty to every State in the Union a republican form of government, and to protect each of them against invasion, can be made to extend to the Orleans Territory, or, whether the President can have any authority to send our militia there to repel any invasion or suppress any insurrection that may happen there, are inquiries worth some attention before we pass this act. And there will be found another difficulty in the way of carrying the object of it into full effect. If the people of that Territory are admitted into the Union as a State, on an equal footing with any of the now United States, they will have a right to send to our Legislature not only Representatives in proportion to their numbers, but, also, two Senators, and the Constitution makes it a necessary qualification for a Senator that he should have been a citizen of the United States at least nine years, a period further back than it can be pretended that any of the people of that Territory ever belonged to the United States, unless they be emigrants, and have not, thereby, lost their citizenship. And a President of the United States they never can have from among their own people, unless he be yet to be born; for no person except a natural born citizen, or a citizen of the United States at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, can be eligible to the office of President. But, it has been said that Congress have already passed a law, wherein they have stipulated with those people, that they shall be formed into a State when they shall have gained a certain number of inhabitants. In answer to this, it is sufficient to say that, if it be incorrect to promise to do a wrong thing, it is more incorrect still to do it. If this bill be unconstitutional, so was that law.

But, in opposition to all this, it will, undoubtedly, be said that several new States have been formed by Congress since the adoption of the Constitution, and that they are well authorized by that instrument. This is admitted. "New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union." But, if we look into the article where this authority is to be found, we shall find it applicable to the territories then included within the limits of the United States, or to a division of some of the States then already formed; beyond which, it is believed, this authority has never been exercised. The Old Confederation did expressly authorize the admission of Canada into the Union, but the present Constitution does not. If such an authority had been proposed to have been given to Congress by it, perhaps it had never been adopted.

If, however, it should be believed that this bill might pass into a law, in strict conformity with the spirit and letter of the Constitution, it is apprehended that the measure would be extremely impolitic and inexpedient at the present moment. We have not even the possession of a part of the country proposed to be embraced by this bill, and both title and possession have been disputed. It is true we have bought the whole country, and dearly paid for it, but still, if we have not a just title, we ought not to expect to hold it; and it is now admitted to be a subject of negotiation; and, even if our titles shall be found to be good, and we gain a peaceable possession, still, if we have a right to buy a thing, I know not why we may not sell it. But, as the expediency of this measure has been considered by other gentlemen, I forbear to add to the remarks I have already made.

Mr. MILLER said it would be observed that there were two applications to this House for admission into the Union as States; one from the Mississippi Territory, and the other from the Orleans Territory. The latter only, said he, is contemplated by the bill before you. Neither of these Territories have the number of inhabitants required by law to enable them to demand their admission into the Union as a matter of right. It may, therefore, be said with propriety to be an application for a favor, going directly to an amicable discussion, and which we may grant or refuse without running the risk of breaking any legal or moral obligation.

It has been objected against the bill that the population of the State proposed will not be American. Without intimating how far this consideration may have influence on my mind, under the circumstances in which that country has been lately placed, I cannot, however, but remark that it is natural for man to carry his feelings and prejudices about him. I was born in Virginia, sir, and I have not yet lost some of my Virginia feelings, notwithstanding an absence of fifteen years, and I cannot see why we should expect the people of Orleans to act and feel differently from other people, more particularly, when the French nation is towering so far above the other nations of the earth; they will have a secret pride in their glory, they will have some attachments, to what extent I cannot say; but, inasmuch as we know that if we send Paddy to Paris, that Paddy he will come back, the idea is certainly not unworthy of our consideration.

The bill on your table has another objection, of some weight with me, in relation to its policy. You propose to do them a favor by granting them an admission to the rank of other States before they can legally demand it, and, at the same time, you propose terms beyond which they cannot go. This, sir, resembles very much a polite invitation to walk in, but under an injunction to see that your feet are well cleaned, and your toes turned out. It is a niggardly sort of policy that I am sorry to see engrained in the bill. If you design to be liberal, be so; do not destroy your liberality by an ungenerous sentiment.

Again, sir, there are objections to the bill, as presented, that renders it impossible for me to give it my sanction. It will be seen, sir, that the bill proposes to annex that portion of West Florida in dispute between this and the Spanish Government to the State to be formed out of the Territory of Orleans. The President has declared to the world that this portion of the country, in our hands, shall be subject to mutual arrangements, hereafter to be entered into between the two Governments. But, once annex it to a State and the power to negotiate ceases. What power have we to negotiate about the territory of any of the States? We have none.

Again, sir, I never will consent that the bay of Mobile shall be annexed to any State which includes New Orleans and the mouth of the Mississippi, unless, indeed, they are both included in the same State with the whole country north, up to the Tennessee line.

If you annex West Florida to the State to be composed of the Orleans Territory, they will then possess a narrow slip of the country, including nearly the whole of the seacoast of Orleans, (including the bay of Mobile,) with a most extensive up-country, composed of a great part of the Mississippi Territory, and, I may say, Tennessee, wholly dependent on them, perhaps, for leave to go out into the bay, and, certainly, for the improvement of its navigation. And this, sir, is rendered more probable, as we know men act mostly for their own interest. And, as New Orleans, from its present population, will govern the councils of that State, let me ask, sir, if it will not be their interest, as much as possible, to divert the trade and capital from the Mobile to the Mississippi? And what security have we that she will not do so? None; and, from the nature of our Government can have none.

JANUARY, 1811.

Territory of Orleans.

H. of R.

Upon the plan I propose, from the extent of the country proposed to be annexed, the people who inhabit it, in time, will have the preponderance, and their interest will dictate the proper course to be pursued in relation to the free passage of the Mobile.

We may, also, with some certainty, pronounce that the population of the Mississippi, if it is not now, will, in a few years, be the greatest slave population, in proportion to the whites, of any country in the United States. Is it, then, of no consequence to have those settlements so connected with others, composed of whites, as that they may, at all times, be able, within the limits of their jurisdiction, to suppress insurrections of that sort? Is not this a consideration that ought to be taken into account? I, therefore, move you, sir, to strike out the whole of the bill, from the words "a bill," for the purpose of inserting a section, by way of amendment, the effect of which will be to consolidate both the Territories into a single State, which will include the whole of the country belonging to the United States, east of the Mississippi, and south of the State of Tennessee. This plan will avoid the objections made to the want of numbers, and will give, also, an American population to the State, if that should be desirable; and will, also, avoid the difficulty occasioned from the situation in which West Florida is at this time placed. To this plan I can see but one objection that ought to have any sort of influence, and that, sir, exists more in idea than reality. It is to the size of the proposed State. Divide and subdivide this country as you will, their interests, in a political point of view, will be the same. Their representation in this House will neither be increased nor diminished by a consolidation. In the Senate, the plan proposed is greatly to the advantage of the old States. In that House, they will have but two Senators instead of four or six, according to the number of States that may be made.

There is, also, no legal objection to this plan. The Treaty of 1803 with the French Republic, only provides for their admission into the Union, without regard to their territorial limits, and there is no law repugnant to the plan.

Mr. RHEA of Tennessee said, he was opposed to and would vote against the proposed amendment; it appeared to him that the design of this amendment, like others which had been offered, was to delay and prevent the passage of the bill. At that time, it was more than probable the state of things required more action and less delay; even caution itself might exceed the limits of prudence and sound understanding. It is denied that Congress have power to alter the boundaries of the Orleans Territory in the manner contemplated by the proposed amendment. The Treaty of Paris is peremptory on this subject; and although Congress may have power to alter the boundaries of the Territory of Orleans as it respects itself, which at this time is doubtful, there is no power to alter them so as to annex part of that Territory to another territory. The third article of the Treaty of Paris has provided, that the people of Louisiana, that is, the people of Orleans Territory, as now formed, shall be incorporated into the Union of the United States and admitted, as soon as possible, according to the principles of the Federal Constitution, to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages, and immunities of citizens, not by divisions and subdivisions which might procrastinate their admission for fifty years to come, not by dividing them and annexing them in part to another territory or territories, but by themselves, undivided, as an integral whole. The treaty alluded to is the act of this nation; it is a solemn compact, made between the United States and the French Republic; it is by the Constitution a supreme law of the land, irrevocable and peremptorily commanding execution in every part to the full extent. That treaty was made on the 30th of April, 1803, in the same year the people of Orleans Territory and the entire Province of Louisiana were solemnly delivered over to the United States, and from that time to this, about seven years, they have been the people of the United States; and it is strange, wonderful strange, indeed, that attempts shall now be made to prevent those people from the enjoyment of all those rights, advantages, and immunities, which the French Republic secured to them and the United States have confirmed by ratification of that treaty. The people of Orleans are anxiously desirous to become a State, and, by the best information had, their population appears sufficient.

It may be improper, said Mr. R., to admit the people of the Territory of Orleans as a State into the Union, without conditions. In that Territory is a great quantity of lands the property of the United States; these lands the United States are bound to pay for to the persons to whom the French Republic has transferred the evidence of the debt; and although the people of the Territory of Orleans do not set up any pretension of claim to the said lands, it nevertheless is prudent, to the end that difficulties may be prevented, to have a condition in the terms of their admission, that they shall never interfere with the right of soil, or any measure Congress may deem proper to adopt, to secure the title in bona fide purchasers. Because it is probable they will have a large black population, and therefore, to prevent insurrection, it is necessary to annex them to the upper country, to the end, that the upper country may defend them in times of such contemplated insurrection, is not of force to cause Congress to violate a solemn treaty; besides if such insurrection ever will be, the upper country can as well defend them therefrom, unconnected as connected. To suppress all such insurrections is the business of the Union, and Congress have ample power to call out sufficient force from any point of the United States to suppress all such insurrections, if a sufficient quantity of folly at any time may exist to incite and promote insurrection against the laws of the Union. It is not to be presumed, much less to be drawn into argument, that the people of the Territory of Orleans, when a State, will ever attempt to prevent the people of Tennessee from passing their produce to the ocean by the way of Mobile, and in so doing to force them to pass it down the Mississippi to New Orleans. The passage of the produce of Tennessee to the ocean by way of Mobile, will be as beneficial to the contemplated State of Orleans, as if it passed by the way of the Mississippi; but if the State of Orleans should ever attempt an act of such superlative demeritation, how would it be executed? Would it be by force or by imposition of duties? To attempt it by force would be more than madness; to attempt it by imposition of duties is out of all reason. The 8th, 9th, and 10th sections of the first article of the Constitution of the United States have amply provided against an assumption of power of that nature. What therefore has been urged in support of the proposed amendment appears to be without foundation. But, sir, the amendment proposes to form into one State all the extensive country south of the State of Tennessee and east of the Mississippi river, a country greater in extent than Virginia. The bad policy of such a measure is so apparent, that it is improper to waste time talking about it.

Suffer me, sir, said Mr. R., to take some notice of what has been said by an honorable member of this House relative to the principles of the bill. We have been told by that gentleman that though States may be admitted into the Union, no territory which did not belong to the original States can be admitted to be a State. I, said Mr. R., do solemnly protest against this doctrine, and do deny its constitutionality. It is with States as with individuals; if an individual, the head of a family, purchases a farm adjoining that on which he lives and resides, and probably acquires all the right and title thereto, will any one deny it to be his? Will any one say that he has not power to incorporate it with his former farm, so that both shall be one, or in other words, that purchased with the other shall be but one? It is believed no one will say so. The purchaser, sir, can do more; he can place his son or sons thereon, and although so placed, and out of their father's house, they will still remain belonging to the family. The United States, a sovereign, have power to purchase adjacent territory. If all the territory of Louisiana had been vacant and unsettled, and citizens of the United States had from time to time purchased lands therein, and settled themselves and families thereon, and in time became sufficiently numerous to form a State, on the ratio of representation, the Constitution of the United States has fully provided in that case for their admission into the Union. If they cannot be admitted into the Union, will the gentleman tell us what he would do with them? how he would dispose of them? how he would govern or manage them? He appears unwilling in that case to manage and govern them united in the social bands of friendly union; it remains then only for him to govern them under a despotic rod of iron in the hand of unrelenting tyranny from age to age. What difference is there between the case of the people of the Territory of Orleans as they now are, and the case alluded to? Only this: in place of a waste, wild, and uncultivated territory, the United States obtained in an honest and righteous manner, without blood and carnage, a fruitful, luxuriant territory, covered by a great number of people, who, since the time of their being ceded to the United States, have manifested, as much as in their power, their attachment and allegiance to the United States; and shall they be the worse for that? They have heretofore told you, sir, and they now tell you again by their memorial that they pledge themselves, and do solemnly swear allegiance and fidelity to the nation, and do consider themselves a part thereof; and shall not their solemn declaration be believed? or shall a jaundiced jealousy forever prevent them from the enjoyment of the rights, advantages, and immunities, so solemnly guarantied to them? But if the objection of the gentleman could at any time heretofore have had weight, it now comes too late. The United States have acted on the treaty; they have enacted two laws providing Territorial governments for the people of Orleans, and they are solemnly bound and pledged to progress with them until they do admit them into the Union on the footing of the original States. I am almost certain, said Mr. R., that the gentleman who made the objection, clothing himself with the mantle of peace and brotherly love, will, on more mature reflection, cease to press his objection, and will hold out to the people the right hand of fellowship, and say to them: come, my brethren, we are all of one family, let me embrace you.

It has been said by the same gentleman, if you make these people a State where will they find Senators? That, said Mr. R., is not an inquiry for the consideration of this House. Let them be a State, and find Senators how and where they can. The qualification of Senators is not to be ascertained by this House. When they are a State and send Senators to Congress, the Senate of the United States will judge of the qualifications. Here let this point rest, and objections relative to the senatorial order cease.

The same gentleman, if I understood him right, said if we do go on this way we may take the West India islands, and even Great Britain herself, and make them States; and suppose, said Mr. R., that that hereafter shall be the case, it is as reasonable to suppose that that hereafter may be so, as it was one thousand years ago to suppose that Great Britain would now hold sovereignty over the Mogul Empire. But, said Mr. R., if it would please the Almighty Maker of worlds to move the foundations of the West India islands, and place them close alongside of the United States, I would have no objection to the admission of them as States into the Union, if the people thereof were willing. And if the same Almighty Maker of worlds would please, by a tremendous convulsion, to tear up the firm, adamantine foundations of the fast-anchored isle of Britain, and to place it in contact with the United States, I would, with all willingness, give my consent to admit it a State into the Union, provided the people thereof consented thereto, and I would embrace them, and call them my fellow-citizens and brothers of the same family; but a boundless ocean, and the destinies of nations, forbid the hope of such events. It has been said that Orleans is vulnerable, and therefore you ought, sir, to keep the government in your own hands. I draw a conclusion directly contrary. If Orleans be vulnerable, give the people thereof everything to defend; they have now themselves, their wives and children, and their property only to defend; give them all the rights of freemen and citizens, to the full extent of the term, to defend; let them have self-government; let them have all the rights of citizens; let them have a constitution and State government, and a sovereignty to defend, and then, and not until then, you will make them warriors indeed; they will then fight for themselves and for the United States, if invaded, because they will then have everything worth contending for, and because you have liberally endowed them with all these things, their grateful hearts with irresistible vigor will strengthen their arms to wield the sword against the enemies of the United States.

The object of the bill is not to transfer a part of a State to a foreign territory, nor is it to favor a French population at the expense of the rights of the United States, nor is it the object of the bill to transfer to foreigners what has been obtained by the blood of the old States. The Territory of Orleans is not a foreign territory; it is a territory of the United States made and declared to be so by two solemn laws of the Congress of the United States, bottomed on the irrevocable treaty of Paris. The population of the Orleans Territory is not a French population; whatever that population was, before the treaty alluded to, it is now and for about seven years past has been a population composed of citizens, to a certain extent, of the United States. Nor is it the object of the bill to transfer to foreigners what has been obtained by the blood of the old States. The bill contemplates to make the Territory of Orleans a State; the population of that Territory is composed of citizens, to a certain extent, of the United States; whatever the bill therefore contemplates to give, it proposes to give to citizens of the United States. The United States of America, with a vast profusion of precious blood, and with a great expense, purchased the rights of freemen, self-government and independence to themselves, and therewith also the right and ability to communicate those sacred rights to people of all nations, tongues, and kindreds, who, at any time, embodying themselves within the United States, according to the laws thereof, or being inhabitants of territories contiguous thereto, the United States might deem proper, at any time, the consent of all parties interested therein being peaceably obtained, to adopt as their own, to embrace them as their children, and to bring them with parental affection into the bosom of the American family.

If it could be made appear that the United States would become poorer or weaker by giving to the people of Orleans what they request, there would be some reason to argue against the bill; let them be a State, and the United States will be more powerful, because the more numerous an agreeing family is, the more powerful it is; let them be a State, and they will be more induced as citizens to acquire wealth by industry, and every increase of their wealth will be an increase to that of the United States.

Mr. GHOLSON said that the observations of the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. MACON) had rendered it unnecessary for him to make many of the remarks to the committee which he had intended. In no point of view, said Mr. G., in which this subject has been considered, can I perceive any reason for adopting the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. MILLER.) If that gentleman will only advert to the treaty of cession between France and the United States, and to the act of Congress passed pursuant to that treaty, he will readily discover that the amendment he proposes cannot be sanctioned without a manifest violation of public faith. By the third article of the treaty, it is stipulated that "the inhabitants of the ceded territory shall be incorporated in the union of the United States, and admitted as soon as possible, according to the principles of the Federal Constitution, to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages, and immunities of citizens of the United States." On the second of March, 1805, Congress proceeded by an act of legislation to fulfil this engagement with France; and accordingly, by the 7th section of that act, provided "that whenever it shall be ascertained by an actual census or enumeration of the inhabitants of the Territory of Orleans, taken by proper authority, that the number of free inhabitants included therein shall amount to sixty thousand, they shall thereupon be authorized to form for themselves a constitution and State government, and be admitted into the Union upon the footing of the original States, in all respects whatever, conformably to the provisions of the 3d article of the treaty concluded at Paris on the thirtieth of April, one thousand eight hundred and three, between the United States and the French Republic." Now if to the Orleans Territory you add the Mississippi Territory, and of the two erect one State, you evidently will not comply either with your stipulations with the French Republic, or with your covenant to the Orleans Territory. For, by these you have agreed that Orleans shall become a State, and not part of a State only; and there is a wide and substantial distinction between incorporating that Territory, together with other Territories into a single State, as but a fractional part thereof, and authorizing the people of that Territory "to form for themselves a constitution and State government, and to be admitted into the Union upon the footing of the original States." In the former case they may possibly have no influence whatever in appointments to the other branch of the Legislature, and all their interior regulations may also, by possibility, be dictated to them by an ascendant population in the remainder of the State. In the latter case they will, of course, have the entire direction in regard to their system of police and their State institutions, and will moreover have a right, not participated in by any other persons, of sending two Senators to Congress. In fact they will be a distinct State sovereignty. Surely, then, there is a great and obvious difference between what we have so often promised these people, and what is now proposed for them.

But it is contended by the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. WHEATON) that Congress have not the Constitutional power to form a State of the Territory in question, inasmuch as it was acquired by the United States since the adoption of the Constitution. When to adjust this difficulty we refer to that instrument, we find but one section on the subject, which is in the following words: "New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union, but no new State shall be formed or erected within the jurisdiction of any other State; nor any State be formed by the junction of two or more States, or parts of States, without the consent of the Legislatures of the States concerned as well as of Congress." In this delegation of power I can perceive nothing to warrant the inference that it is confined to such territory only as the United States then possessed, or that it excludes the incorporation into the Union of subsequent acquisitions. Indeed this is altogether a novel doctrine, and all the interpretations of the Constitution have been contrary to it. Upon examination, I presume it would prove too much even for its advocate. For, if the construction insisted on would exclude Orleans from the Union, it would likewise exclude the Mississippi Territory, since the latter as well as the former was acquired by the United States posterior to the adoption of the Constitution; and the gentleman has not applied his doctrine to the Mississippi Territory; nor will it. I imagine, he attempted to be shown that the Mississippi is to be shut out of the Union, contrary to our engagements to Georgia, when she ceded to the United States that Territory. The gentleman himself will, perhaps, abandon this ground upon a better consideration of it.

It has been with extreme regret, sir, that I have heard so often, and upon so many former occasions, as well as in the present debate, the charges of French influence and disaffection to this Government, made either in express terms, or else intelligibly insinuated, against the people of New Orleans. Suffer me to ask, sir, where are the evidences to support these imputations? Certainly not before this House. Gentlemen may have received from extraneous sources such impressions on their own minds. But if we examine the history of these people since their connexion with us, abundant testimony will be found, not only to exonerate them from the charge of disaffection, but to demonstrate their fidelity to the American Government. When on the acquisition of that country the most radical innovations upon its laws, customs, usages, and civil proceeding were introduced, these people peaceably submitted without any symptom of insurgency. When they saw many of their dearest rights endangered or prostrated by new and unprecedented modes of judicial proceeding, and by the chicanery of desperate adventurers, they made no unlawful appeals for redress. When their port of entry was most unwarrantably wrested from them and delivered into the possession of an individual, they awaited the ordinary process of law to be reinstated in that use of it which nature had decreed for them, and of which they could by no earthly power be rightfully deprived. And when, in fine, your very borders were invaded they, as faithful citizens, were ready to defend them.

It is to acts like these that I would refer to decide the question whether the people of Orleans are disaffected to this nation.

Mr. BIBB conceived that the House could not adopt such an amendment as that proposed, without the consent of Georgia; for without her consent, they could not make an addition to or division of the Mississippi Territory. It was true, he said, that he had on a former day proposed to make an addition of territory to the Mississippi Territory, but it was only during such time as it should remain a Territory. To this there could be no objection, as there was no prohibition to it in the compact. It had been his intention, if the House had thought proper to sanction his motion, to have made a proposition to the State of Georgia to admit that territory to be incorporated with the Mississippi. The amendment now offered evidently proposed a violation of the compact with Georgia.

Mr. MACON said this bill had taken rather a curious course. The principle and detail had both been attacked; and yet no proposal had been made to try whether the House would legislate on the subject. He had proposed an amendment to do away some of the objections to the detail; but instead of being allowed to amend the bill, the House were met by a Constitutional objection, from the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. WHEATON) to the power of Congress to make a State. If this objection was good, Mr. M. said, he admitted the bill ought not to pass; for, Mr. M. said, on this point he could not agree with the gentleman from Tennessee, that because a treaty had been made in relation to it, it was too late to object to the constitutionality. Mr. M. said no; it was never too late to return to the Constitution. If the article of the Constitution, however, did not mean that Congress might take States out of new territories, what did it mean? There was no occasion for it in relation to the old territories; for the ordinance of the Old Congress had secured to them the right; and these ordinances were as binding as the treaties which Congress had entered into. The change of the form of Government did not affect national obligations. The right to become States was one which Congress could not take from the old Territories. The right of creating States out of acquired territories, was one which he had always contended for; and it had been stated by at least one of those who formed the Constitution, that this article had reference to Canada. "New States may be admitted by the Congress into the Union." At the time this provision was made, Florida and Louisiana were not thought of. Canada was the territory kept in view. Much, sir, said Mr. M., as the United States wanted the southern country, and great as is the convenience of possessing it, I never would have consented to have taken it to have kept them in Territorial government forever. I do not want provinces. I am extremely sorry, sir, that whenever this subject is agitated, we are met by the objection that these people are of French descent. I have before expressed my opinion on this subject, and it is needless to repeat it; but if gentlemen wish them to become our brethren in reality, make them our equals; act just towards them. Do unto them as you would they should do unto you, and make them your friends. I know an opinion is entertained that only those who are of the favored race can be free. I know, sir, that the English nation has been freer than any other; but the time has been that Holland Sweden, and others, have been free—power, however, overcame right, and the people lost their liberties.

I cannot consider it any question for our consideration, who shall be their Senators and who their Representatives. They have had some time a delegate, and will find delegates in the Senate as well as the House of Representatives. It seems to me, sir, that the gentleman from Tennessee need not to have referred to the dispute between the Potomac and the Delaware, because the Constitution has put an end to these sources of strife. It is true, sir, that the Orleans Territory is a slave country, and I would be glad if they could get clear of them; but that does not at all affect this question.

The present situation of Mobile and Orleans is the reason why I want some alteration in the bill. I would rather not have them under the same Government. I have endeavored to ascertain the present population of the Orleans Territory, so called. There is a difference of opinion among those well informed on the subject, from 45 to 55,000. He wished gentlemen would permit them to try the question on the principle of the bill, and ascertain whether the House would do anything with it or not.

Mr. POINDEXTER observed that the proposition of the gentleman from Tennessee for incorporating the present Mississippi Territory with West Florida and the Island of Orleans, to the sea, with a view to form of the whole one State, did not meet his approbation. From the Tennessee line, which would be the northern boundary of the State, to the confluence of the Mississippi with the bay of Mexico, is a distance of from eight hundred to a thousand miles, in the nearest direction, and following the meanders of the river not less in my opinion than twelve hundred miles. Taking the distance generally from the Mississippi to the Georgia line, I should judge it to be about five hundred miles, and from the northernmost point of the State of Georgia to the junction of the Chatahoochee with the sea, cannot be far short of a thousand miles. This vast tract of country, in my humble conception, is too extensive for the purpose of local State government. Indeed, sir, it could hardly be expected, over such an immense territory, interspersed with numerous tribes of Indians, that even the Executive functionaries of Government could be able to perform their duty in the execution of their laws.

That geographical limits, other than those which now divide the Orleans and Mississippi Territories, might be designated, to comport more with the future convenience and prosperity of the country, cannot be denied. I would suggest for the reflection of gentlemen who have to act on this subject, the expediency of making the great river Mississippi the high road between the Eastern and Western States, to be formed on its waters; that no one State should possess both banks of that river. In that event to commence on the eastern shore at the mouth of the Yazoo, in latitude 32° 30'; thence in a direct line to the head-waters of the Chatahoochee, thence to the sea, and along the coast, in a southwestern direction, to Lake Barrataria, thence up the Chafalaga to its junction with the Mississippi, and thence up that river to the mouth of the Yazoo. This tract of country would include about three degrees of latitude; it would combine all the settlements on the Eastern side of the Mississippi, except the county of Madison, which could be disposed of as the wisdom of Congress might hereafter direct. There are various political considerations which operate in favor of the formation of such a State. The people of the Territory of Orleans are petitioning to become an independent State, and I for one hope the prayer of their petition will in substance be granted. It is said that the French population of the city of New Orleans are unfriendly to the American Government. That they have strong prejudices in favor of France. Although, sir, I do not attach so much importance to that circumstance as some gentlemen do, I am willing to admit that French emigrants in Louisiana feel an attachment to their native country. I do not blush to say that were I in France, or in any other foreign country, I could never forget that I was born an American citizen. I could never relinquish my attachments to the land of freedom, in which I inhaled my first breath. Judging, therefore, of the feelings of others, by my own, I cannot doubt that many influential French inhabitants of New Orleans entertain a predilection for the country which gave them birth. But, sir, within the limits which I have submitted to the consideration of the Committee, there is an American population at least sufficient to neutralize every exotic prejudice which may exist in New Orleans. A people whose origin, whose feelings and principles are American, and who are prepared to rally around the standard of the Constitution, in every scene of difficulty and of danger.

JANUARY, 1811.

There is another consideration which has weight on my mind, in favor of such a division of these Territories. The State to be formed would command the mouth of the Mississippi and Mobile rivers—the great outlets to the commerce of the western portion of the United States. It would be sufficiently extensive to contain a population of one million of inhabitants.

The variety of climate and soil which it contains affords a sure basis on which to predict the rapid increase of its physical strength. We might, therefore, at some future day, not far distant, rely with confidence on the internal resources of such a State, for the defence of these important positions against the sudden incursions of a foreign force. The deep interest which the people residing on these waters must feel, in preserving a communication with the Atlantic States, would stimulate them to repel at every hazard an attempt to disturb that intercourse. A powerful State on the southern seacoast of the United States is an object of great magnitude in perpetuating the Union, which, for the happiness of the great American family, ought never to be dissolved. I have, sir, thrown out these hasty hints that gentlemen may improve them if they should be deemed of sufficient value to merit consideration. So far as the people, whom I have the honor to represent on this floor, are concerned in any proposition which may be made relative to a partition of the territories of the United States, on the waters of the Mississippi, I wish it to be distinctly understood, that I ask for them those rights and privileges only which belong to an independent commonwealth, with the boundaries which are prescribed by the articles of cession and agreement between the United States and Georgia. I seek not to dismember neighboring territory, to give an additional number of acres to that which I represent; we are already sufficiently voluminous in that particular. But if, from a full view of the subject, any change in the present limits should be thought conducive to general convenience, and compatible with sound policy, those which I have mentioned appear to me most likely to produce those desirable results. With these impressions, I feel it my duty to resist the amendment which has been proposed by the honorable gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. MILLER's amendment was not agreed to.

SATURDAY, January 5.

On motion of Mr. SEYBERT, a committee was appointed to provide for the safe-keeping of the books which belong to the Library of Congress. Mr. SEYBERT, Mr. QUINCY, and Mr. MACON, were appointed the committee.

Mr. QUINCY presented the memorial of sundry merchants and others of Boston, citizens of the United States, stating, that before they had been apprized of the revival of the non-intercourse as respects Great Britain, they had sent orders to England and Ireland for merchandise; that, before the news could reach England, their vessels would have sailed; and praying that a further time might be allowed for them to reach this country, unaffected by that law.—Referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. SEYBERT presented a petition from sundry merchants, manufacturers, mechanics, traders, and other inhabitants of Philadelphia, praying the renewal of the charter of the Bank of the United States.—Ordered to lie on the table.

On the suggestion of Mr. MONTGOMERY, that he had some communications to make to the House, which in his opinion required secrecy, the doors were closed; and having remained so for some time, were opened; when the House adjourned.

MONDAY, January 7.

Mr. JENNINGS presented a petition of the Legislative Council and House of Representatives of the Indiana Territory, praying for permission to locate a certain quantity of the public lands lying on the main fork of White river, to be established as the permanent seat of Government in said Territory; the Indian title to which lands has been extinguished by the Treaty of Fort Wayne.—Referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. SEYBERT presented petitions of sundry merchants, manufacturers, mechanics, and traders, of the city of Philadelphia, praying the renewal of the United States' Bank charter.—Ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. VAN HORN presented a bill to incorporate the subscribers to the Farmers' Bank of Alexandria; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Wednesday next.

Mr. MORROW, from the Committee on the Public Lands, made a report on the expediency of laying out and making the roads designated in, and providing for the disposal of the lands acquired by, the Treaty of Brownstown, in pursuance of a resolution of the seventeenth ultimo; which was read, and the resolution therein contained concurred in by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That provision ought to be made, by law, for laying out and making the roads designated by the Treaty of Brownstown, and that provision be made for the disposal of the public lands acquired by the said treaty.

Ordered, That a bill be brought in, pursuant to the said resolution; and that the Committee on the Public Lands do prepare and bring in the same.

Mr. MORROW, from the same committee, presented a bill for the relief of Richard Tervin, William Coleman, Edwin Lewis, Samuel Mims, Joseph Wilson, and the Baptist Church at Salem Meeting House, in the Mississippi Territory; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

An engrossed bill to alter the times for holding the district courts in the district of North Carolina was read the third time, and the farther consideration thereof postponed until Thursday next.

Mr. MILNOR, from the committee appointed, on the twenty-fourth ultimo, on the petition of Thomas Campbell, made a report; which was read, and referred to a Committee of the Whole on Thursday next.

The report is as follows:

That it appears to your committee, that Captain Campbell was a brave and meritorious officer; that he served faithfully during the whole of the Revolutionary war; that, in the course of that service, he was repeatedly and severely wounded; that those wounds have not only rendered him unable to gain a livelihood by manual labor, but have rendered his life a continued scene of suffering, and have subjected him to repeated and heavy expenses. The petitioner further states, that he has a wife and five children to provide for; and that, owing to his debility, and the heavy expenses to which he has been subjected in consequence of his wounds, he finds it difficult to provide a subsistence for them. Under these circumstances, the petitioner prays that the bounty and munificence of his country may be extended toward him, so as to render the decline of a life, which has been devoted to the service of his country, more comfortable than it will otherwise be.

Your committee conceive, that the heroes of the Revolution, who nobly stepped forward and expended their blood, and sacrificed their health, in defending their country's rights, have a strong claim upon the justice and liberality of the Government; and they believe few cases can arise exhibiting a stronger claim than that of the petitioner, when we consider the length and severity of his sufferings, and the heavy expenses to which they have subjected him. Under these impressions, the following resolution is submitted to the consideration of the House:

Resolved, That the sum of — dollars be granted to Captain Thomas Campbell, in consideration of the heavy expenses to which he has been subjected, in consequence of wounds received while in the service of his country in the Revolutionary war.

On motion of Mr. MONTGOMERY, the doors were then closed.

The House sat during the whole of this day with closed doors.

WEDNESDAY, January 9.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, prepared in obedience to a resolution of the seventeenth ultimo, respecting unlawful settlements on public lands; which was read, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a resolution for the appointment of a joint committee to have the application of the money appropriated for the purchase of books for the Library of Congress; to which they desire the concurrence of this House.

Mr. Root from the Committee of Claims, presented a bill for the relief of Peter Audrain, accompanied with a report; which were read, and the bill was read the second time, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. MITCHILL presented a petition of the President and Directors of the Bank of New York, praying the renewal of the charter of the Bank of the United States; which was read, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the bill for the renewal of the charter of the Bank of the United States.

A Message was received from the President of the United States, communicating a report of the Director of the Mint, of the operations of that establishment during the last year.

About two o'clock, Mr. BURWELL moved the order of the day, on the bill continuing in force the act incorporating the subscribers to the Bank of the United States; which was not agreed to—ayes 55, noes 60.

EDWARD C. BROWN.

Mr. Root made a report on the petition of Edward C. Brown, that, being barred by the statute of limitations, the committee recommend that the prayer of the petition be not granted.

A motion was made by Mr. GOLD, that it should be recommended to the Committee of Claims, with instructions to make a detailed report on the merits of the petition.

In the course of the discussion of this motion, the expediency of the act of limitation was fully debated, and also the question which has so frequently and diffusely been debated in the House, whether it was proper in any case whatever to make exceptions to the operation of the act of limitation. In this argument, the expediency of the indiscriminate operation of the limitation act was supported by Messrs. ROOT, SMILIE, and MACON, and the contrary opinion maintained by Messrs. PICKMAN, LEWIS, GOLD, WRIGHT, DESHA, GOLDSBOROUGH, and GHOLSON.

The question was decided in favor of a recommitment and of course incidentally against the operation of the statute to bar all claims—for recommitment 67, against it 49, as follows:

Ordered, That Mr. CALHOUN be appointed of the Committee on Foreign Relations, in the place of Mr. TAYLOR, who has resigned his seat in this House.

MISSISSIPPI TERRITORY.

Mr. POINDEXTER from the committee to whom was referred a resolution of the House of Representatives to inquire into the expediency of admitting the Mississippi Territory into the Union, as a separate and independent State, made the following report:

That there has existed, within the Territory aforesaid, a temporary government similar to that prescribed by the ordinance for the Territory Northwest of the river Ohio, since the seventh day of April, one thousand seven hundred and ninety eight; and, although the wisdom of Congress has been displayed in various modifications of that ordinance, it has never ceased to contain principles incompatible with the rights of freemen. The Executive, who is frequently a total stranger to the local circumstances of the country, possesses an unlimited veto on all laws passed by the Representative branch of the Legislature. In addition to which, he is clothed with the odious authority to prorogue and dissolve the General Assembly, and thereby prostrate all power within the Territory to regulate its local and municipal concerns; these high prerogatives emanating from, and fit only to belong to kings and despots, may be exercised at the discretion of the Governor, who is not even required to assign a reason on which the act is founded. The only security, which the people over whom this form of government is established, have, against the frequent and wanton abuse of these powers, is to be found in the mild and conciliatory disposition uniformly manifested by the General Government toward its Territories; but experience has shown that officers, situated at a remote distance from the tribunal to which they are responsible, too frequently "feel power, and forget right," and, by eluding the vigilance of rigid investigation, are enabled to practice acts of oppression with impunity. Your committee forbear to enter into an examination of the various objections which might be urged against the present system of Territorial governments. It is sufficiently obvious, that, in many respects, they are hostile to the free Constitution which guarantees the liberties of every American citizen. Your committee, therefore, consider it an act, both of strict justice and sound policy, to emancipate every Territory of the United States from the trammels of that probationary vassalage, whenever the number of inhabitants within the boundaries of the Territory shall fairly entitle them to a Representative in the Congress of the United States. Your committee have used the best means in their power to ascertain the number of souls within the Mississippi Territory. The official returns of the census have not yet been made to the Department of State, agreeably to the act of the last session, directing a census or enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States; consequently it became necessary and proper to seek, through other channels, the requisite information on that subject. It appears to your committee, from the best evidence which they have been enabled to collect, and on which they confidently rely, that there are in the southern and eastern counties of the Territory about the number of thirty-five thousand souls, and that the county of Madison, situated on the northern extremity of the Territory, near the great bend of the Tennessee river, contains a population of about ten thousand souls; it also appears to your committee that the emigration from the old States to this section of the Union, will, in a very short time, constitute the number of inhabitants required by the articles of cession and agreement between the United States and Georgia, to vest in them the unqualified right to become a member of the Union. Connected with these considerations, the length of time which it will necessarily require to form a constitution, and put the same in operation, affords a strong pledge that, anterior to the final admission of the aforesaid Territory into the Union, the number of its inhabitants will amount to at least sixty thousand.

Your committee are of opinion that, where no Constitutional difficulty occurs, the formation of new States on the southern extremity of the Union ought not to be delayed. It is a remarkable fact, in the annals of this country, that, on the river Mississippi, which is acknowledged by all to be of the first importance, both in reference to its commercial advantages, and the vast extent of fertile territory through which it flows, there does not exist a solitary State government. To unite every portion of the American family, by the indissoluble cord of affection, and to perpetuate the integrity of the Union, are objects paramount to all others which can be presented to the view of the National Legislature. These results cannot be secured but by an equal distribution of rights and privileges through every section of our extensive country. Let each enjoy civil, political, and religious liberty, subject to the control of independent local authorities, while the fostering hand of the Federal Government shall protect them in these enjoyments from domestic feuds and external violence. Your committee, with the foregoing impressions, do not hesitate to recommend the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is expedient to admit the Mississippi Territory into the Union, as a separate and independent State, on an equal footing with the original States; and that provision ought to be made, by law, to authorize the people of said Territory to elect a convention to form a constitution, to be submitted to Congress for their approbation.

Mr. POINDEXTER wished the report to be adopted, and again referred to a select committee, with instructions to report a bill.

On motion of Mr. PITKIN, the resolution was referred to a Committee of the Whole—yeas 64, nays 38.

TERRITORY OF ORLEANS.

On motion of Mr. MACON, the House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for admitting the Territory of Orleans into the Union as a State.

JANUARY, 1811.

Proceedings.

H. OF R.

Mr. MILLER's proposed amendment was before the Committee the last time the subject was under consideration; and the question of course now recurred on the same motion.

Mr. BARRY and Mr. BACON opposed it.

The amendment was disagreed to by a large majority.

Mr. BARRY then proposed the following amendment to the bill:

Provided, That the United States hereby reserve the power of altering the bounds of said Territory, so as not materially to diminish its extent, except so far as relates to that portion of it situated south of the 31st degree of north latitude, and east of a line drawn along the middle of the lakes Pontchartrain, Maurepas, and the river Iberville, to its junction with the Mississippi, power over which is hereby expressly reserved to the United States, to be disposed of in any manner that may be deemed proper.

After some conversation, in which Mr. SHEFFEY declared his intention of moving the amendment which follows, and Mr. POINDEXTER expressed his approbation—

Mr. BARRY withdrew his amendment to make room for it.

Mr. SHEFFEY then moved to insert the following, in place of that part of the bill which prescribed the boundaries of the future State:

"All that territory now contained within the limits of the Territory of Orleans, except that part lying east of the river Iberville and a line to be drawn along the middle of the lakes Maurepas and Pontchartrain to the ocean."

Mr. BIBB stated, that if this amendment was adopted, as he hoped it would, he should call up a resolution which he had submitted a few days ago for appointing a committee to inquire whether the territory West of the Perdido should be added to the Mississippi Territory or assume the form of Territorial government. This would become an after question for the House to decide.

Mr. WRIGHT and Mr. RHEA opposed the amendment on the ground that the Treaty of 1803 with France guarantied to the undivided Territory of Orleans a right to become a State, &c., on the same conditions with other States.

Mr. BIBB and Mr. ELY supported the amendment on the ground of the expediency of leaving that part of their territory, the right to which the President had declared should be a subject of future negotiation, in such a state as would enable the United States to negotiate respecting it.

Mr. SHEFFEY's motion was agreed to, ayes 63.

Mr. MILLER moved an amendment to the bill going to restrict the right of suffrage to white males. He did it on the ground that the mixed population of Orleans was so numerous that they might elect a person of color to the National Legislature; with whom Mr. M. said he should feel no inclination to act.

Mr. POINDEXTER stated the fact of there being in Orleans many of the description of people called Creoles, who were very wealthy and respectable, &c.

Mr. MILLER's motion was negatived—ayes 17.

The period for the election of a convention 11th Con. 3d Sess.—17 was fixed at the third Monday in September next, and the time of its meeting on the 1st Monday in November.

The Committee rose and reported the bill as amended, which was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

THURSDAY, January 10.

On motion of Mr. NEWTON,

Resolved, That a Committee of Commerce and Manufactures be instructed to inquire whether any, and, if any, what, alterations are necessary to be made in the act, entitled "An act to establish the compensations of the officers employed in the collection of the duties on imports and tonnage, and for other purposes," passed the second of March, and, also in the act, entitled "An act relative to the compensations of certain officers of the customs, and to provide for appointing a surveyor in the district therein mentioned," passed the twenty-seventh of March, and that they have leave to report by bill, or otherwise.

Mr. JOHNSON presented a petition of Urbain Guillet, on behalf of himself and his associates, known by the name of "The Society of La Trappe," in the Illinois Territory, praying to be permitted to locate, on any vacant public lands adjoining their establishment, any military and donation rights which they may be able to procure from individuals.—Referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. PITKIN presented a petition of the merchants of Hartford, in the State of Connecticut, to the same effect, with the petition from the merchants of Philadelphia, presented the 18th ultimo.—Referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. WRIGHT reported a bill for the protection and government of West Florida; which was twice read, and on motion of Mr. RHEA, recommended to the committee who reported it, on the ground of its containing provisions clashing with those yesterday agreed on by the House in relation to the Orleans Territory.

The House, on motion of Mr. BIBB, resumed the consideration of the resolution offered by him respecting erecting a separate territorial government in the Territory west of the Perdido, &c. On motion of Mr. BIBB, the same was committed to the committee to whom was recommended the bill this day reported by Mr. WRIGHT.

The resolution from the Senate for the appointment of a joint committee to have the application of the money appropriated to purchase books for the Library of Congress was twice read and concurred in by the House.

Mr. MUMFORD presented a petition of sundry inhabitants of the city of New York, praying the renewal of the charter of the Bank of the United States; which was read, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the bill for the renewal of the charter of said bank.

Mr. VAN HORN, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, presented a bill to amend the charter of the City of Washington; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

An engrossed bill to alter the times for holding the district courts of the district of North Carolina, was again read the third time, and recommended to the committee by whom it was reported.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, in obedience to a resolution of the third instant, respecting the state and operations of the Bank of the United States; which was read, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the bill for the renewal of the charter of the said bank.

The report is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Jan. 9, 1811.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit a report and sundry statements prepared in obedience to the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 3d instant.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

ALBERT GALLATIN:

HON. SPEAKER, House of Reps.

The Secretary of the Treasury, in obedience to the resolution of the House of Representatives of the third instant, respectfully reports—

That the annexed statements marked A, B, and C, contain all the information which the returns made to the Treasury afford on the subjects embraced by the resolutions aforesaid.

It appears by the statement A that the debts due from individuals and bodies corporate to the Bank of the United States, consisted at the respective dates of the several returns of the following items, viz:

Bills and notes discounted, and bonds due by individuals	$15,126,187, 04
Balance due by other banks in account, after deducting the sums due by the Bank of the United States and its branches, to several other banks	1,318,024 29
Bank notes of other banks on hand	511,909 06
Treasury drafts not yet collected,	31,466 01
Overdrawn	32,579 07
Converted six per cent, stock	23,066 23
	17,043,231 70
To which add the loan to the United States	2,750,000 00
Makes for the aggregate of debts due to the bank	$19,793,231 70

In a few instances which are noted in the statement A, the amount due on bonds, and also that of notes discounted, which have been put in suit, is distinctly stated in the returns made to the Treasury; but the aggregate alone is given in most of them, and they do not in any instance distinguish the amount "considered as standing accommodation to the customers of the bank and its branches." A recurrence to the 16th regulation of the 7th section of the act incorporating the bank will show that the only statements that can be required by the officer at the head of the Treasury, are those of the amount of the capital stock of the corporation, of the debts due to the same, of the moneys deposited therein, of the notes in circulation, and of the cash in hand; and that he has no right to ask for the account of any private individuals, or for any other than the abovementioned general statements. Nor has the Secretary of the Treasury any knowledge whatever of the accounts and operations of the Bank, but what is derived from the official statements transmitted to him in conformity with the abovementioned provision in the charter.

The statement B shows the amount of notes of the said bank, and its branches, in circulation, at the date of the latest returns, to have been $5,157,373 83.

The Treasurer's accounts annually laid before Congress show correctly the amount of public moneys deposited in the various banks on the last day of each quarter. But that amount is daily fluctuating, and cannot be stated with perfect precision except on the quarterly statements of those accounts. The Treasurer furnishes, however, the Secretary of the Treasury with a weekly estimate of the cash on hand, and where deposited, and taken from the latest received returns. A copy of that furnished on the 7th instant (marked C.) is herewith transmitted, together with remarks, showing what portions of the revenue are generally deposited in the Bank of the United States and its branches, and what portions are deposited in other banks.

It is probable that the amount of specie in the Treasury will, on the first day of March next, exceed $2,500,000, and that the proportion deposited in the banks other than that of the United States and its branches, will not materially vary from what it is at present. But it is impracticable to form any correct estimate of the probable amount at that time in each place respectively, since that is always regulated by the want of funds in each place for the current service; according to which, the public moneys are daily transferred by drafts from place to place, as the occasion may require.

All which is respectfully submitted.

ALBERT GALLATIN.

ORLEANS TERRITORY.

The bill to enable the people of the Territory of Orleans to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States; was read a third time.

Mr. PITKIN commenced a speech against the bill, chiefly objecting to the detail.

When he had been speaking about half an hour—

The SPEAKER observed that a message was in attendance from the Senate, of a confidential nature.

On motion of Mr. PITKIN, the bill was ordered to lie on the table, the doors were closed, and so remained till four o'clock, when the House adjourned. During the sitting with closed doors, a Message of a confidential nature was received from the President of the United States.

SATURDAY, January 12.

The House continued their sittings with closed doors from Thursday evening until this day, when they were opened about nine o'clock, P. M., and then the House adjourned until Monday morning.

MONDAY, January 14.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed three bills with the following titles:

JANUARY, 1811.

Completing the Capitol—Territory of Orleans.

H. OF R.

"An act authorizing the sale and grant of a certain quantity of public land to the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal Company:

"An act for the relief of the heirs of the late Major General Anthony Wayne;" and

"An act authorizing a subscription, on the part of the United States, to the stock of the Ohio Canal Company;" to which bills they desire the concurrence of this House.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a report of the Secretary of State, in obedience to a resolution of the seventh ultimo, respecting patents; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, in obedience to a resolution of the twenty-first ultimo, respecting moneys paid to the Consuls for the relief of the destitute American seamen in foreign ports; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. SEYBERT, leave was given to withdraw the petition of sundry merchants of Philadelphia, presented the twenty-seventh of February last.

Mr. SAWYER, from the committee to whom was recommitteed the engrossed bill to alter the times for holding the district courts of the district of North Carolina, reported an amendatory bill; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

COMPLETING THE CAPITOL.

Mr. MACON submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before this House an estimate of the sum necessary to finish the Capitol, designating what may be necessary to finish each wing, and the main building, and what time may be required to finish the whole building.

Mr. RHEA moved to strike out so much of the resolution as would confine it to an inquiry into the necessary repairs of the north and south wings, and the expenses of them.

Mr. LEWIS expressed his surprise that any objection should be made to receiving information, whatever disposition there might be to act on it. The resolution went to an object which, in the opinion of Mr. L., ought, long ago, to have attracted the attention of Congress, and he was happy to see it now taken up.

Mr. MACON said, he wished to have a whole view of the subject, and not to go on for ever by little and little to vote a great amount of money without having any estimate. He said they had better look at the subject altogether. He had no idea, however, that Congress would now appropriate a large sum of money to this object; every body knew the Treasury was not in a situation to afford it; but he was opposed to the motion of Mr. RHEA, because he wished to have a view of the whole subject.

Mr. STANFORD said he had no objection to calling for further estimates; but the House had already had several estimates of the expense of finishing each of the wings, which were among the printed documents of the House.

Mr. PICKMAN hoped the amendment would not prevail, although he might feel as little interest in the subject as any one, because he did not expect, after the end of the present session, ever to see Washington again; but it would be a great gratification to him to know that this building was finished, and that it should not stand as a monument of extravagance—of extravagance produced by the mode in which money had been appropriated and expended for it. If the Government should go on, as it had done for eight or ten years, making alterations or repairs, the buildings would be in no better state than they are now, although they would have cost a great deal more money than if an appropriation were at once made to finish the whole. He therefore hoped the resolution would pass without amendment.

Mr. RHEA said, if he believed the gentleman from North Carolina was seriously disposed to do that which his motion proposed to inquire into, he might agree to it. If the buildings were finished, repairs would always be necessary, until materials should be discovered, as durable in their nature as time itself. The idea that the making a large appropriation at once would preclude the necessity of other appropriations was as reasonable as that, because a man made a hearty dinner one day, he should eat none for a week afterwards.

Mr. RHEA's motion for amendment was negatived.

On the suggestion of Mr. TALLMADGE, the resolution was so amended, with the consent of Mr. MACON, as to call for an account of the debts due to individuals at this time for work done on the Capitol; and also for an account of the whole moneys expended on the public buildings.

As amended, the resolution was agreed to, and a committee appointed to present it to the President of the United States.

ORLEANS TERRITORY.

The House resumed the consideration of the engrossed bill to enable the people of the Territory of Orleans to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, and for other purposes.

The bill being on its final passage—

Mr. PITKIN said he had heretofore stated that he had some objections to the bill, which he had intended to have stated to the House when the bill was capable of amendment, but that he had not an opportunity so to do. I have stated, said Mr. P., that it was probable there would be some difficulty between Orleans, when it becomes a State, and the United States, respecting the extent of the State westward. I stated that the United States, in consequence of the purchase of Louisiana with the same extent that it had when Spain and France possessed it, had claimed the territory as far as the river called Rio Bravo; that the negotiations on this subject between the Governments of the United States and Spain were probably unknown to many members of the House, and that it required a pretty accurate knowledge of them, of the extent of the claim, and of the geography of the country, to understand precisely what I meant. I stated that there was an extent of country between a meridional line passing through Nacogdoches and Rio Bravo, of four or five hundred miles in width, which the United States had claimed as being their property. In the negotiations between the two countries, the United States offered to cede all the country between the Rio Bravo and the Colorado running east of it to Spain, on the condition that Spain would cede to the United States all the territory west of the Perdido. This proposition was rejected. Our Commissioners were instructed to assert our title as far as the Rio Bravo, or at least to the Bay of St. Bernard. It is so stated by the President of the United States in the introduction to the compilation of the land laws, in which he states that we unquestionably have a right to the country as far west as the sources of the rivers which fall into the Mississippi, to the sources of the Red river, Arkansas, and Missouri; that with respect to the territory immediately bounding on the Gulf of Mexico, we have claims to the "province of Texas," which it is well known is a very large province. By the bill before us, according to this construction, jurisdiction is extended over this very province; and it may be, and in fact will be, in the power of the State of Orleans to say that our limits extend so far, and therefore to extend their jurisdiction in like manner. In my apprehension, therefore, it is important, while we are making this Territory a State, where the boundaries are disputed, to retain in our own hands the power of settling them. It is known that, by the law which passed providing for the government of the Territory of Orleans, we had liberty to alter the boundary before we made them a State, but not after. Will it not be in the power of the new State to insist on their right to jurisdiction over the territory, at least as far west as the Colorado, and to prevent the United States from ceding any part of it? For instance, sir, the United States may wish, as we have taken Florida as far as the Perdido, subject to future negotiation, to make this arrangement: to cede to Spain a certain proportion west for East Florida. Now, sir, I ask when we have made this country a State if we can do this? I believe it will be said by every person that we cannot, after she becomes a State, alter the boundaries without her consent. I do apprehend, therefore, there will be difficulties on the subject hereafter, if the United States should attempt to settle the boundary in a manner disagreeable to the State; because, if they cannot extend their jurisdiction west of a meridional line passing through Nacogdoches, the territory will be in extent east and west but about one hundred miles, and north and south about one hundred and twenty, and this will make them comparatively a small State.

H. OF R.

Territory of Orleans.

JANUARY, 1811.

As the United States have settled a provisional line, to wit: a meridional line through Nacogdoches, it should not be in the power of the new

State to extend its jurisdiction beyond that line. Provision might be made in this way. The western boundary might be made to conform to the provisional line; and a provision might then be made that there should be reserved to the United States the privilege of adding to it whatever land it should acquire westwardly. Such a provision would leave us at liberty to settle the limits without the interference of that State, and without, I apprehend, much difficulty. This was done in relation to the State of Ohio. Unless the right had been reserved, the consent of the State would have been necessary to a cession, or other alteration of its boundary. Such a course in this case will be perfectly safe for the United States, as well as for the new State. I wish we may so regulate the Territory as there may not in future be any collision between the State and the United States. The province of Texas is in the viceroyalty of New Spain. We know that the Viceroy sent his troops to oppose the passage of our troops, and a provisional line was established. New Spain is very powerful, and I should be very sorry that the new State should have power to embroil the United States with it. I would ask the chairman of the committee who reported this bill, what were his views respecting the western boundary, and how far it was his idea that the new State should extend, and whether it would not comport with his ideas that the change which I have suggested should be made? I could have wished that the bill was in such a state of its progress that I could have moved an amendment; but, as it is, unless I am satisfied that we shall not be involved in difficulty by the consequences I have stated, I shall be unwilling to pass the bill, and must vote against it.

Mr. JOHNSON said he had listened to the objections against extending the right of self-government to the Territory of Orleans with great anxiety. So long as the measure was subject to modification and amendment, said he, I felt disposed to remain silent. But the question now presented is, shall the bill pass by which the Territory will be authorized to form a State government upon certain conditions. The conduct of the United States towards this Territory has been magnanimous, liberal, generous. The conduct of the people deserved it. This disposition on the part of the United States has created in that people a love of independence, and a confidence that every reasonable request would be complied with. These people ask a favor; what is it? The power to erect themselves into an independent State. Is this unreasonable? Is it unnatural that freemen should seek the right of political self-government at their expense and not ours? Do they present a paper in one hand, and a threat in the other? No, sir, they approach you as respectful memorialists asking a favor and not even demanding a right. What reasons of State, then, have we to disappoint the just expectations of this important Territory? The principles of every State constitution in the Union, the political creed so often professed on this floor, the sentiments of freedom as often expressed, and the articles of the Federal Constitution which circumscribe our powers, all unite to enforce the claims of this Territory to State sovereignty. I cannot, I will not therefore withhold my sanction from the wishes of these people. By a change of conduct on my part, I will not be instrumental in changing to enmity the deep-rooted attachment of these people to this country, and our republican institutions. The 30th day of April, 1803, the United States acquired the Territory of Louisiana, the Orleans being a part, by a convention entered into with France at Paris, which convention was ratified by the President of the United States and the Senate, and the Congress made provision for the purchase money. The people of the Orleans Territory have been incorporated into the Union by purchase and adoption, and are entitled to all the rights of American citizens. The third article of said treaty specifies—"That the inhabitants of Louisiana, (the ceded territory,) shall be incorporated into the Union of the United States, and admitted as soon as possible, according to the principles of the Federal Constitution, to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages, and immunities of citizens of the United States." We are thus solemnly bound by compact to admit this Territory into the Union as a State, as soon as possible, consistent with the Constitution of the United States. What principle of the Constitution will be violated by their admission into the Union as a State? In fact, we are bound by the principles of the Constitution; we are bound to the people of the United States; we are bound by conscience, and we are bound by a still more sacred tie to Him who gave us independence to extend the blessings of liberty to these people whenever it is practicable. But the undefined limits of this Territory have furnished ground for serious objection. The western and southern boundary remain subjects of dispute between the United States and Spain, and it is apprehended that it will produce a collision with a foreign Power to erect this Territory into a State. The ingenuity of the gentleman from Connecticut has discovered this difficulty, but his information has furnished an answer. The present state of things will prove the reverse of this position. Why has not the Territorial government produced this collision with a foreign Power? The Territorial administration has extended as far to the west and south as will be given to the State Government; the State sovereignty, as to the extent of country, will be given in the very same words in which the Territorial sovereignty has been exercised without war with a foreign Power. Sir, the danger is ideal, and the imagination should not be employed to embarrass with groundless fears upon a subject of so much magnitude. But I will prove the objection groundless: whether a Territorial or a State government, the dispute as to boundary, if it does exist, is a national dispute to be settled by negotiation. In the year 1782, the United States and Great Britain entered into a provisional treaty. In the first article, Great Britain acknowledges, for the first time, the sovereignty and independence of the United States; and in the second article, the boundary is fixed between the British provinces and the United States. In the year 1783, Great Britain and the United States entered into the Treaty of Peace which ended the war of the Revolution, and in the second article, the boundary lines between the United States and the British provinces are inserted in conformity to the provisional article upon that subject in 1782.

JANUARY, 1811.

Territory of Orleans.

In the second article it is stated that the eastern boundary between the United States and the British provinces should be formed by a line drawn along the middle of the river St. Croix, from its mouth in the Bay of Fundy to its source, and thence to the highlands which divide the waters of the St. Lawrence and the Atlantic. Subsequent to the date of the Treaty of Peace, doubts arose as to the source and run of the St. Croix, as intended by the treaty. Two waters were known by the same name, which is not unfrequent, and, as was to be expected, Great Britain contended for the river which would give them the most territory, as did the United States for that water bearing the name of St. Croix that would extend the limits of the United States. This dispute arose from these facts, and remained unsettled until the year 1794, when Jay's Treaty was entered into, and by mutual agreement commissioners were appointed to receive testimony and finally settle upon the true boundary between the two nations, which was done without producing war, or without the State bordering on the river St. Croix objecting to such a proceeding.

I have an example still more in point, and which must be known to this House, and with the power of Spain, the very nation who disputes the boundary of the Orleans Territory to the west and south. I mean the unsettled and undefined limits of Georgia to the south and west, bordering on the Spanish provinces of East and West Florida, and which was a subject of dispute between Spain and the United States, until the Treaty of 1795 with that Power; the second article of which treaty defines the boundary between the State of Georgia and the Spanish provinces of East and West Florida; and by the third article, Commissioners were appointed to run the line and fix the boundary. Until this Treaty with Spain, of 1795, it is well known that Spain had possession of Natchez and several other places in the territory of the United States, and the Spanish troops and Governor were accordingly removed. This, I presume, should satisfy us upon this head. Every treaty in your statute books proves the practice of nations in settling controversy. These several treaties to which I have adverted have embraced a vast variety of subjects of dispute. The subject of contraband goods, the definition of a blockaded port, the duties upon merchandise and tonnage, are disputes of the commercial kind, which nations settle by negotiation and war, and in character there is no difference in commercial and in territorial disputes. Sometimes a dispute may embrace a few acres of soil unimportant in any point of view, and less important than many commercial rights; at other times a territorial dispute may arise to importance as embracing a most valuable tract of country. In which cases sometimes the dispute may differ as to its intrinsic importance, but not in its character; and this nation will not so far consult the will of any other, as to keep in political chains any portion of our citizens. This dispute may exist until the present generation shall be grey with age.

But the people ask us for the right of self-government, and we grant it upon conditions which make it a great favor to us that the Orleans Territory will become a State upon those conditions. The acceptance of these people on these conditions is the highest evidence of their worth and merit. In twelve months these people, amounting to sixty thousand souls, could demand of you as a right what is asked of you as a favor. The first condition prescribed is, that the public lands belonging to the United States shall ever remain exempt from taxation. This would have been a source of great revenue to this people, and which could not have been considered unreasonable if taxed, as the lands belonging to individuals. The second condition is, that all the legislative, judicial, and executive proceedings, shall be carried on in the English language. The acceptance of this condition proves their love for liberty, their willingness to sacrifice prejudices at the shrine of independence. They are willing to destroy the only remaining vestige of French nationality, the French language, that we may not only be one in sentiment, one great family in principles, but in language, habit, and external appearance. It is a great sacrifice; one which they ought to make, and one worthy alone of freemen. For the great purposes of liberty they are not only willing to lose as soon as possible the language of France, but recollect it is the language of their fathers and mothers. It is the language of their native country. What becomes of the denunciations which we have heard against these people, and the charge of disaffection? The charge is groundless; the imputation is without foundation. It has been contended on this floor, that the people of this Territory can never be admitted into the Union as an independent State, and that they must remain in a state of political vassalage. In article the fourth, section the third, of the Federal Constitution, it is stated, that new States may be admitted by the Congress of the United States into this Union. Here the absolute power of admitting States into the Union is given to the Congress. If this power is given to the people of the United States in Congress assembled, by what fiat are the people of the vast purchase of Louisiana to be deprived of their freedom? By what law of nature are they to be held in political bondage; and by what article in the Constitution are these people disfranchised? I envy not the spirit which dictated this sentiment of galling chains. It was dictated by a spirit of hatred to France and Frenchmen, and not by that spirit of independence which should be cherished by us all. But they are Frenchmen; that is their crime. They are American citizens, and they deserve the name. I will venture to say that there are as many lovers of England and English monarchy as there are lovers of France and French despotism in the United States, and as many lovers of England in as many square miles in the United States as lovers of France in this Territory.

Sir, attend to the happy effects of this measure as it respects the United States; we get rid of the trouble and expense of the territorial government; we shall no longer be embarrassed with territorial petitions and regulations. We shall no longer hear of remonstrances against territorial governors and officers; neither the cries of the injured nor the clamors of envy will assail us; these things will be managed by the State government. The effect of this measure upon the people of the Territory will be still more beneficial and salutary at a crisis so interesting to the American people. Every man has a desire for freedom. By dint of experience man will become enlightened. By the light of his own errors he will become wise and good. The people of this Territory have not only a relish for independence, but they have the capacity of enjoying it. They have not only heard the sound, but they have in part enjoyed the substance. They have been some time a legislative people. Their emancipation from a Territorial government will have a most happy influence upon the morals, the character, and the intelligence of the people. Merit will soon be the test of promotion, and a noble emulation will check an inordinate passion for gain. The spirit of liberty will soon animate every bosom; and the mind will see its own enlargement. It will increase the physical force of the nation, and it will arm the people with additional weapons of self-preservation.

Thus, sir, I have endeavored to prove that no serious objection can be urged to the passage of this bill, and that, by its passage, you extend the blessings of independence to a large and respectable Territory, without abridging the right of others.

MR. QUINCY.—Mr. Speaker, I address you, sir, with an anxiety and distress of mind, with me wholly unprecedented. The friends of this bill seem to consider it as the exercise of a common power; as an ordinary affair; a mere municipal regulation which they expect to see pass without other questions than those concerning details. But, sir, the principle of this bill materially affects the liberties and rights of the whole people of the United States. To me, it appears that it would justify a revolution in this country; and that, in no great length of time, may produce it. When I see the zeal and perseverance with which this bill has been urged along its Parliamentary path, when I know the local interests and associated projects, which combine to promote its success, all opposition to it seems manifestly unavailing. I am almost tempted to leave, without a struggle, my country to its fate. But, sir, while there is life, there is hope. So long as the fatal shaft has not yet sped, if Heaven so will it, the bow may be broken, and the vigor of the mischief-meditating arm withered. If there be a man in this House, or nation, who cherishes the Constitution under which we are assembled, as the chief stay of his hope, as the light which is destined to gladden his own day, and to soften even the gloom of the grave, by the prospect it sheds over his children, I fall not behind him in such sentiments. I will yield to no man in attachment to this Constitution, in veneration for the sages who laid its foundations, in devotion to those principles which form its cement and constitute its proportions. What, then, must be my feelings; what ought to be the feelings of a man cherishing such sentiments, when he sees an act contemplated which lays ruin at the root of all these hopes? When he sees a principle of action about to be usurped, before the operation of which the bands of this Constitution are no more than flax before the fire, or stubble before the whirlwind? When this bill passes, such an act is done, and such a principle usurped.

Mr. Speaker, there is a great rule of human conduct, which he who honestly observes cannot err widely from the path of his sought duty. It is, to be very scrupulous concerning the principles you select as the test of your rights and obligations; to be very faithful in noticing the result of their application; and to be very fearless in tracing and exposing their immediate effects and distant consequences. Under the sanction of this rule of conduct, I am compelled to declare it as my deliberate opinion, that, if this bill passes, the bonds of this Union are virtually dissolved; that the States which compose it are free from their moral obligations, and that, as it will be the right of all, so it will be the duty of some, to prepare definitely for a separation—amicably if they can, violently if they must.

Mr. QUINCY was here called to order by Mr. POINDEXTER.

Mr. QUINCY repeated, and justified the remark he had made, which, to save all misapprehension, he committed to writing, in the following words: "If this bill passes, it is my deliberate opinion that it is virtually a dissolution of this Union; that it will free the States from their moral obligation, and, as it will be the right of all, so it will be the duty of some, definitely to prepare for a separation, amicably if they can, violently if they must."

After some little confusion,

Mr. POINDEXTER required the decision of the Speaker whether it was consistent with the propriety of debate, to use such an expression. He said it was radically wrong for any member to use arguments going to dissolve the Government, and tumble this body itself to dust and ashes. It would be found, from the gentleman's statement of his language, that he had declared the right of any portion of the people to separate—

Mr. QUINCY wished the Speaker to decide, for if the gentleman was permitted to debate the question, he should lose one-half of his speech.

Mr. POINDEXTER said that, by the interruption given him, he perceived the galled jade winced. The question he wished to propound to the Chair was this: Whether it be competent in any member of this House to invite any portion of the people to insurrection, and, of course, to a dissolution of the Union?

Mr. QUINCY. And I, sir, will make this question: Is it not the duty of a member to state the consequences of a measure which appears injurious to him? And the more pregnant the measure is with evil, is not the duty of stating it the more imperious? Such, I say, will be the consequences, and such I mean to prove—

Mr. POINDEXTER wished to know if the gentleman had any more right to debate the question than he had.

Mr. QUINCY resumed his seat; and

The SPEAKER decided that great latitude in debate was generally allowed; and that, by way of argument against a bill, the first part of the gentleman's observations was admissible; but the latter member of the sentence, viz: "That it would be the duty of some States to prepare for a separation, amicably if they can, violently if they must," was contrary to the order of debate.

Mr. LEWIS called for the decision of another question of order, viz: Whether a Delegate, holding a seat in this House by courtesy alone, without a right to vote, has a right to call any member of the House to order?

Mr. NEWTON asked, for what a Delegate was sent here, but to take care of the political rights of the Territory he represented? And where he conceived them to be affected, as in this case, he had certainly the same rights as any other member.

The SPEAKER decided against Mr. LEWIS's appeal to order.

Mr. MACON expressed his wish that the gentleman had not been interrupted in his speech, although no one was more averse to hearing anything said about the dissolution of the Union than he was.

Mr. WRIGHT wished that the gentleman should now be permitted to pursue his speech.

The SPEAKER, however, having decided Mr. QUINCY's observations to be out of order—

Mr. QUINCY appealed from his decision, and required the yeas and nays on the appeal.

Mr. BURWELL said, that the members of the House were responsible, not to the House, but to the people, for the arguments they used in debate; that the rules of the House only applied to the order and facility of public business, and not to the sentiments expressed in debate. Mr. B. said he was far from implying an approbation of the gentleman's sentiments; but he thought they were a matter altogether between himself and his constituents.

Mr. GOLD quoted Jefferson's Manual, to show that whatever was said in debate of a disorderly nature should not be noticed until the person using such words had gone through with his remarks.

Messrs. PITKIN, SHEFFEY, RHEA, and several others, rose to speak; but the SPEAKER read the rule which precludes debate on an appeal from the Speaker's decision.

The question was stated thus: "Is the decision of the SPEAKER correct?" And decided as follows:

YEAS—Lemuel J. Alston, Willis Alston, jun., William Anderson, David Bard, William T. Barry, Adam Boyd, Robert Brown Joseph Calhoun, Matthew Clay, James Cochran, William Crawford, Richard Cutts, John Dawson, Joseph Desha, William Findley, Barzilai Gannett, Gideon Gardner, James Holland, Jacob Hufty, Richard M. Johnson, Walter Jones, Thomas Kenan, William Kennedy, John Love, Aaron Lyle, Alexander McKim, William McKinley, John Montgomery, Nicholas R. Moore, Jeremiah Morrow, Thomas Newbold, John Nicholson, John Rea of Pennsylvania, John Rhea of Tennessee, Matthias Richards, Samuel Ringgold, John Roane, Ebenezer Sage, Thomas Sammons, John A. Scudder, Ebenezer Seaver, Samuel Shaw, Dennis Smelt, John Smilie, George Smith, Henry Southard, John Thompson, Charles Turner, jr., Robert Weasley, Robert Whitehill, Richard Winn, Robert Witherspoon, and Robert Wright—53.

NAYS—Joseph Allen, Ezekiel Bacon, Burwell Bassett, William W. Bibb, Abijah Bigelow, Daniel Blaisdell, William A. Burwell, William Butler, John Campbell, John C. Chamberlain, Wm. Chamberlin, Epaphroditus Champion, Martin Chittenden, John Davenport, junior, James Emott, Jonathan Fisk, Meshack Franklin, David S. Garland, Charles Goldsborough, Peterson Goodwyn, Thomas R. Gold, William Hale, Nathaniel A. Haven, Jonathan H. Hubbard, Ebenezer Huntington, Richard Jackson, jun., Robert Jenkins, Philip B. Key, Herman Knickerbacker, Joseph Lewis, jun., Robert Le Roy Livingston, Nathaniel Macon, Vincent Matthews, Samuel McKee, William Milnor, Samuel L. Mitchell, Jonathan O. Moseley, Thomas Newton, Joseph Pearson, Benjamin Pickman, junior, Timothy Pitkin, jun., Elisha R. Troup, Nicholas Van Dyke, Killian K. Van Rensselaer, and Laban Wheaton—56.

So the decision of the Speaker was reversed; Mr. QUINCY's observations were declared to be in order; and he proceeded.

I rejoice, Mr. Speaker, at the result of this appeal. Not from any personal consideration, but from the respect paid to the essential rights of the people, in one of their Representatives. When I spoke of a separation of the States, as resulting from the violation of the Constitution, contemplated in this bill, I spoke of it as of a necessity, deeply to be deprecated; but as resulting from causes so certain and obvious, as to be absolutely inevitable when the effect of the principle is practically experienced. It is to preserve, to guard the Constitution of my country, that I denounce this attempt. I would rouse the attention of gentlemen from the apathy, with which they seem beset. These observations are not made in a corner; there is no low intrigue; no secret machinations. I am on the people's own ground—to them I appeal, concerning their own rights, their own liberties, their own intent in adopting this Constitution. The voice I have uttered, at which gentlemen startle with such agitation, is no unfriendly voice. I intended it as a voice of warning. By this people, and by the event, if this bill passes, I am willing to be judged, whether it be not a voice of wisdom.

The bill, which is now proposed to be passed, has this assumed principle for its basis—that the three branches of this National Government, without recurrence to conventions of the people, in the States, or to the Legislatures of the States, are authorized to admit new partners to a share of the political power, in countries out of the original limits of the United States. Now, this assumed principle I maintain to be altogether without any sanction in the Constitution. I declare it to be a manifest and atrocious usurpation of power; of a nature, dissolving, according to undeniable principles of moral law, the obligations of our national compact; and leading to all the awful consequences which flow from such a state of things.

Concerning this assumed principle, which is the basis of this bill, this is the general position on which I rest my argument—that if the authority, now proposed to be exercised, be delegated to the three branches of the Government, by virtue of the Constitution, it results either from its general nature, or from its particular provisions. I shall consider distinctly both these sources, in relation to this pretended power.

Touching the general nature of the instrument called the Constitution of the United States, there is no obscurity—it has no fabled descent, like the palladium of ancient Troy, from the heavens. Its origin is not confused by the mists of time, or hidden by the darkness of past, unexplored ages; it is the fabric of our day. Some now living, had a share in its construction—all of us stood by, and saw the rising of the edifice. There can be no doubt about its nature. It is a political compact. By whom? And about what? The preamble to the instrument will answer these questions:

"We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution, for the United States of America."

It is, "we, the people of the United States, for ourselves and our posterity," not for the people of Louisiana; nor for the people of New Orleans, or of Canada. None of these enter into the scope of the instrument; it embraces only "the United States of America." Who those are, it may seem strange, in this place, to inquire. But truly, sir, our imaginations have, of late, been so accustomed to wander after new settlements to the very end of the earth, that it will not be time ill-spent to inquire what this phrase means, and what it includes. These are not terms adopted at hazard; they have reference to a state of things existing anterior to the Constitution. When the people of the present United States began to contemplate a severance from their parent State, it was a long time before they fixed definitely the name by which they would be designated. In 1774, they called themselves "the Colonies and Provinces of North America." In 1775, "the Representatives of the United Colonies of North America." In the Declaration of Independence, "the Representatives of the United States of America." And finally, in the Articles of Confederation, the style of the confederacy is declared to be "the United States of America." It was with reference to the old articles of confederation, and to preserve the identity and established individuality of their character, that the preamble to this Constitution, not content, simply, with declaring that it is "we the people of the United States," who enter into this compact, adds that it is for "the United States of America." Concerning the territory contemplated by the people of the United States, in these general terms, there can be no dispute; it is settled by the treaty of peace, and included within the Atlantic ocean, and St. Croix, the lakes, and more precisely, so far as relates to the frontier, having relation to the present argument, within "a line to be drawn through the middle of the river Mississippi, until it intersect the northernmost part of the thirty-first degree of north latitude to the river Apalachicola, thence along the middle of this river to its junction with the Flint river, thence straight to the head of the St. Mary's river, and thence down the St. Mary's to the Atlantic ocean."

I have been thus particular to draw the minds of gentlemen, distinctly, to the meaning of the terms used in the preamble; to the extent which "the United States" then included; and to the fact that neither New Orleans nor Louisiana were within the comprehension of the terms of this instrument. It is sufficient for the present branch of my argument to say, that there is nothing in the general nature of this compact from which the power contemplated to be exercised in this bill results. On the contrary, as the introduction of a new associate in political power implies, necessarily, a new division of power, and consequent diminution of the relative proportion of the former proprietors of it; there can, certainly, be nothing more obvious, than that from the general nature of the instrument no power can result to diminish and give away to strangers any proportion of the rights of the original partners. If such a power exist, it must be found, then, in the particular provisions in the Constitution. The question now arising is, in which of these provisions is given the power to admit new States, to be created in territories, beyond the limits of the old United States. If it exist anywhere, it is either in the third section of the fourth article of the Constitution, or in the treaty-making power. If it result from neither of these, it is not pretended to be found anywhere else.

That part of the third section of the fourth article, on which the advocates of this bill rely, is the following: "New States may be admitted, by the Congress, into this Union; but no new States shall be formed or erected within the jurisdiction of any other State, nor any State be formed by the junction of two or more States, or parts of States, without the consent of the Legislatures of the States concerned, as well as of the Congress." —I know, Mr. Speaker, that the first clause of this paragraph has been read, with all the superciliousness of a grammarian's triumph. "New States may be admitted, by the Congress, into this Union." Accompanied with this most consequential inquiry: "Is not this a new State to be admitted? And is not here an express authority?" I have no doubt this is a full and satisfactory argument to every one, who is content with the mere colors and superficies of things. And if we were now at the bar of some stall-fed justice, the inquiry would insure victory to the maker of it, to the manifest delight of the constables and suitors of his court. But, sir, we are now before the tribunal of the whole American people; reasoning concerning their liberties, their rights, their Constitution. These are not to be made the victims of the inevitable obscurity of general terms; nor the sport of verbal criticism. The question is concerning the intent of the American people, the proprietors of the old United States, when they agreed to this article. Dictionaries and spelling books are, here, of no authority. Neither Johnson nor Walker, nor Webster nor Dilworth, has any voice in this matter. Sir, the question concerns the proportion of power, reserved by this Constitution, to every State in the Union. Have the three branches of this Government a right, at will, to weaken and outweigh the influence, respectively secured to each State, in this compact, by introducing, at pleasure, new partners, situate beyond the old limits of the United States? The question has not relation merely to New Orleans. The great objection is to the principle of the bill. If this bill be admitted, the whole space of Louisiana, greater, it is said, than the entire extent of the old United States, will be a mighty theatre, in which this Government assumes the right of exercising this unparalleled power. And it will be; there is no concealment, it is intended to be, exercised. Nor will it stop, until the very name and nature of the old partners be overwhelmed by new comers into the Confederacy. Sir, the question goes to the very root of the power and influence of the present members of this Union. The real intent of this article is, therefore, an inquiry of most serious import; and is to be settled only by a recurrence to the known history and known relations of this people and their Constitution. These, I maintain, support this position: that the terms "new States," in this article, do intend new political sovereignties, to be formed within the original limits of the United States; and do not intend new political sovereignties with territorial annexations, to be erected, without the original limits of the United States. I undertake to support both branches of this position to the satisfaction of the people of these United States. As to any expectation of conviction on this floor, I know the nature of the ground; and how hopeless any arguments are, which thwart a concerted course of measures.

I recur, in the first place, to the evidence of history. This furnishes the following leading fact: that before, and at the time of the adoption of this Constitution, the creation of new political sovereignties within the limits of the old United States was contemplated. Among the records of the old Congress will be found a resolution, passed as long ago as the 10th day of October, 1780, contemplating the cession of unappropriated lands to the United States, accompanied by a provision that, "they shall be disposed of for the common benefit of the United States, and be settled and formed into distinct Republican States, which shall become members of the Federal Union, and have the same rights of sovereignty, freedom, and independence, as the other States." Afterward, on the 7th of July, 1786, the subject of "laying out and forming into States" the country lying northwest of the river Ohio, came under the consideration of the same body; and another resolution was passed recommending to the Legislature of Virginia to revise their act of cession, so as to permit a more eligible division of that portion of territory derived from her; "which States," it proceeds to declare, "shall hereafter become members of the Federal Union, and have the same rights of sovereignty, freedom, and independence, as the original States, in conformity with the resolution of Congress of the 10th of October, 1780." All the Territories, to which these resolutions had reference, were undeniably within the ancient limits of the United States.

Here, then, is a leading fact, that the article in the Constitution had a condition of things, notorious at the time when it was adopted, upon which it was to act, and to meet the exigency resulting from which, such an article was requisite. That is to say; new States, within the limits of the United States, were contemplated at the time when the foundations of the Constitution were laid. But we have another authority upon this point, which is, in truth, a contemporaneous exposition of this article of the Constitution. I allude to the resolution, passed on the 3d of July, 1788, in the words following:

"Whereas application has been lately made to Congress by the Legislature of Virginia, and the district of Kentucky, for the admission of the said district into the Federal Union, as a separate member thereof, on the terms contained in the acts of the said Legislature, and in the resolutions of the said district, relative to the premises. And whereas Congress, having fully considered the subject, did, on the third day of June last, resolve that it is expedient that the said district be erected into a sovereign and independent State and a separate member of the Federal Union; and appointed a committee to report and act accordingly, which committee, on the second instant, was discharged, it appearing that nine States had adopted the Constitution of the United States, lately submitted to conventions of the people. And whereas a new Confederacy is formed among the ratifying States, and there is reason to believe that the State of Virginia, including the said district, did, on the 25th of June last, become a member of the said Confederacy: And whereas an act of Congress, in the present state of the government of the country, severing a part of the said State from the other parts thereof, and admitting into the Confederacy, formed by the articles of Confederation and perpetual union, as an independent member thereof, may be attended with many inconveniences, while it can have no effect to make the said district a separate member of the Federal Union, formed by the adoption of the said Constitution, and therefore it must be manifestly improper for Congress assembled, under the articles of Confederation, to adopt any other measures relative to the premises than those which express their sense, that the said district ought to be an independent member of the Union, as soon as circumstances shall permit proper measures to be adopted for that purpose,

"Resolved, That a copy of the proceedings of Congress, relative to the independency of the district of Kentucky, be transmitted to the Legislature of Virginia, and also to Samuel McDowell, Esq., late President of the said Convention; and that the said Legislature, and the inhabitants of the said district aforesaid, be informed that, as the Constitution of the United States is now ratified, Congress think it undesirable to adopt any further measures, for admitting the district of Kentucky into the Federal Union, as an independent member thereof, under the articles of Confederation and perpetual union; but that Congress, thinking it expedient that the said district be made a separate State and member of the Union, as soon after proceedings shall commence under the said Constitution as circumstances shall permit, recommend it to the said Legislature, and to the inhabitants of the said district, so to alter their acts, and resolutions, relative to the premises, as to render them conformable to the provisions made in the said Constitution, to the end that no impediment may be in the way of the speedy accomplishment of this important business."

In this resolution of the old Congress, it is expressly declared, that the Constitution of the United States having been adopted by nine States, an act of the old Congress could have no effect to make Kentucky a separate member of the Union, and that, although they thought it expedient that it should so be admitted, yet that this could only be done under the provisions made in the new constitution. It is impossible to have a more direct contemporaneous evidence that the case contemplated in this article was that of the Territories within the limits of the United States; yet the gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. Macon,) for whose integrity and independence I have very great respect, told us the other day, that "if this article had not territories without the limits of the old United States to act upon, it would be wholly without meaning. Because the ordinance of the old Congress had secured the right to the States within the old United States, and a provision for that object, in the new constitution, was wholly unnecessary." Now, I will appeal to the gentleman's own candor, if the very reverse of the conclusion he draws is not the true one, after he has considered the following fact: That, by this ordinance of the old Congress, it was declared, that the boundaries of the contemplated States, and the terms of their admission, should be, in certain particulars, specified in the ordinance, subject to the control of Congress. Now, as by the new constitution the old Congress was about to be annihilated, it was absolutely necessary for the very fulfilment of this ordinance, that the new constitution should have this power for the admission of new States within the ancient limits, so that the ordinance of the old Congress, far from showing the inutility of such a provision for the Territories within the ancient limits, expressly proves the reverse, and is an evidence of its necessity to effect the object of the ordinance itself.

I think there can be no more satisfactory evidence adduced or required of the first part of the position, that the terms "new States" did intend new political sovereignties within the limits of the old United States. For it is here shown, that the creation of such States, within the territorial limits fixed by the treaty of 1783, had been contemplated; that the old Congress itself expressly asserts that the new Constitution gave the power for that object; that the nature of the old ordinance required such a power, for the purpose of carrying its provisions into effect, and that it has been, from the time of the adoption of the Federal Constitution, unto this hour, applied exclusively to the admission of States, within the limits of the old United States, and was never attempted to be extended to any other object.

Now, having shown a purpose, at the time of the adoption of the Constitution of the United States, sufficient to occupy the whole scope of the terms of the article, ought not the evidence be very strong to satisfy the mind, that the terms really intended something else, besides this obvious purpose; that it may be fairly extended to the entire circle of the globe, wherever title can be obtained by purchase, or conquest, and the new partners in the political power may be admitted at the mere discretion of this Legislature, any where that it wills. A principle thus monstrous is asserted in this bill.

But I think it may be made satisfactorily to appear not only that the terms "new States" in this article did mean political sovereignties to be formed within the original limits of the United States, as has just been shown, but, also, negatively, that it did not intend new political sovereignties, with territorial annexations, to be created without those original limits. This appears first from the very tenor of the article. All its limitations have respect to the creation of States, within the original limits. Two States shall not be joined; no new State shall be erected, within the jurisdiction of any other State, without the consent of the Legislatures of the States concerned as well as of Congress. Now, had foreign territories been contemplated, had the new habits, customs, manners, and language of other nations been in the idea of the framers of this Constitution, would not some limitation have been devised, to guard against the abuse of a power, in its nature so enormous, and so obviously, when it occurred, calculated to excite just jealousy among the States, whose relative weight would be so essentially affected by such an infusion at once of a mass of foreigners into their Councils, and into all the rights of the country? The want of all limitation of such power would be a strong evidence, were others wanting, that the powers, now about to be exercised, never entered into the imagination of those thoughtful and prescient men, who constructed the fabric. But there is another most powerful argument against the extension of this article to embrace the right to create States without the original limits of the United States, deducible from the utter silence of all debates at the period of the adoption of the Federal Constitution, touching the power here proposed to be usurped. If ever there was a time, in which the ingenuity of the greatest men of an age was taxed to find arguments in favor of and against any political measure, it was at the time of the adoption of this Constitution. All the faculties of the human mind were, on the one side and the other, put upon their utmost stretch, to find the real and imaginary blessings or evils, likely to result from the proposed measure. Now I call upon the advocates of this bill to point out, in all the debates of that period, in any one publication, in any one newspaper of those times, a single intimation, by friend or foe to the Constitution, approving or censuring it for containing the power, here proposed to be usurped, or a single suggestion that it might be extended to such an object, as is now proposed. I do not say that no such suggestion was ever made. But this I will say, that I do not believe there is such an one anywhere to be found. Certain I am, I have never been able to meet the shadow of such a suggestion, and I have made no inconsiderable research upon the point. Such may exist—but until it be produced, we have a right to reason as though it had no existence. No sir. The people of this country at that day had no idea of the territorial avidity of their successors. It was, on the contrary, an argument, urged against the success of the project, that the territory was too extensive for a Republican form of Government. But, now there is no limits to our ambitious hopes. We are about to cross the Mississippi. The Missouri and Red river are but roads, on which our imagination travels to new lands and new States to be raised and admitted (under the power, now first usurped) into this Union, among undiscovered lands, in the west. But it has been suggested that the Convention had Canada in view, in this article, and the gentleman from North Carolina told this House, that a member of the Convention, as I understood him, either now, or lately a member of the Senate, informed him that the article had that reference. Sir, I have no doubt, the gentleman from North Carolina has had a communication such as he intimates. But, for myself, I have no sort of faith in these convenient recollections, suited to serve a turn, to furnish an apology for a party, or give color to a project. I do not deny, on the contrary I believe it very probable, that among the courings of some discursive and craving fancy, such thoughts might be started; but that is not the question. Was this an avowed object in the Convention when it formed this article? Did it enter into the conception of the people when its principles were discussed? Sir, it did not, it could not. The very intention would have been a disgrace both to this people and the Convention. What, sir! Shall it be intimated; shall it for a moment be admitted, that the noblest and purest band of patriots, this, or any other country, ever could boast, were engaged in machinating means for the dismemberment of the territories of a Power to which they had pledged friendship, and the observance of all the obligations which grow out of a strict and perfect amity? The honor of our country forbids and disdains such a suggestion.

But there is an argument stronger, even than all those which have been produced, to be drawn from the nature of the power here proposed to be exercised. Is it possible, that such a power, if it had been intended to be given, by the people, should be left dependent upon the effect of general expressions; and such too, as were obviously applicable to another subject; to a particular exigency contemplated at the time? Sir, what is this power, we propose now to usurp? Nothing less than a power, changing all the proportion of the weight and influence, possessed by the potent sovereignties composing this Union. A stranger is to be introduced to an equal share, without their consent. Upon a principle, pretended to be deduced from the Constitution—this Government, after this bill passes, may and will multiply foreign partners in power, at its own mere motion; at its irresponsible pleasure; in other words, as local interests, party passions, or ambitious views may suggest. It is a power, that, from its nature, never could be delegated; never was delegated; and as it breaks down all the proportions of power guarantied by the Constitution, to the States, upon which their essential security depends, utterly annihilates the moral force of this political contract. Would this people, so wisely vigilant concerning their rights, have transferred to Congress a power to balance, at its will, the political weight of any one State, much more of all the States, by authorizing it to create new States at its pleasure, in foreign countries, not pretended to be within the scope of the Constitution or the conception of the people, at the time of passing it?

This is not so much a question concerning the exercise of sovereignty, as it is who shall be sovereign. Whether the proprietors of the good old United States shall manage their own affairs in their own way; or, whether they, and their Constitution, and their political rights, shall be trampled under foot by foreigners introduced through a breach of the Constitution. The proportion of the political weight of each sovereign State, constituting this Union, depends upon the number of the States which have a voice under the compact. This number the Constitution permits us to multiply at pleasure, within the limits of the original United States; observing only the expressed limitations in the Constitution. But when in order to increase your power of augmenting this number you pass the old limits, you are guilty of a violation of the Constitution, in a fundamental point; and in one also, which is totally inconsistent with the intent of the contract, and the safety of the States, which established the association. What is the practical difference to the old partners, whether they hold their liberties at the will of a master, or whether, by admitting exterior States on an equal footing with the original States, arbiters are constituted, who by availing themselves of the contrariety of interests and views, which in such a confederacy necessarily will arise, hold the balance among the parties, which exist and govern us, by throwing themselves into the scale most conformable to their purposes? In both cases there is an effective despotism. But the last is the more galling, as we carry the chain in the name and gait of freemen.

I have thus shown, and whether fairly, I am willing to be judged by the sound discretion of the American people, that the power, proposed to be usurped, in this bill, results neither from the general nature, nor the particular provisions, of the Federal Constitution; and that it is a palpable violation of it in a fundamental point; whence flow all the consequences I have intimated.

But, says the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. RHEA) "these people have been seven years citizens of the United States." I deny it. Sir—as citizens of New Orleans, or of Louisiana, they never have been, and by the mode proposed they never will be, citizens of the United States. They may be girt upon us for the moment, but no real cement can grow from such an association. What the real situation of the inhabitants of those foreign countries is, I shall have occasion to show presently. But, says the same gentleman, "If I have a farm have not I a right to purchase another farm in my neighborhood, and settle my sons upon it, and in time admit them to a share, in the management of my household?" Doubtless, sir. But are these cases parallel? Are the three branches of this Government owners of this farm called the United States? I desire to thank Heaven, they are not. I hold my life, liberty, and property, and the people of the State, from which I have the honor to be a Representative, hold theirs, by a better tenure than any this National Government can give. Sir, I know your virtue. And I thank the Great Giver of every good gift, that neither the gentleman from Tennessee, nor his comrades, nor any, nor all the members of this House, nor of the other branch of the Legislature, nor the good gentleman who lives in the palace yonder, nor all combined, can touch these my essential rights and those of my friends and constituents, except in a limited and prescribed form. No, sir. We hold these by the laws, customs, and principles of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts. Behind her ample shield we find refuge, and feel safety. I beg gentlemen not to act upon the principle that the Commonwealth of Massachusetts is their farm.

But, the gentleman adds, "what shall we do, if we do not admit the people of Louisiana into our Union—our children are settling that country." Sir, it is no concern of mine what he does.

JANUARY, 1811.

Territory of Orleans.

H. OF R.

Because his children have run wild and uncovered into the woods, is that a reason for him to break into my house, or the houses of my friends, to filch our children's clothes, in order to cover his children's nakedness? This Constitution never was, and never can be strained to lap over all the wilderness of the West, without essentially affecting both the rights and convenience of its real proprietors. It was never constructed to form a covering for the inhabitants of the Missouri, and the Red River country. And whenever it is attempted to be stretched over them, it will rend asunder. I have done with this part of my argument. It rests upon this fundamental principle, that the proportion of political power, subject only to the internal modifications permitted by the Constitution, is an inalienable, essential, intangible right. When it is touched, the fabric is annihilated. For on the preservation of these proportions depend our rights and liberties.

If we recur to the known relations existing among the States, at the time of the adoption of this Constitution, the same conclusion will result. The various interests, habits, manners, prejudices, education, situation, and views, which excited jealousies and anxieties in the breasts of some of our most distinguished citizens, touching the result of the proposed Constitution, were potent obstacles to its adoption. The immortal leader of our Revolution, in his letter to the President of the old Congress, written as President of the Convention which formed this compact, thus speaks on this subject: "It is at all times difficult to draw with precision the line between those rights which must be surrendered, and those which may be reserved; and on the present occasion, this difficulty was increased by a difference among the several States as to their situation, extent, habits, and particular interests." The debates of that period will show that the effect of the slave votes, upon the political influence of this part of the country, and the anticipated variation of the weight of power to the West, were subjects of great jealousy to some of the best patriots in the Northern and Eastern States. Suppose, then, that it had been distinctly foreseen, that, in addition to the effect of this weight, the whole population of a world beyond the Mississippi was to be brought into this and the other branch of the Legislature, to form our laws, control our rights, and decide our destiny. Sir, can it be pretended that the patriots of that day would for one moment have listened to it? They were not madmen. They had not taken degrees at the hospital of idiocy. They knew the nature of man and the effect of his combinations in political societies. They knew that when the weight of particular sections of a confederacy was greatly unequal, the resulting power would be abused; that it was not in the nature of man to exercise it with moderation. The very extravagance of the intended use is a conclusive evidence against the possibility of the grant of such a power, as is here proposed. Why, sir, I have already heard of six States, and some say there will be at no great distance of time, more. I have also heard that the mouth of the Ohio will be far to the east of the centre of the contemplated empire. If the bill is passed, the principle is recognised. All the rest are mere questions of expediency. It is impossible such a power could be granted. It was not for these men that our fathers fought. It was not for them this Constitution was adopted. You have no authority to throw the rights and liberties, and property of this people, into a "hotch-pot" with the wild men on the Missouri, nor with the mixed, though more respectable race of Anglo-Hispano-Gallo Americans, who bask on the sands, in the mouth of the Mississippi. I make no objection to these from their want of moral qualities or political light. The inhabitants of New Orleans are, I suppose, like those of all other countries, some good, some bad, some indifferent.

As then the power in this bill proposed to be usurped, is neither to be drawn from the general nature of the instrument, nor from the clause just examined, it follows, that if it exist anywhere, it must result from the treaty-making power. This the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. RHEA) asserts—but the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. MACON) denies; and very justly. For what a monstrous position is this, that the treaty-making power has the competency to change the fundamental relations of the Constitution itself! That a power under the Constitution should have the ability to change and annihilate the instrument from which it derives all its power—and if the treaty-making power can introduce new partners to the political rights of the States, there is no length, however extravagant, or inconsistent with the end, to which it may not be wrested.

The present President of the United States, when a member of the Virginia Convention for adopting the Constitution, expressly declares that the treaty-making power has limitations; and he states this as one, "that it cannot alienate any essential right." Now, is not here an essential right to be alienated? The right to that proportion of political power which the Constitution has secured to every State, modified only by such internal increase of States as the existing limits of the Territories at the time of the adoption of the Constitution permitted. The debates of that period chiefly turned upon the competency of this power to bargain away any of the old States. It was agreed, at that time, that by this power old States within the ancient limits could not be sold from us. And I maintain that, by it, new States without the ancient limits cannot be saddled upon us. It was agreed, at that time, that the treaty-making power "could not cut off a limb." And I maintain, that neither has it the competency to clap a hump upon our shoulders. The fair proportions devised by the Constitution are in both cases marred, and the fate and felicity of the political being, in material particulars, related to the essence of his constitution, affected. It was never pretended, by the most enthusiastic advocates for the extent of the treaty-making power, that it exceeded that of the King of Great Britain. Yet, I ask, suppose that Monarch should make a treaty, stipulating that Hanover or Hindostan should have a right of representation on the floor of Parliament, would such a treaty be binding? No, sir; not, as I believe, if a House of Commons and of Lords could be found venal enough to agree to it. But although in that country the three branches of its legislature are called omnipotent, and the people might not deem themselves justified in resistance, yet here there is no apology of this kind; the limits of our power are distinctly marked; and when the three branches of this Government usurp upon this Constitution in particulars vital to the liberties of this people, the deed is at their peril.

I have done with the Constitutional argument. Whether I have been able to convince any member of this House, I am ignorant—I had almost said indifferent. But this I will not say, because I am, indeed, deeply anxious to prevent the passage of this bill. Of this I am certain, however, that when the dissension of this day is passed away, when party spirit shall no longer prevent the people of the United States from looking at the principle assumed in it, independent of gross and deceptive attachments and antipathies, that the ground here defended will be acknowledged as a high Constitutional bulwark, and that the principles here advanced will be appreciated.

I will add one word, touching the situation of New Orleans. The provision of the treaty of 1803, which stipulates that it shall be "admitted as soon as possible," does not therefore imply a violation of the Constitution. There are ways in which this may constitutionally be effected—by an amendment of the Constitution, or by reference to conventions of the people in the States. And I do suppose, that, in relation to the objects of the present bill, (with the people of New Orleans,) no great difficulty would arise. Considered as an important accommodation to the Western States, there would be no violent objection to the measure. But this would not answer all the projects to which the principle of this bill, when once admitted, leads, and is intended to be applied. The whole extent of Louisiana is to be cut up into independent States, to counterbalance and to paralyze whatever there is of influence in other quarters of the Union. Such a power, I am well aware that the people of the States would never grant you. And therefore, if you get it, the only way is by the mode adopted in this bill—by usurpation.

The objection here urged is not a new one. I refer with great delicacy to the course pursued by any member of the other branch of the Legislature; yet I have it from such authority that I have an entire belief of the fact, that our present Minister in Russia, then a member of that body, when the Louisiana treaty was under the consideration of the Senate, although he was in favor of the treaty, yet expressed great doubts on the ground of constitutionality, in relation to our control over the destinies of that people, and the manner and the principles on which they could be admitted into the Union. And it does appear that he made two several motions in that body, having for their object, as avowed, and as gathered from their nature, an alteration in the Constitution, to enable us to comply with the stipulations of that Convention.

I will add only a few words in relation to the moral and political consequences of usurping this power. I have said, that it would be a virtual dissolution of the Union; and gentlemen express great sensibility at the expression. But the true source of terror is not the declaration I have made, but the deed you propose. Is there a moral principle of public law better settled, or more conformable to the plainest suggestions of reason, than that the violation of a contract by one of the parties may be considered as exempting the other from its obligations? Suppose, in private life, thirteen form a partnership, and ten of them undertake to admit a new partner without the concurrence of the other three, would it not be at their option to abandon the partnership, after so palpable an infringement of their rights? How much more, in the political partnership, where the admission of new associates, without previous authority, is so pregnant with obvious dangers and evils! Again: it is settled as a principle of morality, among writers on public law, that no person can be obliged, beyond his intent at the time of the contract. Now, who believes, who dare assert, that it was the intention of the people, when they adopted this Constitution, to assign, eventually, to New Orleans and Louisiana, a portion of their political power, and to invest all the people those extensive regions might hereafter contain with an authority over themselves and their descendants? When you throw the weight of Louisiana into the scale, you destroy the political equipoise contemplated at the time of forming the contract. Can any man venture to affirm that the people did intend such a comprehension as you now, by construction, give it; or can it be concealed that, beyond its fair and acknowledged intent, such a compact has no moral force? If gentlemen are so alarmed at the bare mention of the consequences, let them abandon a measure which sooner or later will produce them. How long before the seeds of discontent will ripen, no man can foretell; but it is the part of wisdom not to multiply or scatter them. Do you suppose the people of the Northern and Atlantic States will, or ought to, look on with patience and see Representatives and Senators from the Red river and Missouri pouring themselves upon this and the other floor, managing the concerns of a seaboard fifteen hundred miles at least from their residence, and having a preponderancy in councils, into which, constitutionally, they could never have been admitted? I have no hesitation upon this point. They neither will see it, nor ought to see it, with content. It is the part of a wise man to foresee danger, and to hide himself. This great usurpation, which creeps into this House under the plausible appearance of giving content to that important point, New Orleans, starts up a gigantic power to control the nation. Upon the actual condition of things, there is, there can be, no need of concealment. It is apparent to the blindest vision. By the course of nature, and conformable to the acknowledged principles of the Constitution, the sceptre of power in this country is passing towards the Northwest. Sir, there is to this no objection. The right belongs to that quarter of the country; enjoy it; it is yours. Use the powers granted as you please; but take care, in your haste after effectual dominion, not to overload the scales by heaping it with these new acquisitions. Grasp not too eagerly at your purpose. In your speed after uncontrolled sway, trample not down this Constitution. Already the old States sink in the estimation of members, when brought into comparison with these new countries. We have been told, that "New Orleans was the most important point in the Union." A place out of the Union the most important place within it! We have been asked, "What are some of the small States, when compared with the Mississippi Territory?" The gentleman from that Territory, (Mr. POINDEXTER,) spoke the other day of the Mississippi as "of a high road between" —. Good heavens, between what, Mr. Speaker? Why, "The Eastern and Western States." So that all the Northwestern Territories, all the countries once the extreme western boundary of our Union, are hereafter to be denominated Eastern States.

JANUARY, 1811.

[Mr. POINDEXTER explained. He said that he had not said that the Mississippi was to be the boundary between the Eastern and Western States. He had merely thrown out a hint, that, in erecting new States, it might be a good high-road between the States on its waters. His idea had not extended beyond the new States, on the waters of the Mississippi.]

I make no great point of this matter. The gentlemen will find, in the National Intelligencer, the terms to which I refer. There will be seen, I presume, what he has said, and what he has not said. The argument is not affected by the explanation. New States are intended to be formed beyond the Mississippi. There is no limit to men's imaginations, on this subject, short of California and Columbia river. When I said that the bill would justify a revolution, and would produce it, I spoke of its principle and its practical consequences. To this principle and those consequences, I would call the attention of this House and nation. If it be about to introduce a condition of things absolutely insupportable, it becomes wise and honest men to anticipate the evil, and to warn and prepare the people against the event. I have no hesitation on the subject. The extension of this principle to the States, contemplated beyond the Mississippi, cannot, will not, and ought not, to be borne. And the sooner the people contemplate the unavoidable result, the better; the more likely that convulsions may be prevented; the more hope that the evils may be palliated or removed.

Mr. Speaker: What is this liberty of which so much is said? Is it to walk about this earth, to breathe this air, and to partake the common blessings of God's providence? The beasts of the field and the birds of the air unite with us in such privileges as these. But man boasts a purer and more etherial temperature. His mind grasps in its view the past and the future, as well as the present. We live not for ourselves alone. That which we call liberty, is that principle on which the essential security of our political condition depends. It results from the limitations of our political system, prescribed in the Constitution. These limitations, so long as they are faithfully observed, maintain order, peace, and safety. When they are violated in essential particulars, all the concurrent spheres of authority rush against each other, and disorder, derangement, and convulsion are, sooner or later, the necessary consequences.

With respect to this love of our Union, concerning which so much sensibility is expressed, I have no fear about analyzing its nature. There is in it nothing of mystery. It depends upon the qualities of that Union, and it results from its effects upon our and our country's happiness. It is valued for "that sober certainty of waking bliss," which it enables us to realize. It grows out of the affections, and has not, and cannot be made to have, anything universal in its nature. Sir, I confess it, the first public love of my heart is the Commonwealth of Massachusetts. There is my fireside; there are the tombs of my ancestors—

"Low lies that land, yet blest with fruitful stores, Strong are her sons, though rocky are her shores;
And none, ah! none, so lovely to my sight,
Of all the lands which Heaven o'erspreads with light."

The love of this Union grows out of this attachment to my native soil, and is rooted in it. I cherish it, because it affords the best external hope of her peace, her prosperity, her independence. I oppose this bill from no animosity to the people of New Orleans, but from the deep conviction that it contains a principle incompatible with the liberties and safety of my country. I have no concealment of my opinion. The bill, if it passes, is a death-blow to the Constitution. It may, afterwards, linger; but lingering, its fate will, at no very distant period, be consummated.

When Mr. QUINCY had concluded, he moved that the said bill be postponed indefinitely.

Mr. GARLAND said he had a report to make, from the Committee of Enrolled Bills, of a confidential nature.

A motion was made to adjourn, and lost.

The bill was ordered to lie on the table, and stangers were excluded for a few minutes.

RELATIONS WITH GREAT BRITAIN.

When the doors were opened, the following Message, received in the course of the day, was read:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

I transmit to Congress copies of a letter from the Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States, at London, to the Secretary of State, and of another, from the same, to the British Secretary for Foreign Affairs.

JAMES MADISON.

JANUARY 12, 1811.

Mr. Pinkney to Mr. Smith.

LONDON, November 5, 1810.

SIR: I have presented a second note, of which a copy is enclosed, to Lord Wellesley, on the subject of the Orders in Council, under an impression that the state of the King's health (for which I beg to refer you to the paper herewith transmitted) did not render it improper, and that if it was not improper on that account, it was indispensable on every other.

The day had gone by when the Berlin and Milan decrees were to cease to operate, according to the communication made by the Government of France to the American Minister at Paris, and published in the official journal of that Government; and yet no step whatever had been taken, or apparently thought of, towards the revocation of the British orders. I had received no explanation of the reasons of this backwardness, and no such assurance, looking to the future, as could justify an opinion, that it would not continue. Lord Wellesley's letter of the 31st of August, which I had left unanswered till after 1st of November, that I might stand on the strongest possible ground when I did answer it, made no profession of being a present measure, and (though from obvious motives, I have not so represented it in my note to him of the third instant) was vague and equivocal as a prospective pledge. It defined nothing, and was so far from warranting any specific expectation, that it seemed rather to take away the very little of precision which belonged to former declarations on the same point. It was highly important to the commerce of the United States, that this ambiguity should be cleared away, with all practicable expedition, and if it could not be removed, that no presumption should be afforded of a disposition on the part of the United States to acquiesce in it. My note to Lord Wellesley was written and delivered upon these inducements.

In the King's actual situation, the Orders in Council can scarcely be formally recalled, even if the Cabinet are so inclined; but it does not follow that something may not be done (though I have no reason to think that anything will be done,) which may be productive of immediate advantage, and at any rate prepare the way for the desired repeal.

I have the honor to be, with great consideration, sir, your most obedient humble servant,

WM. PINKNEY.

Hon. ROBERT SMITH, Secretary of State.

P. S. This letter is written in great haste, that I may send it to Liverpool by this evening's mail.

WM. PINKNEY.

Mr. Pinkney to Lord Wellesley.

GREAT CUMBERLAND PLACE, Nov. 3, 1810.

MY LORD: In my note of the 25th of August, I had the honor to state to your Lordship, that I had received from the Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States, at Paris, a letter, dated the 6th of that month, in which he informed me, that he had received from the French Government a written and official notice, that it had revoked the decrees of Berlin and Milan, and that, after the first of November, those decrees would cease to have any effect; and I expressed my confidence, that the revocation of the British Orders in Council, of January and November, 1807, and April, 1809, and of all other orders, dependent upon, analogous to, or in execution of them, would follow of course.

Your Lordship's reply, of the 31st of August, to that note, repeated a declaration of the British Minister in America, made, as it appears, to the Government of the United States in February, 1808, of "His Majesty's earnest desire to see the commerce of the world restored to that freedom which is necessary for its prosperity, and his readiness to abandon the system which had been forced upon him, whenever the enemy should retract the principles which had rendered it necessary;" and added an official assurance, that, "whenever the repeal of the French decrees should have actually taken effect, and the commerce of neutral nations should have been restored to the condition in which it stood previously to the promulgation of those decrees, His Majesty would feel the highest satisfaction in relinquishing a system which the conduct of the enemy compelled him to adopt."

Without departing, in any degree, from my first opinion, that the United States had a right to expect, upon every principle of justice, that the prospective revocation of the French decrees would be immediately followed by at least a like revocation of the orders of England, I must remind your Lordship, that the day has now passed when the repeal of the Berlin and Milan edicts, as communicated to your Lordship, in the note above-mentioned, and published to the whole world, by the Government of France, in the Moniteur of the 9th of September, was, by the terms of it, to take effect. That it has taken effect, cannot be doubted; and it can as little be questioned, that, according to the repeated pledges, given by the British Government, on this point, (to say nothing of various other powerful considerations,) the prompt relinquishment of the system, to which your Lordship's reply to my note of the 25th of August alludes, is indispensable.

I need scarcely mention how important it is to the trade of the United States, that the Government of Great Britain should lose no time in disclosing with frankness and precision its intentions on this head. Intelligence of the French repeal has reached America, and commercial expeditions have doubtless been founded upon it. It will have been taken for granted that the British obstructions to those expeditions, having thus lost the support which, however, insufficient in itself, was the only one that could ever be claimed for them, have been withdrawn; and that the seas are once more restored to the dominion of law and justice.

I persuade myself that this confidence will be substantially justified by the event, and that to the speedy recall of such Orders in Council as were subsequent in date to the decrees of France, will be added the annulment of the antecedent order to which my letter respecting blockades particularly relates. But if, notwithstanding the circumstances which invite to such a course, the British Government shall have determined not to remove those obstructions with all practicable promptitude, I trust that my Government will be apprized, with as little delay as possible, of a determination so unexpected, and of such vital concern to its rights and interests; and that the reasons upon which that determination may have been formed, will not be withheld from it.

I have the honor to be, with high consideration, my Lord, your Lordship's most obedient humble servant,

WM. PINKNEY.

The Message and documents were referred to the Committee of Foreign Relations.

ted States, to the stock of the Ohio Canal Company," was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Friday next.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act authorizing the sale and grant of a certain quantity of public land to the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal Company," was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole last mentioned.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of the heirs of the late Major General Anthony Wayne," was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. KEY, from the committee appointed on the twelfth ultimo, presented a bill to change the name of Lewis Grant, to that of Lewis Grant Davidson.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed four bills, with the following titles:

"An act authorizing the surveying and making of certain roads in the State of Ohio, as contemplated by the treaty of Brownstown, in the territory of Michigan;"

"An act to incorporate the subscribers to the Farmers' Bank of Alexandria;"

"An act to incorporate the Bank of Potomac;"

and
"An act to incorporate the bank of Washington;" to which bills they desire the concurrence of this House.

Four Messages were received from the President of the United States.

The first, transmitting to the House of Representatives reports of the Superintendent of the City, and of the Surveyor of the Public Buildings, on the subject of their resolution of the 28th of December last.

Second, transmitting to Congress an account of the contingent expenses of the Government for the year 1810.

Third, transmitting to Congress a report from the Surveyor of the Public Buildings, relative to the progress and present state of them.

The fourth, is as follows:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

I transmit to the House of Representatives copies of the documents referred to in their resolution of the fourth instant.

JAMES MADISON.

JANUARY 14, 1811.

By the President of the United States.

A PROCLAMATION.

WHEREAS by the fourth section of the act of Congress, passed on the first day of May, 1810, entitled "An act concerning the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France and their dependencies, and for other purposes," it is provided "that in case either Great Britain or France shall, before the third of March next, so modify or revoke her edicts as that they shall cease to violate the neutral commerce of the United States, which fact the President of the United States shall declare by proclamation, and if the other nation shall not, within three months thereafter, so revoke or modify her edicts in like manner, then the third, fourth, fifth, sixth, seventh, eighth, ninth, tenth, and eighteenth sections of the act, entitled 'An act to interdict the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France and their dependencies, and for other purposes,' shall, from and after the expiration of three months from the date of the proclamation aforesaid, be revived, and have full force and effect so far as relates to the dominions, colonies, and dependencies, and to the articles, the growth, produce, or manufacture of the dominions, colonies, and dependencies of the nation thus refusing or neglecting to revoke or modify her edicts in the manner aforesaid. And the restrictions imposed by this act shall, from the date of such proclamation, cease and be discontinued in relation to the nation revoking or modifying her decrees in the manner aforesaid."

And whereas, it has been officially made known to this Government that the edicts of France violating the neutral commerce of the United States have been so revoked as to cease to have effect on the first of the present month: Now, therefore, I, JAMES MADISON, President of the United States, do hereby proclaim that the said edicts of France have been so revoked as that they ceased, on the said first day of the present month, to violate the neutral commerce of the United States, and that, from the date of these presents, all the restrictions imposed by the aforesaid act shall cease and be discontinued in relation to France and her dependencies.

In testimony whereof, I have caused the seal of the United States to be hereunto affixed, and signed the [L. s.] same with my hand, at the city of Washington, this second day of November, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and ten, and of the independence of the United States the thirty-fifth.

JAMES MADISON.

By the President:

R. SMITH, Secretary of State.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Nov. 5, 1810.

SIR: You will herewith receive a proclamation of the President of the United States, announcing the revocation of the edicts of France which violated the neutral commerce of the United States, and that the restrictions imposed by the act of May first, last, accordingly cease, from this day, in relation to France. French armed vessels may, therefore, be admitted into the harbors and waters of the United States, anything in that law to the contrary notwithstanding.

It also follows, that, if Great Britain shall not, on the second day of February next, have revoked, or modified in like manner her edicts violating the neutral commerce of the United States, the third, fourth, fifth, sixth, seventh, eighth, ninth, tenth, and eighteenth sections of the "Act to interdict the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France, and their dependencies, and for other purposes," shall, in conformity with the act first above mentioned, be revived, and have full force and effect so far as relates to Great Britain and her dependencies, from and after the said second day of February next. Unless, therefore, you shall, before that day, be officially notified by this Department of such revocation or modification, you will, from and after the said day, carry into effect the above mentioned sections, which prohibit both the entrance of British vessels of every description into the harbors and waters of the United States, and the importation into the United States of any articles the growth, produce, or manufacture, of the dominions, colonies, and dependencies of Great Britain, and of any articles whatever, brought from the said dominions, colonies, and dependencies.

I am, respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,
ALBERT GALLATIN.

To the Collector of —.

The Messages and documents were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

COMMERCIAL INTERCOURSE.

Mr. EPPES, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, presented a bill supplemental to the act concerning the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France; and for other purposes; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

The bill is as follows:

A Bill supplementary to the act concerning the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, &c. That, in case Great Britain shall so revoke or modify her edicts as that they shall cease to violate the neutral commerce of the United States, the President of the United States shall declare the fact by proclamation, and such proclamation shall be admitted as evidence, and no other evidence shall be admitted of such revocation or modification in any suit or prosecution which may be instituted under this act, or the act to which this act is a supplement. And the restrictions imposed or which may be imposed by virtue of this act, or the act to which this is a supplement, shall, from the date of such proclamation, cease and be discontinued.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the second day of February next, in case the proclamation aforesaid shall not have been issued, the entrance of the harbors and waters of the United States and the territories thereof be and the same is hereby interdicted to all ships or vessels sailing under the flag of Great Britain, or owned in whole or in part by any citizen or subject thereof; vessels hired, chartered, or employed by the Government of Great Britain for the sole purpose of carrying letters or despatches, and also vessels forced in by distress, or by the dangers of the sea only excepted; and if any ship or vessel sailing under the flag of Great Britain, or owned in whole or in part by any citizen or subject thereof, and not excepted as aforesaid, shall, after the said second day of February next, arrive either with or without a cargo, within the limits of the United States or the territories thereof, such ship or vessel, together with the cargo, if any, which may be found on board, shall be forfeited, and may be seized and condemned in any court of the United States or territories thereof, having competent jurisdiction.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the second day of February next, it shall not be lawful to import into the United States, or territories thereof, any goods, wares, or merchandise whatever, from any port or place situated in Great Britain or Ireland, or in any of the colonies or dependencies of Great Britain, nor from any port or place in the actual possession of Great Britain; nor shall it be lawful to import into the United States or the territories thereof, from any foreign port or place whatever, any goods, wares, or merchandise whatever, being of the growth, produce, or manufacture of Great Britain or Ireland, or of any of the colonies or dependencies of Great Britain, or being of the growth produce or manufacture of any place or country in the actual possession of Great Britain: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to affect the cargoes of ships or vessels wholly owned by a citizen or citizens of the United States which had cleared for any port beyond the Cape of Good Hope, prior to the tenth day of November, eighteen hundred and ten.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That whenever any article or articles, the importation of which is prohibited by this act, shall, after the second day of February next, be imported into the United States or the territories thereof, contrary to the true intent and meaning of this act, or shall, after the said second day of February next, be put on board of any ship or vessel, boat, raft, or carriage, with intention of importing the same into the United States or the territories thereof, all such articles, as well as all other articles, on board the same ship or vessel, boat, raft, or carriage, belonging to the owner of such prohibited articles, shall be forfeited; and the owner thereof shall moreover forfeit and pay treble the value of such articles.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That if any article or articles, the importation of which is prohibited by this act, shall, after the second day of February next, be put on board of any ship or vessel, boat, raft, or carriage, with intention to import the same into the United States or the territories thereof, contrary to the true intent and meaning of this act, and with the knowledge of the owner or master of such ship or vessel, boat, raft, or carriage, such ship or vessel, boat, raft, or carriage, shall be forfeited, and the owner and master thereof shall moreover each forfeit and pay treble the value of such articles.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That if any article or articles, the importation of which is prohibited by this act, and which shall nevertheless be on board any ship or vessel, boat, raft, or carriage, arriving after the said second day of February next in the United States or the territories thereof, shall be omitted in the manifest, report, or entry of the master, or the person having the charge or command of such ship or vessel, boat, raft, or carriage, or shall be omitted in the entry of the goods owned by the owner or consigned to the consignee of such articles, or shall be imported or landed, or attempted to be imported or landed without a permit, the same penalties, fines, and forfeitures, shall be incurred and may be recovered, as in the case of similar omission or omissions, landing, importation, or attempt to land or import, in relation to articles liable to duties on their importation into the United States.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That every collector, naval officer, surveyor, or other officer of the customs, shall have like power and authority to seize goods, wares, and merchandise imported contrary to the extent and meaning of this act, to keep the same in custody until it shall have been ascertained whether the same have been forfeited or not, and to enter any ship or vessel, dwelling-house, store, building or other place, for the purpose of searching for, and seizing any such goods, wares, and merchandise, which he or they now have by law in relation to goods, wares, and merchandise subject to duty; and if any person or persons shall conceal or buy any goods, wares, or merchandise, knowing them to be liable to seizure by this act, such person or persons shall, on conviction thereof, forfeit and pay a sum double the amount or value of the goods, wares, and merchandise so concealed or purchased.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That any vessel or merchandise which shall be seized prior to the fact being ascertained whether Great Britain shall, on or before the second day of February next, have revoked or modified her edicts in the manner above-mentioned, may be restored on application of the parties, on their giving bond with approved sureties to the United States, in a sum equal to the value thereof, to abide the decision of the proper court of the United States thereon—and any such bond shall be considered as satisfied if Great Britain shall, on or before the said second day of February next, have revoked or modified her edicts in the manner above-mentioned.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That no vessel which shall have departed from a British port before the second day of February next, and no merchandise imported in such vessel which shall have been put on board the same before the proclamation of the President of the United States, of the second day of November last, shall have been known at such port, shall be liable to seizure or forfeiture on account of any infraction or presumed infraction of the provisions of this act, or of the act to which this act is a supplement.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That the following additions shall be made to the oath or affirmation taken by the masters or persons having the charge or command of any ship or vessel arriving at any port of the United States or the territories thereof, after the second day of February next, viz: "I further swear (or affirm) that there are not, to the best of my knowledge and belief, on board (insert the denomination and name of the vessel) any goods, wares, or merchandise, the importation of which into the United States or the territories thereof, is prohibited by law; and I do further swear (or affirm) that if I shall hereafter discover or know of any such goods, wares, or merchandise, on board the said vessel, or which shall have been imported in the same, I will immediately and without delay make due report thereof to the collector of the port of this district.

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That the following addition be made after the second day of February next to the oath or affirmation taken by importers, consignees, or agents, at the time of entering goods imported into the United States or the territories thereof, viz: I also swear, or affirm, that there are not, to the best of my knowledge and belief, among the said goods, wares, and merchandise, imported or consigned as aforesaid, any goods, wares, or merchandise, the importation of which into the United States or the territories thereof, is prohibited by law, and I do further swear, or affirm, that if I shall hereafter discover or know of any such goods, wares, and merchandise among the goods, wares, and merchandise imported or consigned as aforesaid, I will immediately and without delay report the same to the collector of this district.

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That all penalties and forfeitures incurred under this act, or the act to which this act is a supplement, may be sued for, prosecuted, and recovered with cost of suit, by action of debt, in the name of the United States of America, or by indictment or information, in any court having competent jurisdiction to try the same; and such penalties and forfeitures may be examined, mitigated, or remitted, in like manner and under the like conditions and restrictions, as are prescribed, authorized, and directed by the act, entitled "An act to provide for mitigating or remitting the forfeitures, penalties, and disabilities accruing in certain cases therein mentioned, passed the 3d day of March, 1797, and made perpetual by an act passed the 11th day of February, 1800.

SEC. 13. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for any part of the land or naval forces of the United States, and for any part of the militia of any State or Territory, in the actual service of the United States, to make seizure of any vessel or merchandise liable to seizure and forfeiture by reason of any infraction of the provisions of this act, or of the act to which this act is a supplement. And in case of any such seizure made within the waters of the United States, or within the boundaries of any district of the United States, that portion of the forfeiture arising from such seizure, which, according to existing laws, would have accrued to the United States, shall, after deducting the duties payable to the United States on the importation of the merchandise thus forfeited, be distributed among the persons making such seizure, in such proportions as may be directed by the President of the United States—and if such seizure shall be made without the boundaries of any district of the United States, the whole of the forfeiture arising from such seizure shall, after deducting the duties payable on the importation of the merchandise thus forfeited, be distributed in the manner aforesaid.

SEC. 14. And be it further enacted, That the portion of all the penalties and forfeitures which may be incurred by reason of any infraction of the provisions of this act, or of the act to which this act is a supplement, and which portion, according to existing laws, accrued to the United States, in all cases other than those provided for by the last preceding section of this act, after deducting the duties payable to the United States on the importation of the merchandise thus forfeited, shall be distributed in the following manner: that is to say, one-half of the residue of the said portion, after deducting the duties aforesaid, shall be given to the inspector or inspectors or to the captain and crew of the revenue cutter or vessel making the seizure: and the other half of the said residue shall, in cases where there is an informer, not being in the service of the United States, be given to such informer, and in cases where there is no such informer, shall be given to the collector, to be apportioned amongst the collector, naval officer, and surveyor, in the same manner as is provided by law for the distribution of one-half the penalties and forfeitures accruing by reason of infractions of the laws for the collection of duties on the importation of merchandise into the United States; and in all cases whatever the other half shall be distributed in the same manner as is already provided by law.

SEC. 15. And be it further enacted, That, in all cases of seizure of merchandise in any district adjacent to the colonies or possessions of a foreign nation, made on account of any infraction of the provisions of this act, or of the act to which this act is a supplement, it shall be necessary for the claimant or claimants to prove that the merchandise thus seized was legally imported into the United States, and that the duties payable on the importation of the same had been paid or secured to be paid, and in failure of making such proof, the merchandise thus seized shall be forfeited.

SEC. 16. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is authorized to hire, arm, and employ, seventy-five vessels, not exceeding in tonnage one hundred and thirty tons each, belonging to citizens of the United States, and so many seamen as shall be necessary to man the same for immediate service, in enforcing the laws of the United States on the seacoast thereof, and to dismiss the same from the service of the United States whenever he shall deem the same expedient: Provided, however, That such hiring or employing shall not be for a term exceeding one year.

SEC. 17. And be it further enacted, That, for enabling the President of the United States to carry into effect the sixteenth section of this act the sum of —, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, shall be and the same is hereby appropriated.

MIDDLESEX CANAL.

Mr. QUINCY presented a petition of the President and Directors of the Middlesex Canal Company, in the State of Massachusetts, praying Congress to authorize a subscription, on the part of the United States, to the capital stock of the said Company, and that the said subscription may be paid for in public lands; which was read, and ordered to be referred to a select committee.

Mr. SEAVER, Mr. EMOY, and Mr. GOODWYN, were appointed the said committee.

The memorial is as follows:

Boston, Dec. 7, 1810.

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, in Congress assembled:

The memorial of the proprietors of the Middlesex canal, in the State of Massachusetts, is respectfully addressed, to explain the grounds of their petition to Congress the last session, and to state more fully the relations which the works they have executed, those they have undertaken, and those to which the nature of the country in the same direction invites their enterprise, have to the public prosperity, and the good policy of the Union.

The great utility of canals, and their beneficial influence on the prosperity of an agricultural, manufacturing, and commercial people, so long experienced among the nations of Europe, and so often acknowledged by their Governments in the patronage afforded to the projectors of them, and even in their own enterprises of a similar kind, cannot be unknown to your honorable body; and the attention which the subject has already received from the National Legislature, with the importance justly given to it by the Secretary of the Treasury, in his able report to the Senate in the year 1808, may, it is presumed by your memorialists, sanction their appearing before you on this occasion.

Your memorialists, in common with other companies formed for similar purposes, have hitherto failed of reaping the advantages due to their enterprise, though the community at large has already derived from their exertions great benefits, without risk and without cost. In the completion, therefore, of an enterprise, which the public is so directly concerned in, your memorialists hope they may look, without disappointment, for the fostering aid of the Government, to whose paternal care the nation's best interests are confided, especially as the assistance prayed for will be reciprocally beneficial.

The origin and purpose of the Middlesex canal is already known to your honorable body, by the report of the Secretary of the Treasury. Your memorialists, therefore, forbear to trespass on your attention with unnecessary details, and will only so far offer a general and brief description of their canal and its dependencies, as may seem to be at this time necessary.

The river Merrimack (which is connected with Boston harbor by the Middlesex canal) takes its rise in the western mountains of New Hampshire, about thirty miles from Connecticut river, and in its course southward, passing through a rich and populous district, receives, about the centre of the State, an equally copious stream from the Lake Winnipisiochee, and other interior waters connected therewith. The shores of these lakes are not less than two hundred miles in extent, and are generally surrounded with good lands, rapidly settling, but still bearing great quantities of oak and pine timber of the largest size, and of a superior quality. From this junction of the two branches, at the distance of ninety miles from Boston, the river continues its course southward, parallel with the leading roads of the country, till it reaches a point in the State of Massachusetts, five miles within the boundary line, near where the Middlesex canal communicates therewith, at the distance of twenty-seven miles from Boston.

In its course, the canal is led over seven rivers and streams, by aqueducts. It is often carried on deep meadows by high embankments, and through extensive ledges of rocks; it is supplied with water from Concord river, which opens into it five miles from the Merrimack, on one side, and twenty-two from Boston on the other. From thence the fall to the Merrimack is thirty-one feet, by four stone locks; and toward Boston one hundred and seven feet, by seventeen locks. The general width of the canal is thirty feet on the surface of the water, and twenty at the bottom. It is calculated to carry boats seventy-five feet long, nine and a half feet wide, drawing three feet of water, carrying twenty-five tons, drawn by one horse, conducted by two men; passing the whole distance of twenty-seven miles in one day. It also conveys rafts of timber, lumber, and fire wood, five hundred feet in length, with one horse, or a pair of oxen, attended by five men.

The expense of conducting a raft of one hundred and fifty tons of timber, through the canal, may be estimated and compared with land carriage as follows:

Five men's wages and maintenance, four days	- $20
One pair of oxen, four days	- 5
Toll ninety cents per ton on 150 tons	- 135
	$160

If the same were transported by land carriage, it would require—

Seventy-five teams of five cattle, at $3 a day, 4 days, is $12 a team, amounting to	- $900 00
Seventy-five men, at $1 a day, 4 days	- 300 00
Expense of each team, at $1 33	- 99 75
	$1,299 75

The same by water carriage, as above stated, being	- 160 00
--	----------

Makes a saving to the owner or the public of	- $1,139 75
--	--------------

The expense of conveying 100 tons of merchandise, by 50 teams of 5 cattle each, to the distance of fifty miles, or as far as the boats now ascend the Merrimack from Boston, may be estimated at $15 per ton, amounting to	- $1,500 00
To transport the same quantity by boats, cost $7 a ton, or	- 790 00

Making a saving on 100 tons, or 5 boats, of	- $800 00

H. OF R.

And if the advantages of having so many men and cattle, thus liberated from unproductive labor, employed in agriculture, and other productive avocations, be considered, the public still gains in a much greater ratio.

Although in the year 1804, when the canal was completed to the banks of Charles river, opposite the town of Boston, at the distance of less than a mile therefrom, the inducements to persevere appeared in as strong a light as when they first excited the proprietors to the enterprise; and, although the union of so great a river and country, with a metropolis where the produce of the interior might find a market or an outlet, seemed still to promise ultimate success and remuneration, yet much remained to be done, both to overcome the obstructions existing in the river Merrimack, and to lead the public, long habituated to land carriage, and totally inexperienced in the use of canals, to turn its attention to this great accommodation. And so much embarrassment had arisen, in consequence of the death of some of the associates, whose widows and children becoming holders of shares, were, with others of the proprietors, unable to sustain the burden of further assessments, adequate to the expense of the additional works requisite on said river, that your memorialists were unable to command funds for the execution of said works. The income of the principal canal, though increasing, has been insufficient for the current expenses, the repairs, and necessary improvements thereon.

This great work might long have remained in this state, but for the assistance obtained from the Legislature of Massachusetts, which, by granting to the corporation two townships of eastern land, enabled and induced the proprietors to undertake some of the improvements necessary to the extension of inland navigation, as originally contemplated. These works, now constructing, under certain acts of incorporation, principally with the funds borrowed on the credit of the lands above-mentioned, consist of locks, dams, and canals, in three places, viz: in Merrimack, Dumbarton, and Bow. They must necessarily cost considerably more than the said land is expected even to bring. And, in order to make the Middlesex canal good property, and as extensively useful to the public as it is capable of being, other works more interior ought to be accomplished; especially between the lakes above-mentioned, and Merrimack river, to pass a number of falls not less together than two hundred and thirty feet in perpendicular height. But such is the fertility of this district, and so great the quantity of excellent timber, which the public would thereby save from destruction by fire in clearing the land, that ample remuneration may be confidently expected.

The articles also of beef, pork, flaxseed, ashes, grain, and various others, which, on account of the distance, and the want of good roads, cannot now be brought to a market, or, if brought, are consumed by the expenses attending the land carriage, would become of sufficient value to excite a spirit of general industry even in the most remote and uncultivated parts of New Hampshire.

Nor do these observations apply only to the shores of the lakes, and the country to the north, but may, with equal propriety, be extended to the counties lying to the northwest, to which these extensive waters and the western branch of the river would, with some improvements, afford this cheap and convenient mode of conveyance. Your memorialists, fearful of trespassing too far on the time and attention of your honorable body, refer to a map of New Hampshire to show the extensive water communications that might be made with the canal, not mentioned herein, and hasten to state the general relations and advantages likely to result from the assistance for which they have petitioned the National Government. The immediate effect of such assistance would be to increase the national strength and wealth, by giving value to millions of tons of timber now considered an encumbrance to the ground; to enhance the value of land for agricultural purposes, by providing a cheap mode of conveying its produce to market, while the inhabitants of the coast will be more abundantly and cheaply supplied; to give advantages to commerce, by enabling the merchant to find cargoes at such rates as would enable him to export them profitably, and build his ships at less cost; to augment the population of that part of the country, and enable the inhabitants to receive articles of foreign growth and origin, now become necessities of life, by boat navigation, on better terms and in greater quantities, thereby encouraging and increasing the importation, and consequently the revenues of the General Government. The easy communication with the interior, which the proposed works will afford, will be the means of essentially strengthening the frontier in a quarter where it is now most weak and vulnerable, and will attach the inhabitants in that direction still more to the Union, by a sentiment of increasing interest; our ports becoming more and more the source of this accommodation, and the vent of the produce of their industry. The canal will also be the medium of supplies to the navy yard at Charlestown, of the best material of every kind for repairing or building ships, or for completing the wharves and docks which it may be found necessary to construct there; and it is conceived it will, in this alone, save the United States thousands of dollars yearly, and enable its agents to obtain from the interior every spar and every article, not excepting iron and copper, which may, in the event of hostilities, be wanted for ships of war.

Your memorialists would further beg leave to remark, that the provisions of the act which has already passed the honorable Senate, are such that, while they may afford the proprietors of the Middlesex canal the assistance they need to complete and carry into effect the great and beneficial purposes originally contemplated, by purchasing a portion of their interest, the Government disposes of an unproductive property in lands, investing the proceeds in an institution endowed with perpetual privileges, which, to be soon profitable, requires but efficient aid; and which, from its very situation, cannot be rivalled, and must be progressive; so that, in a few years, the Government may, if occasion should require, sell the shares it may hold for money.

Your memorialists, convinced that the views they have herein taken of their enterprise, in relation to the public interests, are well founded, cannot but believe that your honorable body will be of opinion that this is one of those occasions alluded to, in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, in which the resources of Government may, with the greatest effect and propriety, be brought in aid of private enterprise in public improvements. And they are encouraged to anticipate this result, from the deliberations of your honors, the more confidently, as it will have been made to appear, that the Middlesex canal was undertaken and executed in the faith, that so important a part of the water communication with this large and fertile territory being effected, a just sense of the great advantage to result therefrom would stimulate the people to the formation of companies for clearing the obstructions of the river Merrimack, and for executing the other necessary works detailed in this memorial; or that Government would be induced to take the shares, originally reserved, whenever a representation of these advantages, to an extensive district of country, should be made to your honorable body, and thus afford the aid necessary to bring into activity resources so important to the growth of the Union. But the want of an avenue of easy communication with the seacoast, having placed it out of the power of the people most immediately interested in New Hampshire, to raise funds sufficient for the purposes herein contemplated; and men of moneyed capital in the seaports, with only partial views of the subject, having been deterred by the hitherto unproductive state of the Middlesex canal, from engaging in similar enterprises, it is only then from the more enlarged views of an enlightened Government that the wishes of your memorialists, in relation to their object, can be realized.

They have, therefore, thought they might reiterate their appeal to Congress on the merits of their petition, which has been favorably received by the Senate, at the last session of that branch of the Legislature, persuaded they are addressing those who cannot fail of feeling an interest in this, and all other concerns touching the internal improvements of the United States.

ORLEANS TERRITORY.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill authorizing the people of Orleans Territory to elect a convention to form a constitution preparatory to its admission into the Union as a free and independent State—Mr. QUINCY's motion for indefinite postponement still under consideration.

Mr. POINDEXTER.—Mr. Speaker: It is with extreme reluctance that I claim the indulgence of the House, to participate in the discussion of the subject now under consideration. I should deem it not only useless but inexcusable to trespass on your time, and delay the final question on the passage of the bill before you, but for the novel and extraordinary aspect which has been given to the debate by an honorable member from Massachusetts, (Mr. QUINCY.) The tendency of the remarks made by that gentleman is manifestly hostile to the best interests of the nation, and calculated to excite, so far as their influence extends, a spirit of revolt among the people of the United States. I cannot, therefore, forbear to enter my protest, in the only form Constitutionally provided for the peculiar situation which I occupy on this floor, against the establishment of principles fraught with such disastrous consequences. But, sir, as various objections have been made to the passage of the bill, and as I profess to be friendly to its general objects, I shall endeavor to give some of these objections a concise examination before I proceed to notice the observations of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

It has been contended by an honorable gentleman from Connecticut, (Mr. PRITIN,) that inasmuch as the western limits of Louisiana remain undefined, the State to be formed of the present Territory of Orleans would extend its jurisdiction over the province of Texas, to Rio Bravo, and down that river to its confluence with the sea, so as to include the Bay of St. Bernard, and the whole extent of country, supposed by the American Government to be transferred by the French Republic under the name of Louisiana. This circumstance, it is alleged, will enable the Government of the new State to involve the United States in war, for the establishment of the most western boundary, to which we have asserted a claim. The gentleman has himself referred to a fact which, in my estimation, furnishes a sufficient answer to this objection. He admits, that the northern boundary of the State of Massachusetts was never definitely established until commissioners were appointed by the Government of Great Britain and the United States, to ascertain what was the true river St. Croix. Anterior to that event it was uncertain how far north the jurisdiction of Massachusetts extended; but the most scrupulous advocates for State sovereignty never imagined that the State could decide its own boundaries, and call upon the general Government to support that decision at the point of the bayonet. The difficulty was adjusted by amicable negotiation, and the river designated by the two nations became the permanent boundary of the State. Can the gentleman distinguish that case from the one which exists as to the western boundary of Louisiana? By the second section of the bill, it is provided, that the State shall be composed of all that part of the territory or country ceded under the name of Louisiana by the treaty made at Paris on the 30th day of April, 1803, between the United States and France, "now contained within the limits of the Territory of Orleans, except that part lying west of the river Iberville, and a line to be drawn along the middle of the lakes Maurepas and Ponchartrain to the ocean." The Territory of Orleans is limited indefinitely by the western boundary of Louisiana; but by an arrangement made in the Autumn of 1806, between the Commander-in-Chief of the American Army and the Commander of the Spanish forces in that quarter, it was agreed that for the present the Spaniards should not cross the Sabine, and that the American settlements should not extend to that river. To carry this arrangement into effect, the Government of the United States has given instructions that the public lands should not be disposed of west of a meridian passing by Natchitoches. Beyond that line I am inclined to believe the Territorial Government of Orleans has not yet extended its authority. It follows, therefore, by a fair construction of the section to which I have referred, that the State to be formed of that territory will be confined within the same limits, until by an act of the General Government the western boundary of the cession shall be finally adjusted. It belongs exclusively to the high contracting parties, to render that certain, which by the deed of cession is equivocal, and whatever line they may consent to establish as the western extremity of the country ceded under the name of Louisiana will constitute the permanent limit of the State, whether it extends to Rio Bravo or the Sabine, or a meridian passing by Natchitoches. This, sir, is conformable with usage. The southern boundary of Georgia was fixed by the Treaty of the 27th day of October, 1795, with the King of Spain; and, by the Treaty of 1794 with Great Britain, the true river St. Croix was determined. In these instances, the States whose interests were involved, existed prior to, and were parties in, the adoption of the Federal Constitution; and yet no one ever questioned the right of the Government of the United States to settle the line of demarcation between them and the colonies of Great Britain and Spain. I put it to the candor of the gentleman from Connecticut to say whether the difficulty which he suggests, is not entirely removed by a reference to the practice of the Government on these occasions, similar in their nature to the present, and differing only in circumstances which rendered them more favorable to the interposition of State authorities.

But, sir, it is said, that the rights of State sovereignty ought to be withheld from the people of the Territory of Orleans because a majority of the population is composed of emigrants from France, and the descendants of Frenchmen—that among these, there exists a predominant attachment to the Government of France. I shall not attempt to controvert the fact, that there are individuals of wealth and influence in that Territory, who, from early habits and education, have imbibed a strong predilection for French laws, customs, and manners. No lapse of time, no change of situation, can obliterate the impressions which the mind receives from early precept and example. Is it to be expected that a people whose laws and usages, from time immemorial, have been materially different from those which constitute the rule of conduct in this country, and whose ignorance of our political institutions results from the very nature of the Government under which they have lived, can suddenly transfer their affections from that system of jurisprudence which has been handed down from their ancestors, to a Government whose laws they do not understand, either in theory or in practice? Such a transition cannot be reconciled without the aid of practical experience, by which the blessings of our free Constitution are demonstrated in the security which it affords to the life, liberty, and property of the citizen. How far the original inhabitants of Louisiana are liable to the charge of French partiality I am not prepared to say; but I believe them to be an orderly class of society—well disposed towards the Government of the United States. Those who manifest the greatest regard for France are to be found amongst the emigrants, whose views and expectations carry them beyond the simplicity of a Republican form of government. But while I admit the existence of French influence in that quarter of the Union to a certain extent, I cannot make it the basis on which to justify a refusal to emancipate the great body of the people from the trammels of territorial vassalage. Is it a good reason, why the people who reside within the circle of the Essex junto should not enjoy equal rights with the rest of their fellow-citizens, that those who compose that association are avowedly the partisans of England? I presume a proposition to trench upon their rights would be viewed with the utmost abhorrence and detestation, as an act of political intolerance, unprecedented in the history of this Government. And yet, sir, I venture to pronounce that these British attachments, fostered and cherished amidst the wrongs and insults which we have received from that nation, not only in this nursery of tory principles, but in most of the commercial cities of the United States, have already produced more mischief to this nation, than the miserable French influence existing in New Orleans would produce in half a century. In a Government like this, it is in vain to expect that men will not think and act for themselves; and so far as their actions do not amount to an open violation of law, they cannot be restrained; and I, for one, am very willing to “tolerate error of opinion, when reason is left free to combat it.” By erecting this Territory into a separate and independent commonwealth, and granting to its inhabitants equal civil and political rights with the rest of the Union, you will merit the confidence and affection of those who value as they ought, the important privileges conferred upon them. You will arrest from those who seek to disturb the tranquillity of the country, by exciting feuds and internal disorder among the people, every pretext for the accomplishment of their purposes; and you will invite to this exposed section of our country a population, so necessary in the hour of danger, to resist the occupation of the shores and waters of the Mississippi by an invading enemy.

From the influence of France nothing need be feared. The distance, by which we are separated from that great Power, is a sufficient guarantee that no attempt will be made on her part to subvert our authority in Louisiana. France is not in a situation to assail us, if such a disposition existed in her ruler. The want of naval power, will, for many years to come, form an insuperable barrier to the introduction of a French army into the United States. But the people of the Territory of Orleans can never be prevailed on to commit their destinies to an adventurer; they enjoy not only the necessary comforts, but the luxuries of life in abundance; their increasing wealth furnishes a certain pledge of future greatness. The Government of which they now form a component part, though in many particulars different from that in whose laws they have been educated, is exempt from the desolating storm which carries misery and distress into every region of the Old World; and, under the auspices of our mild and salutary Constitution, they may repose in full confidence that their political connexion will not depend on the whim or caprice of the tyrants of Europe. It cannot be forgotten, that in the situation of colonies they were bought and sold like herds of cattle, at the will of foreign nations, without regard to their feelings or wishes. With these insuperable ties on the allegiance of the people of the Territory of Orleans, I consider it an act both of justice and policy to receive them as brothers in the great American family.

Permit me, now, sir, to call the attention of the House to the argument of the gentleman from Massachusetts. We are told by that gentleman, that the provisions of this bill are in direct hostility to the Constitution, and materially affect the rights and liberties of the whole people of the United States. That the creation of new States, or "political sovereignties," without the original limits of the United States, is an usurpation of power not warranted by a sound construction of the Constitution. In the consideration of this subject two questions arise; first, whether the United States can acquire foreign territory, and by what means? And whether the territory so acquired can be admitted into the Union as an independent State? By the fourth article of the Constitution, Congress are authorized, "to dispose of, and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory of the United States." This provision contains an express recognition of the right not only to possess territory, but to dispose of and regulate it in any manner which Congress may think consistent with the general good. If then the power to hold territory, and to regulate it without limitation, is expressly given to the General Government, the right to acquire it follows as an indispensable attribute of sovereignty. And this opinion is supported by the enumeration of powers given to Congress in the Constitution. A nation can extend its territorial limits either by conquest or by treaty. If in the prosecution of a just and legitimate war, or by a fair and bona fide contract, one nation acquires the possession of territory which originally belonged to another, it becomes incorporated with the domain of the Power to whom it is thus transferred, and cannot be distinguished from any other portion of territory over which the sovereign authority of the nation extends.

By the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution, the power is given to Congress "to declare war, grant letters of marque and reprisal, and make rules concerning captures on land and water;" and by the second section of the second article, the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, is vested with power "to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur." From these grants of power in the Constitution, it is manifest that the United States can, without a violation of that instrument, acquire and hold foreign territory. The authority to dispose of, and the means of acquiring territory, being exclusively confided to the General Government, and prohibited to the States, it would require clear and distinct negative expressions to confine that power within any particular geographical limits. The Constitution contains no prohibition of the right to acquire territory, either by war or compact, but the latter alternative has been adopted by this Government, whose policy is founded in justice, and whose object is peace.

Having shown that the United States possess, constitutionally, the power and the means of obtaining foreign territory, the only point which remains to be discussed, is, whether new States may be created without the ancient limits of the United States. In the investigation of this part of the subject, it will be necessary to take a cursory view of the treaty-making power, and of the convention between the United States and France of the 30th April, 1803. It is an universal principle in all Governments, whether their form be despotic or free, to vest the Chief Executive Magistrate, in some shape or other, with the sole power of entering into pacts, treaties, and conventions, with foreign nations; and, although the concurrence of co-ordinate departments of the Government may be necessary to give validity to the act of the Executive, in no instance can a treaty be formed without his assent. The national security against the abuse of this power consists in the solicitude which each feels to make the best bargain for the people over whom his authority extends. "In England, (says Sir William Blackstone,) is the King's prerogative to make treaties, leagues, and alliances with foreign States and Princes; for, it is by the laws of nations essential to the goodness of a league that it be made by the sovereign Power, and then it is binding on the whole community; and in England the sovereign power quo ad hoc is vested in the person of the King. Whatever contracts therefore he engages in, no other power in the Kingdom can legally delay, resist, or annul. And yet, lest this plenitude of authority should be abused, to the detriment of the public, the constitution (as was hinted before) has here interposed a check, by the means of Parliamentary impeachment, for the punishment of such Ministers as from criminal motives advise or conclude any treaty which shall afterwards be judged to derogate from the honor and interest of the nation." But, says the gentleman from Massachusetts, "Suppose that monarch should make a treaty stipulating that Hanover or Hindostan should have a right of representation on the floor of Parliament, would such a treaty be binding?" The obvious reply to this far-fetched interrogatory is, that, if these countries formed a part of the British dominions, the necessary statutes to carry such a stipulation into effect would make it obligatory on the British nation, and no power in the Kingdom could "legally delay, resist, or annul" it. There is nothing in the British constitution to control the treaty-making power of that country, and therefore the King may properly contract for the extension of civil and political rights. The Constitution of the United States is more guarded in this particular. The treaty-making power is composed of the President and two-thirds of the Senators present; and whenever appropriations of money are necessary to carry a treaty into effect, the immediate Representatives of the people have a salutary check on the other two branches.

This wise and judicious distribution of power forms an impenetrable bulwark around the liberties of the American people. If, from accident or design, the President should enter into engagements with a foreign nation incompatible with the general principles or express provisions of the Constitution, the interposition of the other departments will afford a seasonable corrective to such a dereliction of duty. It is, however, to be presumed, that, in all our transactions with foreign countries, the influence of national attachments will induce the Executive Councils to promote, as far as possible, the welfare of the United States. It would, indeed, be a novelty in political history, that an individual who is raised by the voluntary suffrages of his fellow-citizens to the first office in their gift should prostrate their rights and his power at the feet of a foreign Prince. Gratitude, personal respect, love of power, and in short every motive which can actuate the human mind, operate to produce a different result. These are the only restrictions which have been thought by the founders of the Constitution essential to guard against the encroachments of the treaty-making power in this country. The enumeration in the Constitution which defines the powers of the respective departments was not intended to apply to treaties and conventions entered into with foreign nations. It would have been unreasonable to have attempted a specification of all the cases in which external regulations would from time to time become expedient and necessary. No human being could foresee all the contingencies that might occur in the practical operation of the Government which require the interposition of the treaty-making power. I therefore contend that a treaty once ratified by each co-ordinate department of the Government becomes the supreme law of the land, and is as binding on this House as an article in the Constitution itself. To illustrate this position beyond the reach of contradiction, and to give to reason the aid of an express provision in the Constitution, I beg leave to quote from article six the following words: "This Constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made or which shall be made under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land. And the Judges in every State shall be bound thereby, anything in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding." The distinction here taken between laws and treaties cannot be misunderstood: laws are to be made in pursuance of the Constitution, treaties "under the authority of the United States." I admit, sir, that an article in a treaty which would go to contravene an express provision of the Constitution would not be binding; but who is to be the arbiter between the treaty-making power and the Constitution? Will you confide this gigantic power to the Supreme Court of the United States, and give to that tribunal the exposition of all controversies growing out of treaties or conventions with foreign nations? I presume no gentleman will advance a doctrine so absurd and ridiculous. If, then, the other three branches of the General Government determine a treaty Constitutional, by passing the necessary laws to carry it into effect, it becomes at once the supreme law of the land; and, so far as its stipulations secure personal privileges and the rights of property, they must be fulfilled.

Let us now inquire what are the obligations which we have contracted in relation to the inhabitants of Louisiana by the Treaty of Cession with the French Republic. The third article of that treaty stipulates that "The inhabitants of the ceded territory shall be incorporated into the Union of the United States, and admitted, as soon as possible, according to the principles of the Federal Constitution, to the enjoyment of all the rights and immunities of citizens of the United States; and, in the mean time, they shall be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and the religion which they profess." And are we sitting here to deliberate whether we will perform these solemn engagements which have been entered into by the constituted authorities, and which are presented to us in the imposing attitude of the supreme law of the land? Are not the principles of the Constitution in unison with these engagements? Article four, section three: "New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union; but no new State shall be formed or erected within the jurisdiction of any other State, nor any State be formed by the junction of two or more States, or parts of States, without the consent of the States concerned, as well as of the Congress." Here, then, is a general power to admit new States, and I challenge any gentleman to show that it is confined to the original territory belonging to the United States. There is no clause of the Constitution which contains such a limitation, even by the remotest implication. Such a construction would not only be contrary to the letter, but to the spirit of the article to which I have referred. For, if other territory than that which belonged to the United States at the time of the adoption of the Federal Constitution was not intended to be incorporated into the Union, why has it been the constant practice of the Government to annex Indian territory to the old States, and to form new States of lands purchased from the different tribes of Indians in the United States? They are foreign Powers—acknowledged and treated with as such, from the commencement of the Government; and the objections urged on this occasion would apply with equal force against the extinguishment of the Indian title.

I trust, sir, that enough has been said to satisfy every candid individual of this body, that the Territory which it is the object of this bill to create into a separate Commonwealth, was fairly and constitutionally acquired; that we are bound by the sacred obligations of treaty to extend to its inhabitants all the rights, advantages, and immunities of citizens of the United States, and that there exists no Constitutional barrier to a fulfilment of that undertaking on the part of the United States. The most approved writer (Vattel) on public law, declares that "he who has made a promise to any one, has conferred upon him a true right to require the thing promised, and that, consequently, not to keep a perfect promise, is to violate the right of another; and is as manifest an injustice as that of depriving a person of his property. And further, as the engagements of a treaty impose on the one hand a perfect obligation, they produce on the other a perfect right. To violate a treaty, then, is to violate the perfect right of him with whom we have contracted, and this is to do him an injury." I conceive the character of the nation to be deeply involved in the question now before the House. If we refuse to perform the legal, moral, and political obligation which is imposed on us by the Treaty of Cession, to incorporate the inhabitants of the ceded Territory into the Union, and to admit them to the enjoyment of all the rights and privileges of citizens, we shall deserve to be branded with the odious epithet of a faithless nation, we shall merit the censure of the civilized world, and the just resentment of the people to whom these rights and privileges ought to be extended.

Mr. Speaker, I enter with lively sensibility on that portion of the remarks made by the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, which menace insurrection and a dissolution of the Union. Had these sentiments fallen from the gentleman in the ardor of debate, while the imagination was inflamed with an unconquerable zeal to prove the impolicy of the measure under consideration, or had they been offered in the shape of possible results, I should have regarded them only with pity and contempt; but the gentleman declares it to be his "deliberate opinion," that if this bill passes, the bonds of this Union are virtually dissolved; that the States which compose it are free from their moral obligations, and that, as it will be the right of all, so it will be the duty of some, to prepare definitely for a separation—amicably if they can, violently if they must." Influenced by a desire to stamp on these expressions their merited disgrace, and to preserve dignity and decorum in our deliberations, I felt it my duty to call the gentleman to order. Perhaps in doing so, I was actuated more by a sudden impulse of feeling than by an accurate knowledge of Parliamentary proceedings. I am still, however, impressed with a conviction that these sacred walls, the sanctuary of the liberties of the American people, ought not to be polluted by direct invitations to rebellion against the Government, of which we are a constituent part; but the liberality and the courtesy of the House have overruled that opinion, and the gentleman was permitted to proceed. Are we, then, about to commit an act which is to burst asunder the bonds of our political Union, and prostrate the glorious fabric which has been reared by the valor of our ancestors? Sir, when I look at the events which led to the acquisition of Louisiana, and the efforts made at that time by those who opposed the measures of the Administration to call forth the national energies for the purpose of securing that important point by conquest, lest it should fall into the hands of a powerful neighbor, and compare them with the declarations now made by the gentleman from Massachusetts, I am filled with astonishment. I cannot believe that the party with whom that gentleman is in the habit of acting, will support the visionary theories and frantic anticipations which he has advanced on the present occasion. For the honor of every real American who is ranked with the Federal party, I hope that these idle dreams of political insanity will be suffered to vanish without a struggle before the effulgent sunshine of patriotism.

I should, indeed, rejoice to find, that, in this instance, as in the baseless impeachment instituted by the gentleman against the illustrious Jefferson, he should be once more exhibited to a laughing audience, a solitary unit on your journals in favor of principles so abhorrent to every good citizen. But, sir, permit me to analyze the case which it is said will be productive of this great national calamity. Previous to the adoption of the Federal Constitution, while Louisiana was a Spanish province, the free navigation of the river Mississippi was an object which engaged the attention and occupied the labors of the ablest statesmen known in the councils of the country. In the celebrated debates on the ratification of the Constitution, in the Convention of Virginia, it was urged as a reason against the adoption of the new form of Government, that the commerce of the Mississippi would be less secure than under the Confederation. In answer to these suggestions, which were supported with great zeal and ability, the distinguished character who now fills the exalted station of Chief Magistrate, stated, that "neither the old Confederacy nor the new Constitution, involves the right to give the navigation of the Mississippi." It was admitted by all to be essential to the welfare of every section of the United States to maintain the right to navigate freely this great outlet to the products of the Western States. Soon after the new Government was established, negotiations were commenced to secure this important object, and by the fourth article of the treaty concluded on the 27th day of October, 1795, between the United States and Spain, it was stipulated, that "the navigation of the Mississippi, in its whole breadth, from its source to the ocean, shall be free only to his subjects, and to citizens of the United States, unless he should

'extend this privilege to the subjects of other Powers by special convention." And in the 22d article of the same treaty it was agreed, that in consequence of the stipulations contained in the fourth article, His Catholic Majesty will permit the citizens of the United States, for the space of three years from this time, to deposit their merchandise and effects in the port of New Orleans, and to export them from thence without laying any other duty, than a fair price for the hire of the stores, and His Majesty promises either to continue this permission, if he finds during that time that it is not prejudicial to the interest of Spain, or if he should not agree to continue it there, he will assign to them on another part of the banks of the Mississippi an equivalent establishment." The subject remained in this situation until the year 1802, when the Spanish authorities at New Orleans, after the country had been transferred to France by the Treaty of St. Ildefonso, prohibited the deposit of American "merchandise and effects" at New Orleans, without assigning, on another part of the banks of the Mississippi, an equivalent establishment. The circumstances were communicated to Congress by President Jefferson, and a Special Envoy nominated, with a view to obtain the country on both sides the Mississippi, by amicable negotiation. Well, sir, what was the conduct of gentlemen whose political opinions correspond with those of the gentleman from Massachusetts on that occasion? We were told that it would not do to trust to the tardy process of negotiation in a matter which involved, so materially, the interest of the nation; immediate war was recommended, and the wise measure adopted by President Jefferson was loudly condemned. An eloquent gentleman from Pennsylvania, then a member of the other House, (Mr. Ross,) asserted, that "to the free navigation of that river we had an undoubted right from Nature, and from the position of the Western country"—that "hostility, in its most offensive shape, had been offered by those who disclaim all right to the soil, and the sovereignty of that country; an hostility fatal to the happiness of the Western world. Why not seize, then, what is so essential to us as a nation?" And in a subsequent part of the remarks made by the same gentleman, he admonishes the Government in these emphatic terms: "Plant yourselves on the river, fortify its banks, invite those who have an interest at stake to defend it, do justice to yourselves when your adversaries deny it, and leave the event to Him who rules the fate of nations." The disaffection of the Western States was then predicted by the same prophetic spirit which now warns us of Eastern malcontents. New Orleans was then the goal of their affections. The country must be instantly conquered, or the Union would be dismembered. But the wisdom of the Statesman who then filled the Executive chair foresaw a different result. The dignified and honorable appeal, which was made to the justice and true interests of the French nation, terminated in the purchase of Louisiana. This event, so highly advantageous to the nation, diffused general joy throughout the United States; but the heroes whose valor would have hurried them into a premature and unjust war to accomplish this end, found no difficulty in expelling from their minds the idea, that this country was "so essential to us as a nation." New Orleans suddenly lost all its charms. Louisiana became a wilderness of swamps and marshes, and the vast extent of territory which we had acquired was one day to produce the downfall of the Republic.

The gentleman from Massachusetts seems to imagine, that the crisis has arrived when this prediction is to be fulfilled. You are, says he, about to admit a "new partner into the confederacy without the original limits of the United States, which tends to diminish the political power of the original partners, and according to the undeniable principles of moral law the obligation of our national compact is dissolved." What, sir, does the gentleman mean by political power in the original partners? Have we such a thing as patent power in the United States? Thank God, sir, we have neither Counts, Dukes, or Lords, nor members of the Grand Legion of Honor, nor any other grade of privileged orders in this country who possess "political power" by lineal or collateral descent, or by purchase. In the Government all power is vested in and flows from the people, and we sit here, not as their masters, but as their servants, and to that august tribunal are we responsible for the fidelity with which we execute the trust confided to us. Political power then being in the great body of the people, it cannot be definitely apportioned among the States, but each State possesses weight proportionate to its numbers. If for instance two-thirds of the population of Virginia should remove to the Mississippi Territory, which they have a perfect right to do, the influence of Virginia in the National Councils, in point of representation, would be two-thirds less than at present; and it might with equal justice be said that a State, inferior in political power at the time of the compact was entered into, should remain in that situation ad infinitum, as to contend that a number of citizens residing in a Territory belonging to the United States should not be admitted to the enjoyment of those political rights, to which from their numbers they are entitled. It results from the very nature of our Government, that political influence fluctuates in proportion to the augmentation or diminution of population, in the various sections of the country. The addition of fifty thousand inhabitants to the whole people of the United States increases the political weight of the whole, just in the same ratio that a similar addition to an army would increase its physical strength. If, as the gentleman has alleged, the proportions of political power, in the several States, is an "inalienable, essential, intangible right," it must forever remain the same, like a chartered privilege, let the weight of population rest where it may. Such a principle is inconsistent with the genius of a free Government, and incompatible with the sovereign authority of the people.

Mr. Speaker, on all the great questions which have been discussed in this House for the last four years, a war with England and a separation of the Eastern States from the Union have been constantly thrown in the way to obstruct the measures of the Administration. Why these subjects have gone hand in hand, I leave gentlemen who are in the secret to explain. It ought not to be forgotten that on a proposition to repeal the embargo, at a time when its effects were severely felt both in Great Britain and her colonies, the gentleman from Massachusetts told us that the people of New England were prepared for insurrection and revolt, unless that measure of resistance to the aggressing belligerents was relinquished. And contemporaneously with these opinions, uttered on the floor of the House of Representatives, the British Minister, resident in the United States, made a confidential communication to his Government, in which a dissolution of the Union was deemed a probable event, should the commercial embarrassments of this country continue. From whom that Minister received his information, no gentleman acquainted with the history of that transaction can doubt. He who deliberately wields the "mischief-meditating" hand of civil commotion, will seldom hesitate as to the means which he employs to accomplish a favorite object. The mind, which once resolves on political parricide, can never be restored to a sense of moral virtue and integrity. And wretched indeed would be the fate of this country, were its destinies committed to those who openly avow that intention. The notorious conspiracy of Aaron Burr had for its basis the detestable project of dismembering the Union. And what, sir, was the fate of that infatuated individual? Exiled from his native country, in which he once held a distinguished place, not only in the administration of its Government, but also in the affections of the people; a beggar in Paris, and a fit instrument to be used by foreign Courts, to bring distress and ruin on the country, from which his crimes have expelled him. And yet that man did not dare to go the lengths which the gentleman from Massachusetts has been permitted to go within these walls. Did Aaron Burr, in all the ramifications of his treasonable projects, ever declare, to an assembly of citizens, that the States were free from their moral obligations? "And that as it will be the right of all, so it will be the duty of some to prepare definitely for a separation, peaceably if they can, violently if they must?" No, sir. Had such expressions been established, by the evidence on his trial, I hazard an opinion, that it would have produced a very different result. Perhaps, sir, instead of exile, he would have been consigned to a gibbet. For it cannot be concealed that the language of the gentleman from Massachusetts, if accompanied by an overt act, to carry the threat which it contains into execution, would amount to treason, according to its literal and technical definition in the Constitution and laws of the United States. The fate of Aaron Burr ought to be a salutary warning against treasonable machinations—and if others, having the same views, do not share a similar fate, it will not be because they do not deserve it. Sir, the gentleman from Massachusetts, unfortunately for himself, has referred to the opinions of the present Minister in Russia. Comparisons are indeed odious—but on this occasion the gentleman has invited the contrast. In the memorable discussion on the Louisiana treaty, Mr. Adams said, "I consider the object as of the highest advantage to us; and the gentleman from Kentucky himself,* who has displayed with so much eloquence the immense importance to this Union of the possession of the ceded country, cannot carry his ideas on that subject further than I do." And on a subsequent occasion, when called upon to decide the delicate question whether a member of the Senate of the United States should be expelled from that body for treason and misdemeanor, with which he was charged, Mr. Adams, in his able report to the Senate on that subject, uses the following strong and perspicuous language: "If the ingenuity of a demon were tasked to weave into one composition all the great moral and political evils which could be inflicted on the people of these States, it would produce nothing more than a texture of war, dismemberment, and despotism." These are the sentiments and feelings of that distinguished citizen who is now our Minister at the Court of St. Petersburg. They breathe the spirit of an American, who "cherishes the Constitution under which we are assembled, as the chief stay of his hope; as the light which is destined to gladden his own day by the prospect it sheds over his children."

Let us examine whether the gentleman from Massachusetts falls "not behind him in such sentiments." The inhabitants of the country which our Minister in Russia declared to be of such immense importance to this Union are about to be admitted to a participation of those rights which belong to every American citizen, and the country itself incorporated into the United States. Compare, I beseech you, sir, the language of the gentleman from Massachusetts, with that used by the Russian Minister. If this bill passes, (says the gentleman,) it will justify a revolution in this country—the Union will be virtually dissolved—civil war will become sanctified as a matter of right in each of the States, if they are not permitted to separate peaceably—political jealousy is inculcated between the Eastern and Western States. Every circumstance which is calculated in the remotest degree to excite discord and divisions, is studiously adverted to. The inhabitants of Louisiana are represented as wild and uncivilized in the woods, and dependent on the Eastern States for clothes to cover their nakedness—they are called at one time the wild men of Missouri, and at another the Anglo-Hispano-Gallo-Americans, who bask on the sand in the mouth of Mississippi; and, to cap the climax, we are alarmed with the apprehension, that six new States are to be formed in the West, which are to swallow up the power of the original partners to the Constitution, and control the nation. Are these the suggestions of a mind which "yielded to none in its attachments to the Constitution?" Sir, they are the ebullitions of political drunkenness, designed to produce internal "war, dismemberment, and despotism." I do not think the gentleman from Massachusetts has any reason to congratulate himself on the reference which he made to the opinions of the Russian Minister. On the one hand, we discern nothing but patriotism and union, and on the other, political jealousy, revolution, disunion, and the inseparable associate of these, despotism. But, Mr. Speaker, the people of the Eastern States will never give their assent to a dissolution of the Union. They are bound to the Western country by the inseparable ties of nature and of interest. The hardy and adventurous sons of New England will, in a short time, compose a large proportion of the population on the waters of the Mississippi, and I undertake to assure the gentleman from Massachusetts, that they will never return to "break into his house, or the houses of his friends, to filch their children's clothes in order to cover their nakedness." In that new and fertile region, the hand of industry is rewarded with a rich return of the comforts of life, which the liberality of its inhabitants distributes with benevolence and hospitality. Besides these natural bonds, which are every day increasing between the Eastern and Western portions of the United States, there is a reciprocal advantage in the intercourse which is preserved between them. The Western country is peculiarly adapted to the pursuits of agriculture, and the river Mississippi is the great highway through which their bulky articles are conveyed to a suitable and profitable market.

The Eastern States have long been and will long continue to be the carriers of these surplus products, to the seaport cities of the United States, to the West Indies and to Europe. Is it not then the interest of those who are engaged in the carrying trade to give encouragement to agriculture? There are mutual benefits in this interchange of labor which tend to promote the welfare of each section of the Union. No collision of interest can ever exist between the growers of hemp, flour, cotton, tobacco, and sugar, and the carrier who finds employment in their transportation to the countries in which they are consumed. If any advantage could be derived from a separation of these States it would be found to preponderate in favor of the Western division. We should at once become possessed of the public lands, which are said to be a fund on which the nation may rely for revenue to an incalculable amount. These lands have been acquired at the national expense, and it would therefore be unreasonable and unjust to confer them wholly on the Western States. But if the deleterious consequences which have been predicted by the gentleman from Massachusetts should be realized, such will be the inevitable effect in relation to the territory belonging to the United States.

Surely, there is patriotism enough even in the city of Boston to counteract the deteriorating principles of that gentleman. Let us adhere to the maxims of wisdom, and by a union of sentiment and action convince the nations of Europe that we are too powerful to be conquered, and too happy to be seduced from the allegiance we owe to the Government of our choice.

[During the course of his speech Mr. POINDEXTER was twice successively called to order by Mr. PEARSON and Mr. SHEFFEY; but both calls to order being withdrawn before any decision on them by the Speaker, they are not here noticed.]

Mr. GOLD—Mr. Speaker, hitherto, during the discussion of the interesting question before the House, I have remained silent. I shall now, sir, in my turn, ask the indulgence of the House for a few minutes.

On the great Constitutional question, I will not, sir, follow the honorable delegate from the Mississippi Territory (Mr. POINDEXTER,) who has just sat down, through all the details of his argument; for he laid down, at the very threshold, a position which never can be sustained, be the issue of this bill what it may. Under the provision in the Constitution declaring treaties the supreme law of the land, the gentleman confidently insists, that the treaty-making power is free from all the restrictions of the Constitution; that the Constitution sets up no land-marks; affords no limitation to this power. Hence, sir, the treaty of purchase of Louisiana having stipulated for the admission of that Territory into the Union, no provision of the Constitution can arrest the bill before the House; it must take effect, be the consequences what they may. The principle, sir, thus assumed, would subvert the very foundation of the Constitution; it violates first principles, and, if it shall prevail, will, like Pharaoh's lean kine, devour the whole fruits of the Constitution. Against this principle of construction, sir, I beg leave to enter my most solemn protest.

I turn, sir, to the real question raised by the worthy gentleman, who, as chairman of the committee, reported the bill.

Does the provision in the Constitution, that "new States may be admitted into the Union" give the power of admitting foreign territory, territory without the limits of the United States at the adoption of the Constitution? Now, sir, if those terms of the Constitution could not be fairly and fully satisfied without extending them to foreign territory, then, indeed, would the argument in favor of the bill be strong; it would be conclusive. But if this provision can be satisfied by its operation upon internal territory—territory then actually within the Union, which must have been in the contemplation of the framers of the Constitution—then does the argument wholly fail and all inference from the above terms fall to the ground. Need I, sir, point the House to the Western territory then within the Union, a fit and proper subject for this provision in the Constitution to operate upon; which must have been in actual contemplation at the adoption of the Constitution; out of which one or more States have actually been formed and admitted into the Union under this very provision.

H. OF R.

Territory of Orleans.

Will it be said, sir, that the Constitution applies equally to territory within and without the Union; that there is no difference in the application? If internal and external territory be subject to the same consideration; if the operation, on being admitted into the Union, be the same as to the interests of the old United States, and the great principles of the Federal compact; then, sir, would the construction contended for receive some support from its being reasonable in relation to the subject-matter. But, sir, it never can be pretended, that it is indifferent to the political interests of the old States, forming the Constitution, to the principle of association, whether this Empire should be bounded by its existing limits or by the shores of the Pacific ocean. Whether it should be a Commonwealth, of reasonable limits, adapted to the lax rule of a popular Constitution, or a Government of acquisition and conquest, whose ambition knows no limits, and in whose extension the original States would be lost.

The operation of acquisition and extension of empire is the same in this as in other States. What was it in Rome? When that Republic became settled and in the possession of great glory, it was confined to Italy; ambition and the spirit of conquest greatly extended the Empire, particularly to the East. What followed? The seat of Government is removed to Byzantium; a division into the Eastern and Western Empire ensued; and Italy, the original seat and nursery of the State, was lost. How many States will be brought into existence by the principle of this bill, between the Mississippi and the Pacific ocean, cannot now be foreseen; they may equal the States on the east of that river. It is, sir, against a principle leading to such consequences, that each and every of the original States may say, "non in hæc fœdera veni."

But, sir, aside from the Constitutional question, no sufficient reason is assigned for so precipitately admitting the Orleans Territory into the Union.

If the act of the second of March, 1805, is observed, if, on the inhabitants amounting to 60,000, and the same found on actual enumeration, the Territory is admitted into the Union, public faith is satisfied and full justice done. Why then, sir, before a return of the census, upon loose conjectural estimates, by no means justifying the belief of the requisite number of 60,000, is this important measure precipitated? Why is the appointed period anticipated? The only color of reason that has been given is, that Congress can now impose terms—terms for the security of public and private property—and the bill secures to the United States the public land belonging to them; exempts it from taxation by the new State, and provides, that the property of non-residents shall not be taxed higher than that of residents. This suggestion is unfounded and fallacious. The act of the 2d of March, 1805, which gives the pledge for a State relied on, expressly provides that the constitution to be formed for that Territory shall not be inconsistent with the Territorial ordinance of the 13th of July, 1787. On recurring to that ordinance, it will be found to contain every essential provision of the bill before the House. It excludes the new State's interfering with the primary disposal of the soil by the United States; exempts the public lands from taxation, and forbids the taxing of non-residents higher than residents. Thus, sir, the only reason assigned for anticipating the period stipulated by the act of 1805 falls to the ground. By adhering to the provisions of that act, and the ordinance, in requiring an actual return of the number of sixty thousand, you preserve to yourself a principle on which you may resist future applications for States, which will be urged in rapid succession upon you. You have already on your table the memorial of the Mississippi Territory for a State, anxious to rush into the Union before a return of the census. Upper Louisiana will succeed, and Indiana, Illinois, and Michigan, follow in rapid succession. New States will emerge to the astonished eye in the western horizon, like the figures in a magic lantern.

Are there not, sir, cogent reasons against a precipitate admission of this Territory into the Union? Can it escape gentlemen, that the inhabitants were born under a different government, different constitution and laws; they are almost strangers to the tongue in which the proceedings of this Government are to be recorded; with our Constitution, laws, and principles of jurisprudence, they have little more acquaintance than other nations. The reasons against anticipating the regular period for their admission into the Union thicken upon the mind in revolving the subject.

It only remains, sir, for me to express my deep regret at the animadversions and reflections so liberally bestowed by the honorable delegate (Mr. POINDEXTER) upon the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. QUINCY,) who preceded him in the debate.

In the Parliament of Great Britain (a country so often stigmatized on this floor) will be found examples of free debate, fully equal in ardency, vehemence, and invective, to all that fell from the eloquent member from Massachusetts.

We have there witnessed the old Earl Chatham, at a crisis all-important to the British Empire, (the commencement of the great contest for American rights,) sounding the alarm at the measures of administration; pronouncing the war on America founded in wrong and injustice, and arraigning the known favorite measures of the King in a strain of angry and terrible invective that can scarce find its parallel in the English language. Shall this House, in all the fullness of freedom secured by the Constitution, be afraid to follow such examples? It is here, sir, on this floor, that free debate is consecrated—here different opinions are to mingle in conflict. To repress this freedom would touch the vital principles of the Constitution.

While the free and ardent observations of the gentleman from Massachusetts were pointed to the consequences of the bill, if passed into a law, I was sorry to observe in the honorable delegate a course so widely different—a studied adherence to observations of a personal nature which could throw no light on the subject before us, and but ill become the dignity of the House.

Mr. BRIS said if he were so disposed he should be perfectly unable to follow gentlemen in their remarks, having been continually engaged, since the adjournment yesterday, in the duties assigned him by the House. I should not now have risen, said Mr. B., if the gentleman from Mississippi Territory had taken the ground on which I mean to justify my vote. In my opinion, sir, the treaty-making power has very little to do with the subject. We derive our power from the third section of the 4th article of the Constitution; and before I read it I beg leave to state a general rule of construction, which in my apprehension should be universally adopted, and which I apply to this section, viz: whenever a general power is granted, and certain limitations are expressed, the expression of those excludes all other limitation or derivation by implication. "New States may be admitted into the Union." Here is a general power granted, and, in my humble apprehension, if there were no limitation, it would give ample authority to admit States into the Union from territories not belonging to the United States at the time of the adoption of the Constitution. But, in addition to the words I have quoted, are the following: "But no new State shall be formed 'or erected within the jurisdiction of any other State; nor any State be formed by the junction of two or more States, or parts of States, 'without the consent of the Legislatures of the States concerned as well as of the Congress." Here is a general power with two limitations. Now, according to my rule, the expression of these two excludes all idea of any other, and I thence fairly infer the authority of Congress to pass the bill before you. I presume gentlemen will not deny the correctness of the rule. If it is not to be applied in this particular case, some gentleman who thinks so will show why it should not.

It will be recollected, sir, said Mr. B., that I was among the number yesterday who voted against the decision of the Chair on a point of order. I conceived that the gentleman from Massachusetts or any other member had a right, pending a measure, to express his views of the consequences to result from it; but whether the gentleman's conclusions were correct is a distinct question, on which I will offer no argument. But I will close the few remarks I have to offer to the House by reading part of an address to the people of this nation by the first character it has given birth to.

Mr. B. then read, as a part of his speech, the following extract from WASHINGTON's Farewell Address:

"The unity of Government which constitutes you one people, is also now dear to you. It is justly so; for it is a main pillar in the edifice of your real independence; the support of your tranquillity at home, your peace abroad; of your safety, of your prosperity, of that very liberty which you so highly prize. But as it is easy to foresee that, from different causes and from different quarters, much pains will be taken, many artifices employed, to weaken in your minds the conviction of this truth; as this is the point in your political fortress against which the batteries of internal and external enemies will be most constantly and actively (though often covertly and insidiously) directed, it is of infinite moment that you should properly estimate the immense value of national Union to your collective and individual happiness; that you should cherish a cordial, habitual, and immovable attachment to it; accustoming yourselves to think and speak of it as the palladium of your political safety and prosperity; watching for its preservation with jealous anxiety; discountenancing whatever may suggest even a suspicion that it can in any event be abandoned, and indignantly frowning upon the first dawning of every attempt to alienate any portion of our country from the rest, or to enfeeble the sacred ties which now link together the various parts."

Mr. WRIGHT.—Sir, this bill is not, in my judgment, a violation of the Constitution, nor have I a fear that it is fraught with those direful consequences with which the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. QUINCY) threatens us. It will neither justify a dissolution of the Union, nor lead any citizen attached to it, even amicably, much less forcibly, to the contemplation of it, notwithstanding the predictions of that gentleman. That we are authorized to erect new States, I will prove both by theory and practice, and for that purpose I will first invite your attention to the articles of Confederation. By one section it is expressly declared that Canada may be permitted to enjoy all the benefits of the Confederation on the same terms with the other States of the Union. The thirteen States under this Confederation conducted themselves safely through the war; but finding, in 1787, that their requisitions had not been duly respected, and that New York had rejected some necessary commercial regulations, whereby their fiscal affairs were deranged, Congress, by a resolution, resolved that a convention of States should be held for the express purpose of amending the articles of Confederation. Under this resolution the Convention met, and proceeded to form the present Constitution. Thus it will appear that they were to form the new Constitution not ex pari materia, but out of the very materials of the Confederation.

As a conclusive evidence, you will find a number of the articles in each instrument literally or substantially the same, and thereby be justified in giving a construction of the letter of the Constitution, so as to respect the spirit of the Confederation. By the third section of 4th article of the Constitution, "New States may be admitted by Congress into the Union;" and by the next member of the same section, "the Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States"—hence I can have no doubt that Congress have the power to admit new States into the Union, that power being expressly given. It is however contended, that that power is limited to the admission only of those States that may be established within the limits of the United States, as demarcated by the Treaty of Peace. And the preamble to the Constitution is relied on to establish that doctrine. "We, the people of the United States, &c. do establish this Constitution for the United States of America." If this preamble is so imperious as to limit the positive provisions of the Constitution, it will certainly limit itself to the States that formed the Constitution—the negative of which has been determined. To prove which, here let me call your attention to the fact, that Vermont was not a member of the Confederation, nor was she a member of the Convention that formed the Constitution; she therefore was not one of the United States—was foreign as to them, and as distinctly governed as any other foreign Power; she in 1791 was admitted into the Union, and the laws of the United States extended to her. She was not one of the old States, and was correctly admitted under the power to admit new States. Vermont was so repulsive to a confederacy with the United States, as not to be mentioned in the Articles of Confederation. Can it be for a moment doubted that Canada, expressly mentioned, might be now received as a new State, by becoming independent, or by purchase, when Vermont has been admitted, who was not mentioned in the Confederation? Can there be an opinion that the framers of the Constitution intended Canada should be excluded from the benefits of the Constitution, when before invited into it? When, by the express letter of the instrument, "new States may be admitted," and when Vermont, not mentioned in the Confederation, has been admitted? Such a conclusion can never be the rational result of such premises. But it is objected, that, as this Territory was obtained by treaty, and after the formation of the Constitution, it cannot be admitted into the Union as a State.

I have shown that new States may be admitted, that Vermont has been admitted, and that Canada was expressly entitled under the Confederation, and by the terms of the Constitution may be admitted as a new State. "Congress may admit new States into the Union, and make all needful rules and regulations with respect to the territory or other property of the United States." This is certainly a territory, the property of the United States, and Congress as certainly, may, if needful, that is, expedient, admit it into the Union. We are told, I presume to retard this measure, that the limits are in dispute, and that, if made a State, they cannot afterwards be settled by the United States. That this is not the case, I will prove by theory and by practice. By the treaty-making power vested in the President and the Senate, they may treat on all subjects within the treaty-making power, with foreign nations, and where the limits of any foreign Power adjoining the territory of the United States are not ascertained to their mutual satisfaction, they certainly may settle them by a treaty of limits. This is the practice and usage of all nations, and the United States by a treaty of limits with Great Britain, did settle the beginning of their northeastern limits, at the river St. Croix, whereby they gave up seven miles to Great Britain, which was taken from a State—hence I presume no difficulty can arise on the subject. Here let me remark that as the United States establish the territory into a State with all the right they have and no more, if it shall be found that the property belonged to a foreign Power, the grant of the United States of that to which they were not entitled could vest no title in the State, the grantee; nor can they complain, as that is the true construction of the grant. Sir, a strange reverse has attended the acquisition of Louisiana. At first New Orleans was so important to the United States that they could not do without it, and the navigation of the Mississippi depended upon its acquisition. A certain Senator of Pennsylvania (Mr. J. Ross) in the Senate was so devoted to its acquisition, per fas aut per nefas, that he volunteered his services to take it by force, with a view, I presume, of involving the United States in a war, as a diversion in favor of Great Britain; but that body repelled every idea of force, and from information that it might be purchased, authorized their Minister to purchase it; which was effected at less expense than it would have cost to have taken it, whereby the peace and blood of the nation were preserved. Then it all at once become of little value; the title was disputed, and the extent of the limits by which we were informed it was sold, were disputed by the Representatives of the American people. And now, after the treaty has been ratified, and by law confirmed, and the purchase money paid, our title is still slandered, and the extension of our limits, on this floor, disputed. However, I hope and trust this bill will pass, and agreeably to the letter and spirit of the treaty, this people will be received into the bosom of the American family. Their fidelity has been already tested by a devotion to the laws of the Union, when a portion of the American people were, by treason, endeavoring to disserve them from the Union.

Mr. KEY spoke half an hour against the bill, and Mr. MAÇON a few minutes in reply to him.

The question was then taken on the motion for indefinite postponement, and lost, as follows:

The following is the bill as finally passed:

A Bill to enable the people of the Territory of Orleans to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union, on an equal footing with the original States; and for other purposes.

11th Con. 3d Sess.—19

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That the inhabitants of the Territory of Orleans be, and they are hereby, authorized to form for themselves a constitution and State government, and assume such name as it may deem proper, with the provisions, and upon the conditions hereinafter mentioned.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That said State shall be composed of all that part of the territory or country ceded under the name of Louisiana, by the treaty made at Paris on the thirtieth day of April, one thousand eight hundred and three, between the United States and France, now contained within the limits of the Territory of Orleans, except that part lying east of the river Iberville and a line to be drawn along the middle of the lakes Maurepas and Pontchartrain to the ocean.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That all free male citizens of the United States, who shall have arrived to the age of twenty-one years, and resided within the said Territory at least one year previous to the day of election, and shall have paid a territorial, county, district, or parish tax; and all persons having in other respects the legal qualifications to vote for representatives in the General Assembly, or the Territory thereof, be, and they are hereby authorized to choose representatives to form a convention; who shall be apportioned amongst the several counties, districts, and parishes, within the said Territory of Orleans, in such manner as the Legislature of the said Territory shall by law direct. The number of representatives shall not exceed sixty; and the elections for the representatives aforesaid shall take place on the third Monday of September next, and shall be conducted in the same manner as is now provided by the laws of the said Territory for electing members for the House of Representatives.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the members of the convention, when duly elected, be, and they are hereby authorized to meet at the city of New Orleans, on the first Monday of November next, which convention, when met, shall first determine, by a majority of the whole number elected, whether it be expedient or not, at that time, to form a constitution and State government, for the people within the said Territory, and if it be determined to be expedient, then the convention shall in like manner declare, in behalf of the people of the said Territory, that it adopts the Constitution of the United States; whereupon the said convention shall be, and hereby is authorized to form a constitution and State government, for the people of the said Territory: Provided, The constitution to be formed, in virtue of the authority herein given, shall be republican, and consistent with the Constitution of the United States; that it shall contain the fundamental principles of civil and religious liberty; that it shall secure to the citizen the trial by jury in all criminal cases, and the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus, conformably to the provisions of the Constitution of the United States; and that after the admission of the said Territory of Orleans as a State into the Union, the laws which such State may pass, shall be promulgated, and its records of every description shall be preserved, and its judicial and legislative written proceedings conducted, in the language in which the laws and the judicial and legislative written proceedings of the United States are now published and conducted: And provided also, That the said convention shall provide by an ordinance, irrevocable without the consent of the United States, that the people inhabiting the said Territory do agree and declare, that they forever disclaim all right or title to the waste or unappropriated lands, lying within the said Territory; and that the same shall be and remain at the sole and entire disposition of the United States; and, moreover, that each and every tract of land, sold by Congress, shall be and remain exempt from any tax, laid by the order or under the authority of the State, whether for State, county, township, parish, or any other purpose whatever, for the term of five years, from and after the respective days of the sales thereof; and that the lands belonging to persons residing without the said State, shall never be taxed higher than the lands belonging to persons residing therein; and that no taxes shall be imposed on lands the property of the United States. And that the river Mississippi and the navigable rivers and waters leading into the same, or into the Gulf of Mexico, shall be common highways and for ever free, as well to the inhabitants of the said State as to other citizens of the United States, without any tax, impost, or duty therefor.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That in case the convention shall declare its assent, in behalf of the people of the said Territory, to the adoption of the Constitution of the United States, and shall form a constitution and State government for the people of the said Territory of Orleans, the said convention, as soon thereafter as may be, is hereby required to cause to be transmitted to Congress the instrument by which its assent to the Constitution of the United States is thus given and declared, and also a true and attested copy of such constitution or frame of State government, as shall be formed and provided by said convention, and if the same shall not be disapproved by Congress, the said State shall be admitted into the Union, upon the same footing with the original States.

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 16.

The bill to change the name of Lewis Grant, to that of Lewis Grant Davidson, was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

Mr. MITCHELL presented a petition of the President and Directors of the Merchants' Bank in the city of New York, praying the renewal of the charter of the United States' Bank; which was read, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the bill for the renewal of the said charter.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to authorize the surveying and making of certain roads in the State of Ohio, as contemplated by the treaty of Brownstown in the Territory of Michigan," was read twice, and committed to the Committee on the Public Lands.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to incorporate the Farmers' Bank of Alexandria," was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole on the bill concerning the Bank of Alexandria.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to lay before this House a list of the directors of the Bank of the United States, and of the several branches; and a statement of the stock held by foreigners, and in what countries, and of the stock held by citizens, and in what States and Territories; and, also, the amount of specie, according to the last returns, in the vaults of the bank, distinguishing the part which belongs to the bank, the portion belonging to individuals, and to the United States.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to incorporate the Bank of Washington," was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole last mentioned.

The bill sent from the Senate, entitled "An act to incorporate the Bank of Potomac," was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole last mentioned.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Ebenezer Rollins;" in which bill they desire the concurrence of this House.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill from the Senate for the relief of the heirs of Major General Anthony Wayne. [The bill authorizes a resettlement of accounts of said deceased, supposed to have been too hastily adjusted.] Mr. MILNOR stated the object of the bill with great precision, minutely detailing many sums of money due General Wayne at the time of his decease, with which his heirs had not been credited in the settlement of his accounts. Mr. WRIGHT also spoke in favor of the bill. The bill was ordered to a third reading, and was read a third time and passed without opposition.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to renew the charter of the Bank of the United States.

Mr. BURWELL moved to strike out the first section.

I have made this motion, sir, said Mr. B., because it allows the greatest latitude of discussion upon the important points which are preliminary to the examination of the details. It tries the principle of the bill, and may save much tedious and useless labor. Should a majority decide in favor of the Bank of the United States, as an honest man, I will aid in forming a system best adapted to the state of the country, and most subservient to the purposes of such an institution. The gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. MOSLEY) has done justice to my conduct, and the fairness with which the subject has been treated. I have been anxious to present the question fairly, not from any doubt or indecision as to the course I should pursue, but from its magnitude, and the sensibility it has excited. It will be recollected by the Committee, when the gentleman from Pennsylvania presented the memorial upon which the Secretary of the Treasury founded his report, on that, as on all subsequent occasions, my opposition was manifested; and I will add that the particular attention which my duty has compelled me to bestow on the bank, has confirmed more strongly former impressions.

Bank of the United States.

H. OF R.

The remarks I shall make are intended to show that Congress possesses no power to incorporate a bank; to show its effect on the Government, and to satisfy the Committee that the exercise of the power, even if possessed, is inexpedient. While, sir, I feel the most ardent desire to consult the convenience of the Government and promote the prosperity of the community in general, I have not lost sight of the limits within which I am restrained by the Constitution of the United States and considerations of sound policy. It is my most deliberate conviction that the Constitution of the country gives no authority to Congress to incorporate a bank and endow the stockholders with chartered immunities; and even if its dissolution should produce ruin to the merchants, and, what is of equal importance, embarrassment to the Government, they would not be paramount to the sacred obligation of supporting the Constitution; though I am persuaded the dreadful evils which have been predicted from the annihilation of the bank will soon vanish, and that no material shock will be produced by that cause. The construction which the Constitution has received by the various persons who have at different times administered it, has been rigid or liberal according to the confidence in the General or State governments. The unqualified extent given to its general powers, and the inclusion of incidental powers, as flowing from and belonging to particular enumerated grants, have constituted the essential points of difference among those who have divided upon the principles of the Constitution. This has been the case not only in the exercise of authority where the right was questionable, but in cases where the right was undeniable, tending by its operation to increase the weight of the General Government. In giving to the Constitution that construction which sound policy requires, and a just regard to the harmony of the States and the perpetuation of their Union dictates, I cannot find any part of it authorizing the exercise of a power which, from its nature, is obnoxious, its tendency alarming; and its influence in the hands of those who manage its concerns irresistible. The power to establish a bank cannot be deduced from the general phrases "to provide for the common defence and general welfare," because they merely announce the object for which the General Government was instituted. The only means by which this object is to be attained are specifically enumerated in the Constitution, and if they are not ample, it is a defect which Congress are not competent to supply. I think this inference the stronger, inasmuch as those means were granted to us by those who had acted under the Confederation and experienced its defects, and knew precisely to what extent power was requisite to provide for the common defence and general welfare. In relation to this particular subject, the proceedings of the Convention itself furnish the plainest evidence, by rejecting the proposition to vest in Congress the right to grant incorporations. I readily admit the motive of deliberative bodies cannot always be known. Various considerations might have operated. They might have supposed the power already vested. But, it is incumbent on those who can place faith in an interpretation so repugnant to the cautious and guarded phraseology of the instrument to demonstrate it. If the right to incorporate exists, it is a general grant of power, equally applicable to all the objects of incorporation, and cannot be assumed as a means to carry into effect any particular grant of authority. To my mind, it is much more natural to suppose a power to create monopolies had been surrendered, to quiet the fears of those who saw in the Constitution the germ which would sooner or later palsy the vitals of the State authority. If the general phrases are not explained in the manner just mentioned, and powers so extensive and important are derived from them, it would be ridiculous to consider the jurisdiction of Congress restricted; they would confer equal authority to establish monopolies in all the various branches of individual industry and commercial enterprise. Sir, I will conclude this part of the subject by reminding you how essential it is, when we are giving an interpretation to the Constitution, to which the States are parties, to assume only what clearly belongs to us. Moderation will inspire confidence, selfishness will excite disgust and suspicion.

The parts of the Constitution which bear any analogy to this subject, are

1st. Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts, and provide for the common defence and general welfare, &c.

2d. To borrow money on the credit of the United States.

3d. To regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with Indian tribes. And

4th. To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper to carry the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by the Constitution in the General Government, into effect.

It will not be denied that, if the establishment of a bank comes within the meaning of the power to lay and collect taxes, to pay the debts of the United States, and to regulate commerce, or is necessary and proper to carry the foregoing powers into effect, it would be a fair subject for legislation by Congress. But can any one pretend that a bank would be a mode contemplated by the Constitution to lay and collect taxes on the people for the purpose of raising revenue? Would it comport with that wise principle of uniformity, and those guarded restrictions against unequal burdens on the people, which constitute the most valuable safeguard to the citizen? To understand these terms we must give them a meaning which has been affixed by their usual import. When we speak of the power to lay taxes, we understand by it a demand of money from the community, regulated by fixed and equitable principles, indiscriminate as to persons, and the species of property taxed. To suppose that every law which imposed burdens or brought money into the Treasury was Constitutional, would destroy our equal system of government, and substitute a capricious despotism. It would revive the exploded doctrine of free gifts, benevolences, and that shameful train of extortions practised by the old Governments of Europe. Does it fall within the power to pay the debts of the United States? This clause relates entirely to the application of the funds after they have been accumulated; it is in conformity with that article which pledges the public faith for debts which had been contracted, as well as those which might be created in pursuance of the authority to borrow money upon the faith of the United States. If the power to incorporate a bank grew out of the obligation to pay the debts of the United States, its charter should be so worded as to cease whenever they were extinguished; and it would be no longer for Congress to fix a definite period for its expiration. If the right of incorporation was ever meant to be given, it would most naturally follow from the regulation of commerce; yet, no one has contended Congress could create insurance companies within the States. Those who contend the bank is Constitutional, consider it as necessary and proper in collecting the revenue. That it may be an useful instrument, I do not deny. It forms depositories convenient to the Government; but, you should recollect depositories equally safe and convenient, can be procured without being purchased at the expense of exorbitant and invidious privileges to a particular class in the community. I apprehend the Constitution means something extremely different when it empowers the General Government to collect taxes; it relates exclusively to the authority thus given to Congress of employing compulsory process in coercing the payment of taxes; it enables Congress to create, within the jurisdiction of the States, officers of the revenue, and through them, to exercise over the property of the citizens a concurrent jurisdiction, from which they otherwise would be precluded, and from which they had been precluded before the adoption of the Constitution; it enables them to impose penalties and forfeitures, and to inflict punishment for resistance to their authority. But, sir, admit for a moment the bank may be formed to collect the revenue, ought it not be exclusively used for that object? Whence the power to make it an instrument of commerce? Why invest it with a capital immense in amount, and sovereign in its control over the external and internal commerce of the country? Sir, I must again call your attention to the limited nature of our Government; we must administer it as we find it, and not as we think it ought to be. Under this view of the subject, so long as I understand the right to "lay taxes" to consist in drawing supplies from the people for public purposes, and not to tax one portion of the community for the benefit of another, and "to collect them," the right to enforce payment, I cannot construe them to authorize the establishment of a bank. Sir, a bank has been improperly considered a means of executing some power exclusively given to Congress. The nature of incorporations is so clearly a distinct class of political power, that, before they can be converted into means incidental to an object without the jurisdiction of the General Government, they must be shown to be absolutely necessary. Permit me to ask, how has it been ascertained that a bank is necessary to the operations of the Government? Has the experiment been tried? Upon a question involving a breach of the Constitution, it would be safer to be guided by experience than conjecture.

Sir, I am well aware that I can add nothing new upon the Constitutional points. The subject was more thoroughly examined in 1791, and more ably elucidated than any other since the adoption of the Government. The celebrated speech of Mr. MADISON, to which I ascribe my conviction, has been recently presented to us in the newspapers, and gentlemen must be familiar with it. I cannot give additional weight to the arguments, but I thought it proper to call the attention of the Committee to that part of the subject by the remarks I have made.

I said, sir, it must be shown that the bank is necessary to the operations of the Government—without its aid our fiscal concerns cannot be managed. So far from subscribing to the necessity of the bank, I believe the revenue would be equally safe in the State banks, and could be distributed with inconsiderable difficulty. The revenue received in most of the States is nearly equal to the expenditure within them, and when a deficiency occurred in any one, it could be supplied by arrangements with the different banks, by transportation, or inland bills of exchange, in the manner that the public engagements are fulfilled abroad. I will venture to assert the Secretary of the Treasury will find no difficulty in contracting with individuals and corporate institutions, upon the most ample security, to transfer the public revenue upon terms equally advantageous to the United States. Among the several States commercial intercourse is great, and daily increasing; the constant traffic which the different portions of the country maintain with one another, will give facility to the operations of the Government, and obviate the obstacles which are anticipated; the very commerce which enables the Treasury to remit with ease immense sums to every part of Europe is the result of this interchange among the States, and insures equal facility at home. Where, then, is the necessity for this bank? The accommodation of the bank to the Government in times of emergency, and the use of its resources to support public credit, have been urged as motives for its establishment; how far such considerations weaken Constitutional objections, it is needless to state. If, sir, the bank becomes a source of supply to the Government to an adequate extent, it ceases to be one to the merchants. It therefore, cannot answer in both capacities. The same necessity which throws the Government upon the charity of the banks renders it incapable of discharging the obligation, and while the funds of the institution are locked up in the Government, its commercial functions must cease. The relief which sudden and temporary embarrassments require, can, at all times, be administered by the State banks, and, therefore, supersedes the necessity of aid from this bank. Whenever, by disasters, the ordinary sources of supply are exhausted, or the unavoidable objects of expenditure exceed the revenue, a more copious and permanent aliment will be found in the wealth and capital of the citizens than by loans from banks. Instead of diverting the active and productive capital from useful channels, the sluggish and inert mass will be drawn forth in its aid, to support public credit and cherish private enterprise. But, sir, is it prudent to rely upon an institution that may refuse you assistance? What will be the influence of such an institution on the Government, and the country at large? It cannot escape your recollection that the establishment of the Bank of the United States was the origin of a system which assumed as its basis the enlargement of the national jurisdiction. Whether the principles of expediency to which it owes its birth be regarded, or the overweening influence it established over the moneyed institutions and merchants of the States, the charge, to say the least, is plausible. The close and intimate connexion between the Government and bank—the dependence of the former for loans, and the latter for public deposits, have given the Executive branch its full share of influence and odium—shows incontestably it was created to augment the power of the General Government, and the Executive in particular. Yes, sir, it was the commencement of those political animosities which have poisoned the sources of social intercourse; it was the origin of that doctrine of constructive power which abrogates the Constitution and nullifies the restrictions imposed upon Congress. So long as it exists, the body politic will experience the agitations and convulsive throes of well grounded jealousy in the States.

Sir, in the administration of this Government two things alone are necessary to insure its durability. You must first avoid every measure which will produce uneasiness among the States, or, second, that will extend the jurisdiction of the United States Government to subjects purely local. I do not mean that the rightful authority of Congress is to be abandoned for fear of giving offence, but, whenever called on to take a step which will produce uneasiness, you should be perfectly satisfied the letter and spirit of the Constitution bear you out. Do not gentlemen perceive the tendency of this measure to involve us with the States upon delicate points? Has not the United States' Bank produced serious alarm? Will not the alarm be increased by its continuance at this time? Yes, sir, some of the States have already taxed this institution, others have waited under the expectation we shall render a collision unnecessary. Suppose the charter renewed, and the stockholders should be taxed in such a manner as to destroy, virtually, the privileges you have guaranteed to them? Are you to leave them unprotected, or will you draw the sword in their behalf? While you have time, avoid a situation not less perilous than the most serious foreign war. Since the establishment of the bank, the States have created banks—their people have accumulated capital, and they will not tamely witness the perpetuation of an institution whose strength can at any moment overthrow whatever State bank they may mark for destruction. However paradoxical it may appear, I consider the General Government strengthened by narrowing its jurisdiction; it will produce disunion whenever they interfere with local concerns. The habits, local interests, and passions of this country vary, and no one is a competent judge of what will suit the feelings of the State out of which he lives. But, sir, there are general principles in which our feelings and interests are identified; there are subjects upon which we may safely act, and trust to the co-operation of every man and State in the Union. Does the bank affect the people locally? The answer is obvious: it not only undertakes to fix the amount of capital, but interferes with the rights of property most essentially—it may change the fundamental principles of State law as to the liability of property for debts, and the mode of recovering them. Let me caution you against the renewal of the charter; it is pregnant with the most baneful consequences to the tranquillity of the country. Is it not better to sacrifice this golden calf upon the altar of concord, restore confidence and harmony among individuals as well as States, and to reunite the lovers of the Constitution?

In the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, the convenience of obtaining loans from the bank is mentioned as an inducement to establish a National Bank. To me the abuse of this convenience is more dreaded than any other evil which will follow from the measure. Where have you seen a National Bank, connected with the Government, which has not ultimately ruined the circulating medium of the nation? It is a notorious fact that money has depreciated seriously, from the unlimited circulation of paper, and if the Government should be compelled, by necessity, to use the funds of the bank, they must permit the increased circulation of its paper, although its money capital remains stationary. In this situation the Government must tolerate an operation which will increase the evil of which we complain. The example of England is a salutary monition to us, and we ought to profit from it. In that country there was a time when the stability of the bank was a national phrase, "As good as the Bank of England." How is it now? The funds of the bank have been borrowed by the Government—its paper circulation increased, and Parliament has been compelled to make it a tender for the payment of all contracts. Who, sir, can estimate the complicated mischiefs of a depreciated paper currency, without specie for its redemption? Should we be involved in war, or our property seized abroad, nothing can prevent universal bankruptcy—one wide-spread ruin will pervade the Continent. At this time the country is inundated with paper bottomed upon the whole floating and real property of the community : should an alarm exist, can these funds be converted into money to redeem its credit? Certainly not. Will it not be prudent to diminish the extent of this evil by putting down this bank which is the fountain from which the whole system flows? It is of little importance, as it regards the internal trade of a country, what constitutes the representation of property. Paper, iron, or anything else, which passes current, will answer every purpose of barter and trade; but, in its commerce abroad, it is indispensable that the circulating medium should be equally valuable and readily acknowledged among all commercial nations; otherwise, all the operations of commerce, carried on with money, will be abandoned or prosecuted under disadvantages equal to the difference in the value of the currency at home and abroad. In countries actively engaged in business, this branch of trade is not only great in amount, but by far the most profitable. How unwise, therefore, not only to substitute for the precious metals paper currency, whose value is confined to the United States, but to augment the quantity until it depreciates even among ourselves.

I cannot sufficiently express my apprehension at a state of things which exposes us to irreparable injury whenever a foreign nation shall interrupt our commerce, or my regret at the daily ascendancy of this fatal policy. In my opinion, sir, the true corrective will be applied, if the Government, instead of receiving the paper of a particular bank in payment for the revenue, shall require specie as the only tender. Such an operation would secure to the country its due proportion of the precious metals, would restrain within rational and useful limits the circulation of paper, would insure stability to the moneyed institutions, save the people from the dreadful scene of bank swindling which is exhibited, and restore the equality of trade with foreign nations, which depends upon the fixed value of the circulating medium. I am far from intimating that banks are useless, when established with a due regard to the actual wants of the country. Measured by that standard, they form the chief resource of industry, lubricate the wheels of commerce, and accelerate their motion—but the Constitution has wisely intrusted this measure to the States; they are the most competent judges. If the Bank of the United States tended to restrain the multiplication of banks, and the ruinous emission of paper, I acknowledge it would be a powerful argument in its favor—it would go far to satisfy me of its expediency. But, instead of producing this effect, we have seen them, like mushrooms in a genial soil, spring up under its fostering protection; the Bank of the United States has an interest in the multiplication of similar institutions, because they all tend to secure it from danger, and enable it to increase the discounts to the greatest amount; before the United States' Bank can be affected all the other banks must be ruined, because the advantage of public deposits, and the great extent of capital, will afford the means of averting the storm. What has been the fact upon this subject? Have not the most shameful systems of bank swindling been practised? The State of Massachusetts found it necessary either to suppress her banks, or limit their discounts. They found, upon examining the vaults of the banks, the whole of them did not contain specie equal to the paper issued by a single one. Yes, sir, instead of finding a sound body, they found a corpse rotten and decayed; the specie had fled and the public were left without the prospect of remuneration. Have you forgotten the Bank of Rhode Island? This bank had issued notes to the amount of $800,000 upon a capital of $451. Will gentlemen tell me the Bank of the United States has checked, or will keep down, in future, similar impositions? I am justified in considering this bank instrumental in depreciating the currency of the country, and banishing its substantial capital.

There is no branch of industry more materially injured by the artificial state of credit, and the depreciated currency of the country, than manufactures. The precarious condition of commerce has naturally turned the public attention to this subject; and we may hope the time is not distant when the United States will furnish the articles of substantial utility for themselves. The war in Europe, by deranging the operations of the manufacturer, and the taxes with which his industry has been burdened, have conspired to give a vigorous impulse to them here. But, sir, we shall probably witness their destruction by the rapid depreciation of paper, which raises the price of labor, and impedes the accomplishment of this most desirable object. The exchange of labor between the inhabitants of America and the Old World, has always been disadvantageous. We have not only paid full profits upon the capital and labor employed in the production of what is consumed, but we have paid the taxes which the prodigal Governments of Europe have laid upon them.

Upon this subject a strong appeal has been made to our feelings; it has been said the dissolution of the bank will produce the most serious pressure in the community, and will devote numbers to ruin. I am confident no man would be more gratified than myself, to afford relief to those who may suffer, if I was not precluded by Constitutional difficulties. While I admit the sufferings of individuals will be great, I am equally convinced the picture is highly colored and the facts exaggerated.

The time when the charter expires has been known to every person; the presumption against its renewal strong. How can you, therefore, believe the creditors of the bank have made no provision to meet the event? It is scarcely possible to conceive that funds have not been provided to extricate themselves. When I say the presumption against the renewal of the charter has been strong, I do not allude so much to the sentiment in this House, as to the solemn declaration of the President of its unconstitutionality—

JANUARY, 1811.

Bank of the United States.

H. OF R.

[Mr. MACON called Mr. BURWELL to order for using the name of the President in debate.]

Sir, the violation of order has been inadvertently committed; his name was not used to produce any effect here, because I really am unacquainted with his present opinions, except as I infer them from his Speech in 1791; I cannot suppose he would use one set of arguments then, and act upon another now.

Under such circumstances, it would be criminal in this House to yield Constitutional objections, and surrender important considerations of policy, to shelter those who have shut their eyes to the law. The Legislature cannot resist with too much firmness such an appeal; it is placing them at the mercy of a few, and sacrificing the general good to the clamors or follies of the im-provident.

It has been said that $8,000,000 in specie will be required, from circulation, to meet the demands of the bank, and that the amount cannot be procured in the United States. I venture to assert, upon the statement furnished by the bank agents, the sum will not exceed $2,500,000 over and above the specie in the vaults of the bank. After paying and settling with the community, the bank will owe to the stockholders $10,400,000. If they retain the specie now in the vaults, amounting to $5,000,000, the demand upon the community will be lessened to that extent; if it is paid out to meet the return of their notes in circulation, it passes into other banks, and will return to them; so that, in either case, it will constitute a fund to pay the stockholders, and reduce their demand to $5,400,000; from this sum must be deducted $500,000, the amount of real estate belonging to the corporation, $2,750,000, loaned to the Government, and about $300,000 in suit, leaving a balance not exceeding $2,500,000. Will it be said that this sum cannot be raised in a country whose export of specie, for the last year, amounted to $8,000,000? Will it be said that the system of banks has reduced us to this low ebb, and yet we are called upon to perpetuate the evil? From this view of the subject, it appears that the creditors of the bank will be compelled to raise $7,500,000.

Can any gentlemen seriously believe that this sum will ruin the country? If, sir, we judge from the number of banks springing into existence in the different States, the conclusion is irresistible, that there is a redundancy of capital more than ample to accommodate all the debtors of the bank. Scarcely a single Legislature has separated without granting charters. You have this morning deposited in Committee of the Whole, the cemetery for the District, five banks, with an aggregate capital of three and a half millions. This thing must be downright cheat-ery, or there is a redundancy of capital. If it is fraudulent, the sooner the delusion is dissipated the better.

I shall, for the present, admit these applications are evidences of capital, and contend they will operate effectually to relieve the community. But, sir, it will be found from the statement of the bank agents, the directors have contracted debts nearly or quite equal to the amount due them, and that they will find difficulty in meeting the claims against them. These claims will naturally be transferred to those who are indebted, or deposited in State banks, where they will constitute funds upon which accommodation can be extended. The moment you destroy the bank, the notes it has issued, to the amount of $5,000,000, will return; the deposits, amounting to nearly eight millions and a half, will come into the market; these, added to the private capital which can be spared, will supply the means of sustaining the shock.

I feel confident the removal of public deposits will go far to remedy the evil. The loan, obtained from the bank, and payable the 1st of January, will add to the facility of satisfying the claims of the bank. Even the funds of the institution itself will rapidly glide into channels of profit, and contribute to the object. Thus, sir, this omnipotent association, whose influence pervades the Continent; whose nod dispenses protection or ruin, like an angry cloud, will be disarmed by the conducting powers of the State banks; there will be no explosion. Its substance will be secreted, mixed with their juices, and strengthen the general system.

In the public discussions upon this subject, we have been told the quantity of specie has been reduced below the actual wants of trade, and that the portion of stock held by foreigners will be carried abroad in money. Those who endeavor to alarm us in this way, are either ignorant themselves, or they calculate largely upon our credulity. It is, sir, a melancholy fact, that specie has been almost banished from circulation by paper, and from the vaults of the banks by exportations abroad, in a commerce which does not replace it. It is equally true, that this bank has contributed more than any other to produce this deplorable result. But it is evident the exportation must be limited in amount, or the import of specie commensurate, if we do not continue the present system which threatens us with a currency exclusively paper.

As to the exportation of specie by the foreign stockholders, nothing can be more absurd. Have not the motives which induced them to invest their property in the United States been strengthened? Yes, sir, funds in every part of Europe are fluctuating and insecure; the grip of taxation has embraced them, and you must think worse of the judgment of these proprietors than I do, if you suppose they will quit a country whose institutions are safe, and whose property is advancing rapidly in value. But laying aside considerations which of themselves are sufficient pledges, the rate of exchange renders the remittance of specie, particularly silver, altogether improbable. Would any man in his senses ship specie to England, when he can purchase bills of exchange eight or ten per cent. below par? Will he lose four per cent. insurance, freight, and commissions, when he can make eight or ten by remittances in bills of exchange? These questions carry conviction to every man, unless he supposes money is worth more than this difference over the paper currency of the country. Although the exchange is in favor of Holland four per cent., it would be cheaper to lose that amount than pay fifteen or twenty per cent. insurance, &c., for the transportation of specie, subject to risk from British cruisers, and seizure from French rulers in port. No one will say that the Dutch have any motives to draw their funds from the United States.

H. OF R.

Bank of the United States.

JANUARY, 1811.

After showing, I hope to your satisfaction, that specie cannot be remitted in the actual state of things, I will suppose foreign stockholders should transfer their capital, how would that affect this country? From what I have said, it appears that the one million held in Holland, and six millions in England, if withdrawn from the United States, would only be an exchange of funds with the American merchant, and would not affect the money in circulation. I confidently believe the present embarrassments of merchants arise from the spoiliations of the belligerents, and principally from the accumulation of funds in England, which they cannot withdraw but at a great loss. For some time past shipments have been almost confined to England; the prices have been good, and the proceeds far above the demand for English merchandise; added to this, whenever shipments have been made elsewhere, the profitable purchases of bills have increased their funds in Great Britain.

The fact is clearly demonstrated from the state of exchange, which for the first time is greatly in our favor. If, then, the stockholders should remit their funds by bills of exchange, it would bring six millions into the market, and not only relieve the American merchant from the unfavorable state of exchange, but would at once furnish the means of meeting his engagements and relieving his embarrassments. It would be a loss of that much capital to the United States; but we can bear the loss, as is evident from the rapidity with which new capital is supplied to form new banks. Should they give a preference to moneyed institutions here the community would be equally relieved.

It may be asked, if foreign capital remains, shall we not be exposed to its influence? I do not, sir, object to the use of foreign capital by individuals, but I never will consent to organize it under the patronage of the Government; in the hands of an individual its influence is comparatively insignificant. Combined in the form of a National Bank it becomes truly formidable to the best interests of the nation; besides, I well know that individuals who can obtain money at an interest less than the profit it yields, cannot be prevented by law from borrowing. In this form it may subserve the purposes of industry, but cannot control public opinion or obstruct public measures. If, sir, the pressure upon the community should not be removed in the mode I have suggested, the bank will naturally proceed in the collection of its debts, in a manner best calculated to secure itself. I cannot imagine measures will be adopted which will force the merchants either to fail or to refuse payment. Such conduct on the part of the bank would be wantonly cruel and unjust, and would probably terminate in great losses. In the event of such a procedure the merchants would compel the bank to resort to the ordinary course for the recovery of debts, and under such circumstances I do not apprehend their credit would be affected with other banks. The alarming scarcity of specie, produced by the facility which the bank has furnished, to procure it for exportation, and speculations in bills sold by the agents of the British for the use of their troops in Canada and the West Indies, cannot be too strongly impressed on the mind of the Committee, or too soon stopped by the Government. It is true that a temporary inconvenience results from the latter mode of exportation, because it is soon brought back in return for provisions supplied by the Middle States. It must be known, sir, to you, why the import of specie, which nurtured the East India trade, has ceased since the revolution in Spanish America, which opened the direct trade to the English for supplies of British and East India manufactures, and the facility of shipping specie direct to Spain, without the intervention of bills of exchange obtained in this country on Europe; the supply of American produce to the Spanish colonies has never been more than sufficient to keep up the necessary quantity for our own use and for the India trade, to an extent limited by our own wants; hence the disadvantage of the paper system, which furnishes the means of prosecuting this trade after its utility is done away. Gentlemen will tell me this evil will correct itself, and that the merchants will not persist in a branch of business unprofitable for want of markets. I readily admit this position to be correct; but, before all those sanguine adventurers will be convinced, who are tempted by the accommodation of the bank, we shall be so far drained of our real capital, as to be incapable of sustaining public confidence in the stability of our money institutions. There is one effect from the extent to which the banking system has been pushed in this country, which deserves serious attention. I think the capital of the banks should rather fall short than exceed the demand of those engaged in trade; whenever there is an excess of capital the competition will be among the banks to lend, and they will advance funds to those who are not entitled to credit. This fictitious credit, given to individuals without property, will expose the farmers and planters to the most serious injury, because, whenever they fail, their property will go entirely into the coffers of the bank, or the hands of their endorsers. In Baltimore, where the bank capital has always exceeded the demand by solvent customers, and where, to give full employment to their funds, the banks have been induced to accommodate mere speculators; failures have happened to the amount of a million, without property to pay the creditors twenty cents in the dollar. This has been the effect of excessive bank capital.—[A gentleman from Maryland corrected Mr. BURWELL, by stating that the failures had exceeded in the aggregate the sum he had mentioned, but in no single instance had the loss to creditors exceeded $600,000—I stand corrected. Only six hundred thousand dollars! Why, sir, this moderate sum would ruin a whole county if it had fallen upon the farmers. If the apprehensions of the public should coerce you to renew the charter at this time, I shall consider it perpetual. The same means which secured it now will not be forgotten, or neglected hereafter. You may rest assured the magic terror of bankruptcy will be revived when there is occasion. Perhaps the growing wealth of the people may hereafter raise them above the control of the bank, with ten millions capital, but if you should unfortunately adopt the favorite project of some, to establish a grand National Bank with a capital stock equal to thirty millions of dollars; if afterwards you keep pace with the growth of the nation, you may indeed despair of all control over it in future. It will become so interwoven with the fiscal transactions of society, and so intimately blended with the existence of the Government, that their duration will be coequal. The dangerous power of a bank extended over the Continent, with a capital which would necessarily embrace in its funds all the individuals of wealth and influence, would produce the same effect with a national debt to that amount; and when you recollect that this machine will be controlled and managed by the Executive branch of the Government you cannot but feel the most serious apprehension of the consequences. Sir, I do not discuss this question with party feelings; I look forward to the time when the bank and Government will feel in unison, and act in concert. The opposition of the bank is temporary, and will soon yield to its obvious interest. It is that period to which my fears are directed. Who can doubt that the present misunderstanding is the result of momentary causes? Yes, sir, the quarrel is an unnatural one, explanations will take place, reconciliation will ensue, and then we may deplore their intimate friendship infinitely more than their hostility now.

Banks are commercial institutions; the first impulse of their nature is to make money and support the power which can promote their profits; the individuals concerned in them will feel political passions, and may indulge them, but they will learn from experience the wisdom of suppressing their passions when they hazard the loss of profit and patronage. I have, therefore, felt no disposition to know anything about the directors, or to hear the instances of political intolerance and individual favoritism. It would be silly to found our views of the tendency of such an institution upon its conduct during a particular period. I am against giving any set of men such exorbitant power over the persons and property of the community; I am opposed to a moneyed aristocracy, which can hunt down whoever may be offensive to them, and not from hostility to the particular persons who now compose the bank. Sir, the time may arrive when the Government may fall into the hands of men whose policy, in my estimation, leads to the destruction of the Constitution, and the corruption of public virtue. Would you wish to see such men bolstered up by the influence of a National Bank? Would you be satisfied to see the good sense of the country hoodwinked by money influence? A corporation, possessed of such ample funds, could control presses or establish them to support the most iniquitous men, and advocate the most detestable principles. You should bear in mind that this influence cuts both ways, and it is better to leave public opinion unfettered, trusting to the sound sense and discretion of the people, free from the operation of all extraneous power.

What would the world say if you should demolish this bank to create another? Is there a man in the community who would not condemn you, and justly reprobate a policy so short-sighted and selfish? Such conduct would give full scope to swindling and speculation, and scenes which stain with shame the history of this Republic would be renewed. Sir, the system of paper credit, against which I have entered my protest, and to which I attribute the artificial and insecure state of this country, deserves nothing from you. You need not violate the Constitution to preserve and extend it; without your fostering care, enough will remain to alarm those who prefer solid wealth to the mere appearance of it; although those who think the wealth of a nation can be augmented by printing a few reams of paper will be dissatisfied; they exult in the deception and premature prosperity which flows from public delusion, and will be overthrown the first moment your real condition may be tested by difficulties. I, sir, have been accustomed to think the wealth of a nation consisted in its productive labor, and its capital could be safely augmented only in the ratio of the difference between its consumption and productive labor. This is the true mode of acquiring capital, the process will be slow, but the advance will be permanent. It will depend upon principles of economy, industry, and steady exertions; it is incompatible with prodigality, speculation, and profligate acquisition of wealth. Virtue is the basis of one, delusion and imposture of the other. A people thus situated, steadily exerting its powers, will furnish ample means to procure circulating medium, and prudent habits will add to it with sufficient rapidity. I have always preferred being a happy to a splendid nation. Sir, I have now closed my remarks; the particular situation assigned to me by the House in relation to this subject has compelled me to state the extent of my objections to the bill. I have carefully refrained from expressions which could wound the feelings, or impeach the motives of those who differ from me in opinion. I have no disposition to say anything about the transactions of the bank—they are all unknown to me, and I care nothing about them. My conscientious belief is, that the law was unconstitutional, and I sincerely trust we shall destroy what has so long defaced its original purity, close up the breach which has been made, and cement it by a vote upon principle. I confess the consolation I shall feel in the success of my motion will be greatly diminished if it obtains by the intervention of other motives.

When Mr. B. had concluded, the Committee rose and reported progress; and the House adjourned at a little past four o'clock.

TUESDAY, January 17.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Ebenezer Rollins," was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a further report of the Comptroller of the Treasury of unsettled balances; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. SEYBERT,

Resolved, That the joint committee appointed by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, respecting the Library belonging to Congress, be directed to inquire into the expediency of making provision for the permanent safe-keeping of the books.

Mr. JENNINGS, from the committee appointed, on the fifth instant, to inquire into the expediency of opening a road from Vincennes, towards Dayton, in Ohio, made a report; which was read, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the bill to authorize the laying out of a public road, from the line established by the Treaty of Greenville, to North Bend, in the State of Ohio.

The report is as follows:

That the opening of such a road was contemplated by Congress in the act passed April, 1806; but the moneys appropriated for that, and similar purposes, have been found insufficient to accomplish the desired objects.

That the opening of the contemplated road would certainly expedite the sales of public lands, inasmuch, that the Government would shortly be remunerated from that source for necessary expenditure, independent of the general advantage to be derived from an addition to the number of our public roads.

That it will be found the most direct course from Pittsburg to Vincennes and St. Louis, and will no doubt become the chief post route to the Territories northwest of the rivers Ohio and Mississippi, from the seat of Government of the United States, by way of the seat of Government of the State of Ohio. The committee, therefore, beg leave to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is expedient to cause to be opened a road from Vincennes, or from some point on the road leading from Vincennes to the falls of Ohio, to the eastern boundary of Indiana Territory, in a proper direction, towards Dayton, in the State of Ohio.

Mr. EPPES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, presented a bill making appropriations for the support of Government, for the year 1811; which was received, and read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

Mr. EPPES, from the same committee, also presented a bill making appropriations for the support of the Military Establishment, for the year 1811; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Saturday next.

Mr. EPPES, from the same committee, also presented a bill making appropriations for the support of the Navy of the United States, for the year 1811; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Saturday next.

On motion of Mr. GOLD,

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of providing, by law, for the more convenient taking of recognisances of bail and affidavits in causes depending in the respective courts of the United States; and that they have leave to report by bill.

Mr. GOLD, Mr. VAN DYKE, Mr. GHOLSON, Mr. WHITEHILL, and Mr. RHEA, of Tennessee, were appointed the said committee.

Mr. JOHNSON, from the committee appointed on the twenty-sixth ultimo, presented a bill for establishing trading houses with the Indian tribes; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Saturday next.

Mr. FINDLEY presented a petition of Arthur St. Clair, late a Major General in the Revolutionary Army, praying that his claim for moneys advanced while in that station may be re-examined, and that he may be allowed the full amount of the money so advanced, anything in an act of the last session, for his relief, to the contrary notwithstanding.—Referred to a select committee.

Mr. CLAY, Mr. MCBRYDE, Mr. HALE, Mr. NEWBOLD, and Mr. NICHOLSON, were appointed the committee.

Mr. HAVEN introduced the following resolution, with some remarks on the frequency with which cases pending before the courts of the United States of prosecutions for violation of the embargo and non-intercourse laws were decided against the United States, and the ill effects which such frequent failures must have on the community, creating a disrespect for the laws, &c.:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to lay before this House such information as he may have respecting the prosecutions which have been commenced in the respective district courts, for supposed violation of the several embargo and non-intercourse laws, and what sums—particularly specifying those which have been brought to final issue as well as those now pending; stating also the expenses incurred by the United States in the several and respective prosecutions, and the amount of forfeitures and penalties recovered; and that portion of them for which the United States have, or may have credit at the Treasury.

This resolution was agreed to—ayes 42, noes 32.

Mr. VAN HORN, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, presented a bill making an appropriation for building a jail in Alexandria county, in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; which was twice read, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

Memorial of Captain Tingey.

H. OF R.

On motion of Mr. PITKIN,

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of altering the times of holding the circuit court in the districts of New York, Connecticut, and Vermont; and that they report by bill, or otherwise.

Mr. PITKIN, Mr. GOODWYN, and Mr. ROBERT BROWN, were appointed the said committee.

THE SPEAKER observed that he was informed that the Secretary to the President of the United States was in waiting, with a confidential message.

On motion of Mr. SOUTHARD, the galleries were cleared, and the doors closed. They were, after a few minutes, again opened.

MEMORIAL OF CAPTAIN TINGEY.

Mr. BASSETT presented the following memorial:

To the honorable the House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

The memorial of Thomas Tingey, Captain in the Navy of the United States, and Commandant of the Navy Yard, Washington, respectfully sheweth:

That during the last Summer, sundry publications were circulated through the medium of a newspaper printed in this city, entitled "The Spirit of Seventy-six," signed by a certain "Joseph B. Parsons," and also by an anonymous writer under the signature of "An inhabitant of F street," tending to induce a belief in the public mind that your memorialist had been guilty of sundry acts, whereby the public interest had been wilfully prostrated for his personal benefit, together with insinuations of other acts of dereliction of his duty in the public service, also to the prejudice of the interest of the public.

Your memorialist, therefore, conscious of rectitude in all his intentions, and of the strictest integrity in all his transactions on account of the public, during the whole time he has had the honor of being in their service, respectfully hopes that your honorable House will direct a thorough investigation into his conduct in such manner as in your wisdom shall be deemed just and proper.

Your memorialist forbears to trouble you with an enumeration of the causes which have delayed the presentation of his memorial, or with any of the documents on which he founds his request, believing they may be with more propriety submitted hereafter in detail to those to whom your honorable body may commit the desired investigation, should you deem it proper to honor his memorial with your notice.

THOMAS TINGEY.

NAVY YARD, WASHINGTON, Jan. 14, 1811.

Various motions were made in relation to this petition.

Mr. JOHNSON was in favor of referring the letter for inquiry. He thought the House had power to inquire into the conduct of any officer of the Government.

Mr. LOVE conceived this to be a subject with which the House had nothing to do, and was therefore in favor of giving the petitioner leave to withdraw his petition.

Mr. SMILIE said it was an extraordinary piece of business, with which the House had nothing to do. He could not sanction the doctrine as to the powers of this House, under which they had already entered into an investigation of the conduct of a Brigadier General of the Army.

Mr. NEWTON thought the subject had been introduced too late in the season for them to act on it, if they were disposed to do so. But, he said, he was too well acquainted with committees of inquiry to be too liberal in their use. They ought only to be applied to culprits of the first grade, and not to the investigation of the conduct of every officer who chose to apply for an inquiry by the House.

Mr. FISK proposed a resolution for appointing a committee to inquire generally into the state of the navy yard at Washington, but subsequently withdrew it.

Mr. WRIGHT was opposed to entertaining the petition in any manner, or giving the least reason to believe that they would interfere with it.

Mr. PICKMAN moved that the petitioner have leave to withdraw his memorial.

Mr. LOVE moved to amend the motion so as to read as follows: Resolved, That the petition of Thomas Tingey contains matter not proper for the investigation of this House, and that the petitioner have leave to withdraw his petition.

Mr. SHERREY was opposed to the amendment. He said it stated what was not true in fact. What were the allegations on which this memorial was founded? Peculation in the public treasure was alleged; and would the gentleman say the House had not authority to inquire into it? Had not the House, in opposition to all such arguments, pronounced a determination to inquire into the conduct of an officer whom they could not impeach? Mr. S. said it was not correct to say that this House had not a right to inquire into the frauds on the public Treasury—into the pilferings of the hard earnings of the people. While he believed this to be a proper construction of the authority of the House, he would never interfere to inquire into the improper conduct of any officer of the Government on his own mere motion. He hoped the House would on this occasion do what was necessary and proper, and would not travel out of the record to pass an abstract resolution. He hoped the amendment would not be agreed to, because it would be unnecessary and untrue in point of fact. The House had already settled the principle that it had a right to inquire.

Mr. LOVE asked if it was not agreed on all hands that this matter was improper for the House to inquire into? If so, what objection could there be to putting it on record? What was there "abstract" in this proposition? If there was, it was merely whether Congress, a body of representatives met to legislate on public business, had a right to entertain the complaints of petty officers, or to notice all the slanders which found their way into newspapers. If this resolution were passed, it would prevent a waste of time on future similar applications. The gentleman had asked whether Congress had not a power to inquire into fraud or peculation. Mr. L. doubted much whether they had a power to inquire by bringing the officer before them. Were they to be occupied in considering the complaints of every petty officer, as low as a corporal or sergeant? The head of the department was the proper organ for reforming abuses; and he was amenable to Congress.

Mr. PICKMAN said it would not be proper to adopt the amendment proposed, without laying the whole memorial on the journals; which was unusual. Different reasons had been urged by different gentlemen for not acting on the subject; and it would be most proper and most consistent with the usual course of proceeding, simply to give leave to withdraw the petition.

Mr. BACON said the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. LOVE) would accomplish a great point indeed, if he could at this short notice induce the House to reverse a decision they had so lately made. Mr. B. contended it was lawful for the House to investigate such matters; but it did not follow that it was always expedient to do so. In cases of great public concern, as in the case of General Wilkinson, it might be proper, but it did not follow that the malversation of every petty officer was to become a subject of inquiry. There was no occasion to assign on the journals any reason why the petition should be withdrawn, and he was, therefore, against the amendment.

Mr. NEWTON said that the House had settled it as a principle that it was a grand court of inquest for this nation; and whenever they thought proper to exercise this power over any officer, they had a right so to do, and he hoped in God they always would do it. But if they commenced inquiry into the conduct of every navy agent, &c., there would never be an end to business of this sort. They could neither do the nation or the individuals justice. He hoped they would not, by agreeing to the amendment, deny the Constitutional power of the House, but would give the petitioner leave to withdraw his papers.

Mr. McKIM said he was decidedly in favor of inserting the words proposed as an amendment, viz: that the memorial contained matter not proper to be inquired into by the House. It was the most appropriate expression that could have been employed. What was the object of the memorialist? A justification of his own private reputation; which is alleged to have been traduced in a newspaper, and by private characters. Mr. McK. asked, are not the laws open to him? Why not resort to them? Why bring the subject before the National Legislature, when he has so good a remedy before another tribunal? In fact Mr. McK. said he was disposed to have a general inquiry into this subject, but he doubted the expediency of commencing it at this period of the session. But, above all, he was opposed to founding any inquiry on a petition of this nature.

Mr. LOVE said he found his amendment in a very singular position; that some of his friends were very much in favor of it, but embarrassed by a decision they had already made on the case of General Wilkinson. To relieve them from this awkward dilemma, he withdrew his proposed amendment.

It was then resolved that the memorialist have leave to withdraw his memorial.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for renewing the charter of the Bank of the United States—the motion for striking out the first section still under consideration.

Mr. FISK.—Mr. Chairman: I regret that we are called upon to vote for or against striking out the first section of this bill, at this time. I could have wished that, upon a bill of so much interest and importance, we could have proceeded to have filled the blanks, and made such amendments as would have obviated many objections which may be urged against it in its present form. I am not prepared to give my vote in favor of a renewal of the charter of the Bank of the United States, either upon the terms upon which it was originally granted, or in the manner contemplated by this bill; yet, upon conditions less objectionable, I should feel myself bound to vote in favor of a renewal. But the question presented upon this motion, is not upon what terms this charter shall be renewed, but whether it shall be renewed upon any terms, subject to any conditions Congress may impose.

In this view, I consider it the most important subject upon which this Congress will be required to act. It is determining a question which is connected with our finances, with the circulating medium of the country, and with our agricultural, commercial, and manufacturing interests; and, as such, it cannot but be interesting to every class of our citizens.

The interests and prosperity of the United States are not only intimately, but inseparably, connected with trade. The market of the farmer depends greatly upon the merchant and the shipper. And the price and demand of every article of produce is in a great degree regulated by the difficulties or facilities of payment. Let the difficulty of paying be increased, and the price of produce immediately falls; for the demand for exportation becomes very limited, the markets are overstocked, and prices reduced. Any sudden check to our commerce, whether produced by our own municipal regulations, or the outrages of foreign Powers, checks the market and the price of produce; so that not only the merchants, but the farmers feel its effects. I scarcely need recur to the history of the times when trade was principally suspended in this country, to show how severely the suspension operated upon every class of our citizens, and in every part of the country. This period in our political annals will be long remembered. So great was the distress in some States, and agricultural States, too, that their Legislatures deemed it necessary, for the protection of the debtor from the power of his creditor, to stay the administration of justice, and prohibit by statute the issuing of an execution for the collection of any debt.

This proves the connexion which subsists between the two great agricultural and commercial interests of this country. Agriculture, commerce, and manufactures constitute the source of our wealth, revenue, and prosperity. To foster and cherish the principles upon which rest our existing hopes and future prospects, can never be a question of doubtful policy with a wise and patriotic legislature.

We have seen that commerce is essential to our interests; but commerce will not flourish without credit. It never has prospered independent of credit. As credit is essential to trade, so is punctuality to support credit. Look at the business of any commercial people, and see how much of it is done upon credit; and see the integrity and fidelity with which punctuality is maintained in order to support their credit.

For several centuries past, banks have been the successful medium through which credit has not only been preserved, but great wealth acquired. This assertion is warranted by the history of these institutions, and of the countries where they have been patronized. The first bank established in Europe, was at Genoa, in 1407—four hundred and four years ago; this was soon followed by one at Venice.

The Bank of Amsterdam was established in 1609, and shortly after those of Hamburg and Rotterdam; and the Bank of England in 1694; the Royal Bank at Paris in 1718; the Bank of North America in 1784—a memorable period in our history—and the Bank of the United States in 1791.

All these different institutions show, that enlightened legislators have entertained but one opinion upon this subject both in Europe and America for the last four hundred years. They have seen and acknowledged their utility. Banks have long since been considered not only essentially useful in the transaction of commercial concerns, but as highly necessary to aid the fiscal operations of Government. And a more unanswerable argument cannot be urged in favor of their general utility than their uniform success; to this may be added the prosperity of the people and the countries where banks have been supported. Their immediate advantages are, a convenient circulating medium; the safe depositary they afford for cash and funds. And they serve to keep the standard of money steady and correct; to insure punctuality; to preserve credit; to inspire confidence, and to promote a spirit of industry and enterprise. They are not, as many have supposed, in their nature hostile to Government and dangerous to liberty. They rather form a barrier to tyranny and oppression. Their principal business is to lend money at the common rate of interest, and thus prevent usury. The owners of banks are generally rich men, who have not only their personal liberty, but a large property to risk, by sedition, treason, and rebellion. It is their interest to resist oppression. We need scarcely point to the continent of Europe for proof of the fact, when we assert, that trade and banks cannot flourish where despotism prevails. Despot power generally ruins trade and banks, but no instance occurs in history where banks, not under the control of government have ruined a State. A bank owned by Government, and under its command, would be an engine dangerous to the people. But when owned by individuals, neither the people nor the Government have anything to fear from it. It is then dependent on both for its business, prosperity, and usefulness.

With the evidence which both history and experience offers to our reflection, we cannot doubt the utility of banks, nor deny but that they have been beneficial to us. And we are justified in the conclusion, that, under proper regulations, they may subserve the best interests of the people of the United States. They are now in successful operation in almost every State in the Union, and that they have been useful, the present prosperous state of the country abundantly proves. We enjoy as perfect security for life, liberty, and property, as any people under any government ever did. These are the great objects of a good government. And we may triumphantly ask, where is the nation or people that enjoy these with more freedom and safety than the American people? A parallel for our liberty and prosperity, for the last twenty years, is not to be found in the history of man. Our wealth, population, and resources, have increased beyond what any one would have calculated or imagined, and beyond what strangers and foreigners now believe. Industry, wealth, and contentment, pervade every quarter of our country, and poverty and oppression are unknown to our citizens.

In 1791, the year this bank was incorporated, our exports amounted to about eighteen millions of dollars; and in 1804, they had increased to about seventy-six millions, gaining in thirteen years fifty-eight millions; and our tonnage in about the same proportion.

Much of this prosperity is to be attributed to the active capital which has excited industry, and a spirit of enterprise among us, and the activity of this capital has been in a great degree created and promoted by the Bank of the United States. Its operations have been extensive in all our trading towns. It has aided in loans and discounts, and assisted in the collection, safe-keeping, and transmission of our revenues. It has been the depositary of our Treasury, and is now become incorporated with the administration of the fiscal department of our Government. The connexion which it has formed with almost every branch of business in the country, is not slight and trifling, and so easily to be severed as some seem to believe. Its operations are deeply interwoven with the dealings and concerns of all the men of business in the United States.

With a capital of ten millions, it has furnished accommodations of fifteen millions a year. This has been employed principally in trade; in making prompt and cash payments to our farmers for their produce. This, again, has furnished to our citizens a ready and profitable market for every article of produce. These high profits of a good market have gone into the hands of the farmer, to cultivate, improve, and enrich the country.

R. of R.

Bank of the United States.

JANUARY, 1811.

And travel through any State in the Union, and their effects may be readily seen, affording a prospect, consoling and elevating to the philanthropist and the patriot. The land is highly cultivated, good buildings, turnpike roads, bridges, and other expensive improvement, indicate the wealth of our citizens, and the prosperity of the country. Money has been freely circulated, trade has been active, produce high, and our country has been improved by these unexampled advantages to a degree far beyond what the most sanguine calculations, twenty years ago, could have anticipated. And yet, sir, we are gravely told, that this bank has nearly ruined the country; that it is threatening our best interests with destruction. As well might gentlemen tell us that total darkness prevails at noon-day, or that the sun, in his meridian splendor, affords neither light nor heat to any part of this globe.

The principal portion of the trade and business of the United States has been conducted by a paper medium; metallic has scarcely been seen. The amount of this circulating medium is, say fifty millions. Now what is proposed by denying a renewal of the United States' Bank charter? That this bank shall close its concerns, and of course stop all its accommodations. This must necessarily check and change at least one-third of the circulating medium of the country. It will undeniably require $24,000,000 to be directed to one operation, and for a time to one point—for the capital is $10,000,000; this is to be collected to divide among the stockholders. There are $19,000,000 due to the bank; this must be collected. This will occasion a demand for this amount from other sources; it must be paid. And the $5,000,000 in the bank makes the sum of $24,000,000, which must be suddenly called in. The effect this will have upon the various interests in the country can neither be described or conceived. It must inevitably give a general and heavy shock to all paper credit; this credit, so much and profitably in operation, must receive a severe, if not a mortal wound. And what substitute have we for this when it shall be destroyed? Silver and gold coin cannot be relied on. There is not from the best estimate an amount to exceed $10,000,000 specie in all our cities and trading towns, and this will be collected by this bank. The price of all stocks, and every kind of produce and species of property must suffer a great depression, for a scarcity of money enhances its value, and consequently depresses the value of every other species of property. That this sudden, if not total change in our system, must occasion great embarrassment, produce failures, disappointments, and distress, among our citizens, is certain.

To say the least of such a measure, is to term it an experiment which no well regulated State has ever dared to make, from the first institution of civilized society to the present time. Stronger governments than ours, in risking such an experiment, must insure their overthrow and ruin. Perhaps the good fortune of the American people is a sufficient guarantee against all the disastrous consequences which any other people might experience from such a measure. But I own, sir, I dare not incur by my vote the awful responsibility of this bold and untried experiment, unless compelled by the Constitution. This, in my most deliberate opinion, the Constitution does not require.

But the question of constitutionality I shall not at this time discuss. If it is a question which Congress may discuss and decide, it was discussed and deliberately decided at the time this charter was granted. The decision it then received has met with the general approbation of the States and of the people. Branches have been established in a number of the States, and the bills have circulated without opposition or difficulty in all. And counterfeiters of this paper are punishable for forgery by the statutes of the different States. For twenty years this institution has received the countenance and patronage of the Government. In this patronage there has been no difference in the several Administrations, unless that of the Republican Administration has been the most extensive. This bank has been employed by the Government to keep its treasure, to collect and transmit the revenue; and the Government, it will be recollected, originally owned two-fifths of the capital, which has been sold at a great advance. The United States owned $2,000,000, equal to five thousand shares. 2,493 shares were sold in 1796 and 1797. at an advance of 25 per cent. - - - $997,200

So that the United States gained $721,000, and of this $399,600 has been received by the Administration under Mr. Jefferson. This sale was sanctioned by a vote of the House of Representatives, although it was to a foreigner, an Englishman, Mr. Baring; and our Government gained, on this sale, $399,600. This conduct of the Government and of the then Republican majority of the House of Representatives did not evince any scruples about the constitutionality of the charter. If it was deemed unconstitutional and dangerous to the liberties and interests of the people, it was not for those who entertained this opinion to give it countenance and support. They ought rather to have taken measures to have checked and stopped its operations. And there is nothing in the argument that the faith of the Government was pledged for twenty years, and the law, although unconstitutional, could not have been repealed. For Congress cannot pledge the faith of Government by an unconstitutional law. If Congress should establish a monarchical government in any State or Territory, and by law guarantee it to the people for twenty years, would any one dare to contend that the faith of Government was pledged for twenty years, and this law could not be repealed? Certainly not. And why? Because such a law would be unconstitutional. It would be the duty of the Legislature to repeal it, because the members are sworn to support the Constitution? And how will gentlemen, who have been members of this House many years, and entertaining the opinion that this charter was a violation of the Constitution, and voting to approbate the sale of the bank stock, and for other measures to countenance its operation, and never attempting to rid the country of this monster, reconcile their conduct with their duty? It can only be reconciled by the conclusion that they did not question the constitutionality of the charter. This conclusion is warranted by the act of Congress, passed 16th of February, 1804—Laws United States, volume 7, page 87, in these words, entitled "An act supplementary to the act to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States:

"Bé it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President and Directors of the Bank of the United States shall be and they are hereby authorized to establish offices of discount and deposit, in any part of the territories or dependencies of the United States, in the manner and on the terms prescribed in the act to which this is a supplement."

If the original law was unconstitutional, this act extending the powers of the corporation was equally unconstitutional. This act was passed by a Republican Congress, who did not believe that the original charter was unconstitutional. It is but lately, very lately, that Constitutional difficulties have suggested themselves to some gentlemen. Even at this time, the Administration has no objection to the constitutionality of the measure. The report of the Secretary of the Treasury, the proper officer to speak the opinion of the Executive upon this question, is my authority for the assertion, that the Executive will have no Constitutional difficulties to encounter in passing a bill for the renewal of this charter. That report was made pursuant to a resolution of this House, and has been laid upon our tables. It states no objections to the renewal of the charter, but points out the advantages the Government have derived from this bank, and hereafter may derive, if it shall be continued. How is it that this report of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, upon a question of financial economy, is not respected as were his reports in former times? Has he lost his talents at calculation? Does he tell unwelcome truths, or is there something "rotten in Denmark?" Great exertions have been made to excite sensibilities and clamor against the renewal of this charter. The money changers, stock brokers, and speculators, vultures that prey upon the vitals of the community, have been flying through the country, denouncing all who should express or entertain an opinion in favor of the measure. But, I trust, we are not yet arrived to that period in the history of our Government, when Congress must legislate under the hissings of the gallery, or the denunciations of prostituted or misguided presses. If we are, sir, we may bid adieu to our liberties. Unawed by these vaticinations, it becomes us to examine patiently, and decide deliberately, this great question presented to our consideration for decision.

In examining this question, we are naturally led to inquire, Is an institution of this nature, in the present state of our country, necessary—is it proper? And, in pursuing this inquiry, let me recur to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, and see if the aid of this institution is required in the administration of the financial department of the Government. Will not his experience enable him to answer the question correctly? To what better authority shall we resort? What are the principal duties of the Treasury Department? The collection, safe-keeping, transmission, and disbursement of public moneys. For performing all these duties, this bank has been the efficient and faithful agent. In twenty years past, it has collected and disbursed, at its own risk, not less than $100,000,000 public moneys—if you allow the revenue to have averaged $5,000,000 a year, it would amount to this sum received in; and same amount transmitted and disbursed amounts to $200,000,000 in twenty years. Having a greater capital than any other company in the country, the public money is more secure with this company than any other. It then assists essentially in the safe-keeping of the money, and this, the report tells us, is one of its advantages to the Government. But its more essential assistance to the Government is in the collection and transmission of the revenue at its own risk. Our revenues are secured by bonds, and these bonds are payable at this bank and its branches, in the different ports of collection. They are accordingly lodged in the bank for payment, and, when due, they must be punctually paid, or the debtor loses his credit at the bank, and, of course, in the commercial world. Hence, every exertion is made to pay at the time the bond becomes due; and hence our revenue has been paid with such scrupulous punctuality, and so few losses. And, is it not an object of magnitude, that we provide for the safe and sure collection of our revenues, which, in prosperous years, may amount to eighteen or twenty millions of dollars?

Put down this bank, and how then are your revenues to be collected? Through the medium of the State banks? You do what no prudent man, in his individual concerns, would think of doing. You discard a faithful, honest, responsible agent, whose integrity and fidelity you have known for twenty years, and you place your estate in the hands and at the disposal of twenty or thirty entire strangers, of whose character and responsibility you know nothing, nor have the means of acquiring any knowledge, and over whose conduct you have no control. Should an individual act thus with his property, he would be deemed to have lost all regard for it, if not considered a madman. In resorting to the State banks, we are offering the amount of our revenue as a bounty for intrigues, cabals, and factions through the country. In almost every State there are a number of banks, and each will endeavor to get the revenue collected in that State, to keep and trade with. It must be given to one, or divided among them all. If one is selected as the favorite, all the rest become jealous, dissatisfied, and exert their capital and influence against the favorite bank and its patron, the Government. This will awaken a spirit of faction in every State yet unknown in this country. If all are to be gratified in their request for the deposites, the Government must open separate accounts with all the different banks in the country, to the amount of fifty or sixty; and new companies will be formed, and new applicants request to divide the business and share the profits. Indeed, there will be no end to the scenes of speculation and intrigue, which will soon appear, if this course is adopted by the Government.

Again: the Government have no means of ascertaining the system or principles upon which these different banks conduct their business; they are creatures of the States, and in no way answerable to the General Government. The Treasury cannot inspect their books, nor ascertain their funds; of course we must be ignorant of their responsibility. And yet we are to deposit moneys in their hands, to five or ten times the amount of their capital. But few of the State banks have a capital beyond a million. In New York and Boston, the revenue deposites may amount to five or six millions a year; and are we to intrust this with a corporation, which, if it failed, would not pay more than a fifth part of it? Besides, you may not be able to command these moneys when required, if left with those over whom you have no power. It is possible some of these State institutions may be hostile to your Government; they may refuse payment, and this refusal be supported by the State. Shall we place our public treasure under the control of States which can order out their militia to oppose and resist the execution of our laws, or refuse their aid to enforce them?

But, suppose the revenue collected and safely kept by these different banks, how is it to be safely and speedily transmitted to different parts of the Union to answer the demands of Government, and at whose risk and expense? Can the opponents of this bill obviate this difficulty? It is a difficulty of a two-fold nature, first in finding a safe mode of conveyance, and, secondly, a convenient medium to transmit. Specie cannot be procured; and what State bank bills, if sent, would pass current in every part of the United States, as the bills of this bank do? Carolina and Kentucky bills are unknown, and would not pass in New York and Boston; and New York bills would not pass in Kentucky or Carolina. New England bills do not pass in New York but at a considerable discount. But, under the present system, if Government have five millions deposited in Boston, and it is required to be paid at New Orleans, a draft is given by the branch in Boston, upon that in New Orleans, and the money is paid at the latter place as soon as the mail can travel there.

Again: if the Government is to take the risk of collecting and distributing the revenue, let us inquire, what this can be done for? The revenue amounts to, say ten millions dollars, collected and paid out annually; and allow one and a half per cent. for transmitting, as low a rate as it would be done for, and this, on twenty millions, amounts to six hundred thousand dollars a year, a sum equal to our civil list.

But another serious evil is to be encountered in putting down this bank—you deprive the country at once of a circulating medium. Silver and gold cannot be had—and what paper, but that of the United States' Bank, will pass current in every part of the Union? None. You can out-ride, in twenty-four hours, the credit of any other bank in the country. This evil will be most seriously felt in the interior. It will at once check emigration from the North and East to the West. For those who wish to remove will not be able to sell their property; it will fall essentially in value; and, if they should sell, coin not being in circulation, they could not procure any paper money which would pass current to pay the expenses of travelling from Massachusetts to Ohio and Tennessee; and if they should arrive there, they would have nothing to purchase land with. The sales of our land must stop for a time, at least until specie can be brought into circulation, for specie only is taken in payment; this comes now through banks—but the banks will require it all for their own support.

And will not the people inquire, why all this pressure and embarrassment? They certainly will. And will they be satisfied with the answer, that the bank was unconstitutional and could not therefore be continued? No; they will not believe it. They will justly reply, that this state of things ought to have been foreseen and provided for by their rulers, as it might have been. In the ten past years of peace, plenty, and prosperity, which we have experienced, instead of devising a system to take the place of the present bank on the 5th of March, what have the rulers done? They seem never to have once thought of the event that is now about to happen? By the acts of Government the country has, in a degree, been deprived of the capital which might have been here to meet the crisis. About thirty million dollars have been sent out of the country, and much of it in specie, to pay the public debt, when payment was not demanded. All internal taxes have been repealed, and reliance for revenue has been made on imposts and tonnage, which are now about to fail us, and that, too, when the Treasury is nearly exhausted. For, after paying the $2,750,000 to this bank, there will not remain much more than this amount in the Treasury. The revenue bonds outstanding, to the amount of about ten million dollars, will not, cannot, be paid if bank accommodations are to stop. Recourse must be had to loans, the last resort of empty purses and empty heads—and a press for money, and its high price, will render loans difficult to be effected, and subject the Government to a high rate of interest.

These considerations suggest to us the imperious necessity of continuing the operations of this bank, under such restrictions as may be deemed most advisable, and thus to keep in motion the present system of credit, and support the existing principles of doing business throughout the country.

And what are the reasons for refusing a renewal of this charter? Let them be examined, and, unless they are solid and substantial, let them not prevail. One reason assigned is, that it employs a foreign capital, which is injurious to our country.

This is not an objection of any weight; and, if it were, have Congress the power to prohibit the employment of foreign capital in the United States? If we prevent it from being employed in this bank it may go into the State banks, or take any other direction, not prohibited by the Constitution or laws of the country. But it has ever been the liberal policy of this Government to invite foreign capital, and foreigners, to come among us.

Gentlemen seem to consider that portion of this stock, held by foreigners, as having no other connexion with our own citizens than compelling them to pay eight per cent. per annum interest for it.

Let us, for a moment, see how this money, to the amount of seven millions two hundred thousand dollars, owned by foreigners, is employed, and the objection urged on this ground must vanish. It will not be denied but that it is used in trade. And it is wanted here to make cash payments for shipments made to Europe. This enables the American merchant to make prompt payment for the goods he imports from Europe, by which he obtains them, say eight per cent. below the credit price, while he, instead of obtaining this credit in Europe, obtains it at the bank for six per cent. Here, then, is a difference of two per cent. in favor of the American merchant. This, on seven millions two hundred thousand dollars, amounts to one hundred and forty-four thousand dollars a year—in twenty years, to two millions eight hundred and eighty thousand dollars. This is one item saved in retaining this capital in this institution—and $1,200,000, the sum to be paid by those stockholders for the privilege of continuing their capital in this bank, is another item—and another, larger than either of these, is the advance upon the stock proposed to be subscribed by the United States, which may be estimated at $2,000,000. These together, amounted to $6,080,000, which the Government and citizens of this country will receive by passing this bill. So far, this would be raising a revenue, and not liable to any Constitutional objection.

But, it is said, this capital has an influence upon elections unfriendly to liberty. Whatever may have formerly been the political influence of this institution, the competition of banking business has long since rendered it harmless as a political engine. But, while gentlemen complain of its accommodations being partial, they propose the singular remedy of destroying them entirely; because it has committed the fault of not accommodating everybody, it must now cease to accommodate anybody.

If we have not too much capital, our citizens will find a profitable use for this. That this is wanted and engaged in business is incontestably proved by the dividends which this bank has made, of eight and nine per cent. profit. If the charter shall expire on the 4th of March, this ten million dollars capital, which may and probably will be collected in specie, will be again thrown into circulation here or sent out of the country.

Suppose it retained here, what are we to gain or lose by the experiment?

The scarcity of specie consequent to this operation, will appreciate its value, and, in like proportion, depreciate the price of every other kind of property—say thirty per cent. These foreign stockholders, having seven millions two hundred thousand dollars in specie, will be able to speculate on the distresses of your own citizens. They will be the gainers, we the losers. If they can make by the bargain, as they undoubtedly may, thirty per cent.—this, on seven million two hundred thousand dollars, would amount to two millions one hundred and sixty thousand dollars, which, added to the present capital, would be nine millions three hundred and sixty thousand dollars. This amount, vested in any other bank stock, or valuable property, would continue to yield them eight per cent. profit annually. This, on nine millions three hundred and sixty thousand dollars, amounts to seven hundred and forty-four thousand eight hundred dollars a year—one hundred and sixty-eight thousand eight hundred dollars more, in a year, than they would receive by continuing their capital in this bank. It is evident that a refusal to renew the charter of the Bank of the United States will not prevent the use of foreign capital among us, as has been urged by gentlemen opposed to a renewal. I do not allude to the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. BURWELL,) he does not consider it an objection that so much of this stock is owned by foreigners. But, let us, for a moment, suppose that, on a dissolution of this bank, this capital goes out of the country; it is owned by proprietors who reside in England, where bullion is fifteen per cent. above their paper currency, and if this seven millions two hundred thousand dollars should be sent to Europe, it would drain nearly all the specie from the country. Unless it can be employed here to more advantage, it will, as an article of merchandise, leave the country for a better market. But it will, at any rate, be in the hands of those who may not, after the refusal to renew the charter, feel very solicitous to aid the operations of your Government, or relieve the distresses of the people, by sending this specie into circulation among us. We should require strong arguments, indeed, to induce us to adopt a measure which may at once drive out of the country, or lock up, so large a portion of the specie capital. Whether it goes out of the country, or remains for a year inactive here, the effect upon the community will be the same. The great demand and high price of specie will depress the price of every kind of stock and every species of property; our wheat, cotton, hemp, tobacco, and every article of produce, must suffer a depression of at least ten per cent., perhaps not find a market at any price. The nation will be subjected at once to the loss of a sum at least equal to the amount of the whole capital of this bank. For the amount of produce and merchandise in the country may be estimated at one hundred millions dollars; a loss of ten per cent. would be ten millions dollars, a sum equal to our revenues for one year. By whom is this loss to be sustained? By the merchants? No; it will fall upon the farmers, the manufacturers, and mechanics; your rich moneyed capitalists are safe—nay, they are the only men who will profit by such a state of confusion and distress.

When I advocate a continuance of the present system, I advocate the interest of the farmer, the mechanic, and even the laborer, who alone must suffer most severely, by the experiment of breaking up this bank and your present system of paper credit. Of this we may all be convinced when too late to remedy the evil. The effect it may produce may be entirely different from what the opponents to this bill now believe. Instead of a blessing, it may prove a scourge and a curse to the country. Politicians, we all know, are liable to err in their calculations, and often mistake the real bearing and effect of their measures upon the community. The Turkish Government once devised and adopted an infallible expedient, as the rulers believed, to prevent a scarcity of corn, by prohibiting the exportation of this article. But the consequence of this favorite measure was a famine, want, and calamity, instead of plenty and happiness.

And are gentlemen, who are opposed to the renewal of this charter, quite sure what will be the consequence of stopping at once the operations of this bank? I apprehend not. They all admit it will, for a time, occasion some embarrassment to our citizens and our Treasury, but they differ as to the extent of the evil, and tell us that all the calamity is to be far outweighed by the blessings which are to follow; and among other blessings which are to result, is the check which is to be given to trade. We are told that there is too much credit, and too much trade, that failures are continually occurring, and that although the merchant fail, the farmer bears the loss. A single glance at the manner of transacting business in our commercial towns must convince any gentleman that when a merchant stops payment, he is seldom indebted to the farmer. His credit contracts are with the banks and merchants in town: instead of purchasing produce from the farmer upon credit, the merchant obtains a credit at the bank, procures bills, and is in this way able to purchase from the farmer for ready money; and if the merchant fails, his creditors in town, not in the country, are generally the sufferers. By lessening or destroying bank accommodation, you transfer the credit from the city to the country. Then if a merchant should fail, his creditors in the country, the farmers, would suffer. Should this be the effect of putting down this bank, the agriculturist who now sells his wheat, hemp, cotton, and tobacco, for cash, will be compelled to sell upon credit, and take the risk of failure from the banks and merchants to himself. Is this the manner in which trade is to be lessened by stopping bank credit?

But it has been urged that we have too much paper in circulation. Admit it. The destruction of this bank will increase, not diminish, the quantity of circulating bank paper; and I consider the embarrassment which must immediately follow the closing of the concerns of this institution as the least of the evils the community will experience from a refusal to renew the charter. Congress may indeed prevent the operation of this bank after the 4th of March, but Congress can neither prevent a spirit of trade, nor subdue the passion for speculation. For, while we are debating the expediency of destroying this bank, in order to free the country from the mischiefs of an extended bank credit, we find new banks springing into existence in every direction. We have no less than five bills now on our table for incorporating this number of banks in this ten-mile-square District. And the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. BURWELL) has told us that these applications are an evidence of capital or of corruption, but I consider them rather as evidence of the destroying spirit of speculation, which threatens to stand upon the ruins of the United States' Bank till the country shall be overwhelmed with new emissions of paper from these new manufactories. The banks established by the State Legislatures will scramble for the privilege of filling the chasm to be made by the destruction of the Bank of the United States. Already are they preparing for the patriotic endeavor. Our State Legislatures are to be importuned to become bank jobbers and joint undertakers and copartners in the enterprise. The profits are to furnish revenues sufficient to satisfy both avarice and ambition. Notwithstanding the provision in the Constitution, that no State shall "emit bills of credit," we find almost every State in the Union interested in banks, authorizing corporations to issue bank bills, which, so far as they exceed the capital upon which they are issued, are in the nature of bills of credit. Several States own stock in these banks, and, as such stockholders, are responsible for the payment of these bills. Pennsylvania, Virginia, and Vermont, are large stockholders in their State banks; New York and North Carolina have also an interest in some of their banks. The States cannot be restrained, nor is it to be wished that they should be prohibited altogether from incorporating banks. But what difficulties are we to experience in resorting to these numerous and conflicting institutions for the collection, safe-keeping, and transmission of our revenues? The deposits of the Government will render banking profitable to the favorite bank that receives them. The aid of the Government will make this bank superior in funds and credit to any of the others which do not share this solid patronage. This will produce jealousies and collisions of interests between banks in the same State, and thus form cabals against the State and General Governments. It will not stop here, but will extend from State to State. If the States and State banks are to regulate trade in the article of paper money, they may prescribe the terms. To give the preference to their own paper, they may exclude that of any other State from circulation among them, in the same way that the paper of unincorporated banks is excluded by some States, and bills of a certain amount from others.

The great commercial States will have in their power the paper of the small and agricultural States. For where there is most trade, there the most current bills will be the most valuable. The bills of New York and Pennsylvania, from the great trade and frequent intercourse between their capital cities, would be in greater demand than any other; the bills of either State would pass current in the other, and this would give them a credit and currency superior to all other bills. They would, of course, drive the others out of the market. And, sir, it is possible that other banks may attempt to make up in the quantity of their paper the deficiency in its quality and credit, and all may overtrade their capital, discount far beyond their funds, until a general depreciation of their paper shall produce general failure, and universal distrust in all paper credit. It is the duty of the Government, if in their power, to avert such a state of confusion; to protect and preserve the country from such complicated ruin. But we are about to invite and precipitate this destruction by throwing away the only means we possess to prevent it. Stop this bank, and what check is there then to limit the discount of all other banks? They may issue paper to any amount, and without funds to redeem it. There may, and very probably will be, a common interest and feeling among them to uphold each other, until all shall deem it advisable to fall. Hitherto the Bank of the United States, by its large capital, and the amount of its specie always on hand, has confined the discounts of other banks to certain limits, and compelled them to observe some proportion between their loans and actual funds. And in this way it has served as a barometer to ascertain the credit of other banks, as a regulator to keep them within such bounds as might be safe to the community. But take away this regulator, and the other banks may go on without fear or restraint to loan millions, without having a dollar in their vaults, until all will be reduced to bankruptcy, as we have already witnessed, in some parts of New England. We have been told by gentlemen that this bank has been the cause of the excess of bank paper, which has prevailed in some of the Eastern States. This I deny. What has been the conduct of banks in that quarter? A considerable number of banks were established in the interior of Massachusetts and New Hampshire. And they went on to issue their bills to a great amount, without regard to their actual funds, and without any specie to redeem them. And had these bills circulated only in places where banks were conducted in a manner equally loose and unprincipled, the imposition would not have been readily detected; but when these bills appeared at the branch bank of the United States, their real value was tested; they were returned, and the system of banking without specie or capital was broken up and destroyed. It will hardly be contended that our revenues would have been perfectly secure in these banks. And what assurance have we that they will be more safe in the others? The Government of the United States cannot limit their discounts, inspect their books, or ascertain the state of their funds, or the principles upon which they act. It never can be seriously insisted, that it would be advisable to deposite the public moneys in this manner. It would be offering the revenues of the Government as a bounty for bank factions and bank frauds. And why shall we be driven to make these dangerous, ruinous experiments? We experience no hardships, no real difficulties growing out of our present system. If we continue it, none are to be apprehended. We shall preserve a paper medium, well known and long approved; with which the people of this country are well satisfied. For not a single remonstrance has been offered against continuing the operations of this bank, while thousands of petitioners have solicited Congress to renew the charter. Nothing but considerations of the most imperious nature should induce Congress at this time to refuse a renewal of this charter, and thus compel the extensive moneyed operations of this company to stop at once. The situation of the country is at this period peculiarly unfavorable, if not unequal to such an operation. But a small amount of specie in circulation, and the course of exchange continually lessening the quantity, draining it from the country; a large portion of the merchants' property seized in Europe; our Treasury nearly exhausted; a non-importation about to be adopted; our revenue to be thus cut off; our Army and Navy expenditures to be increased; and, in this state of our national affairs, we are about to destroy all confidence in paper credit; to adopt a measure which must produce general disappointment, failures, and bankruptcy. However unconcerned and secure some gentlemen may feel about the consequences which may result from such a state of things, I cannot but contemplate them with the most fearful apprehension. Can the people extend their confidence to the wisdom and expediency of measures which, instead of promoting the general welfare, produce general distress? Why, sir, we seem to cherish as little regard for the opinions of the people as if they had nothing to do with the Government.

But the remedy for all the evils growing out of this breaking down measure, is to be found, we are told by some of its advocates, in the establishment of a new National Bank upon the ruins of this. The country is to be subjected to the spasms and throes of death and birth, at the same instant, in order to preserve, by this bold practice, its Constitution. This is a refinement in State quackery, which must prove fatal to the patient.

Are the advocates for a National Bank quite sure that they could obtain a law of Congress for its establishment, if the United States Bank were out of the question? I apprehend not. Many serious, if not insurmountable difficulties would be found to exist. When an increased demand for money should have rendered it scarce, it would illy comport with that discretion and intelligence which ought ever to distinguish the proceedings of Congress, to increase the scarcity of this article by enlarging the immediate demand for it. While $24,000,000 would be employed in closing the concerns of one bank, $30,000,000 are to be called for to commence the operations of another. This would be levying a requisition upon all the circulating medium of the country at once. It would create a demand which could not be satisfied. If this objection could be removed, there are others still stronger to be obviated. It would be found difficult to convince the States concerned in banks that their interests are to be promoted by a great rival bank, with a capital and ability equal to the management of all the banking business in the country. Will the great commercial States of Massachusetts, New York, and Pennsylvania, accede to this measure? They will not, unless they disregard all the profits they might derive by uniting to give credit and currency to the paper of their own banks; unless they neglect to improve the advantage they would in such case have over the other States. If some States now recommend to their Representatives to oppose a renewal of this charter, would they be less attentive to their own interests, and more sparing of their advice, when a National Bank should be attempted? No, sir; nor would their recommendations be less regarded than upon the present occasion. If a bank, with but $10,000,000 capital, has awakened State jealousies, and roused to action State interests against it, what are we to expect when a new bank of $30,000,000 should be proposed? That such an institution could be established without opposition? No; it could not succeed against the opposition it must and would encounter. Put down the Bank of the United States, and however essential an institution of the kind may be found, either to furnish a circulating medium which shall pass current throughout the United States, or aid in the administration of the finances, the Government will not have the power to establish it. A law for the purpose would never be sanctioned by a majority of both Houses of Congress. And if we cannot continue the present bank upon any terms, no other ought ever to be authorized by Congress. For to what a state of things might a new National Bank, with twenty or thirty millions capital, reduce the country at the expiration of twenty years from this time? Its stock might get into the hands of foreigners, or be owned by those who would be found in the opposition to the Administration; and, surely, this would furnish reasons as powerful for putting down the National Bank as the Bank of the United States. And the country would be compelled to submit to another general shock, and perhaps destruction, of paper credit. If we have not stability and discretion sufficient to continue and support such an institution, we most certainly should not undertake to establish it. For we are exposing the country to alternate affluence and penury—making experiments ruinous to the people and destructive to the Government.

Some gentlemen tell us that this corporation can close its concerns without occasioning any embarrassment in the community. If the trial is to be made, I most sincerely wish they may not be mistaken; but to me it appears utterly impracticable. The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. BURWELL) seems to think that the shock will be slight and scarcely perceivable; that this angry cloud will be disarmed by the conducting powers of the State banks. But can he assure us, that such will be the result from any actual experiments which have ever been made in this branch of philosophy? I believe not. And it is to be apprehended, that even if this cloud should disappear, clouds of discontent and faction will succeed, and may soon be seen hurrying and chasing each other over the political firmament of America, until the tempest comes on which shall close forever the prospect of our united strength and happiness.

The times are dangerous for national experiments. When we look around us we find the political passions of man rising to madness; long established Governments breaking up their strong foundations, and the world almost deluged with blood and warfare; we alone stand upon the narrow isthmus of peace and prosperity. And is it for us to complain; to be discontented with the pre-eminent happiness we enjoy; to hazard our present enviable condition upon the doubtful result of this great and sudden change in the administration of our national finances? No sir. It becomes us to beware of innovations; to weigh well the consequences of embracing any new system, or abandoning an old one. But, sir, I will not detain the Committee longer. I have already occupied more of their time than I intended; but a sense of duty has compelled me to state my opinion at length upon the important question before us. And if the charter of this bank is not to be renewed or continued upon any conditions, I am ready to hope that my apprehensions of the effects, that the refusal will produce in this community, may prove groundless; that the dissolution of this institution may not be the organizing of ruin to a considerable portion of the country.

Mr. SMILIE spoke a few minutes in reply to Mr. FISK.

Mr. SEYBERT.—It may be said that this subject has been exhausted by the discussions of the ablest politicians of the country. I will premise, the remarks which I shall offer are intended solely to justify the vote which it is my intention to give on this momentous occasion.

The question pending the United States' Bank has excited a peculiar interest throughout this nation, more especially in our seaports. The dissolution of this institution, which, from its limitation, will expire on the fourth of March next, has been portrayed in colors of the darkest shades, and the distresses which many maintain will be consequent to that event, call seriously for a fair and deliberate investigation. I hope, sir, I shall be pardoned for imposing on the patience of the House, when it is recollected that the community which I represent have employed four-tenths of the capital stock of the United States' Bank. If evil consequences are to attend the dissolution of this establishment, or if beneficial results proceed from its continuance, in either case I must feel myself essentially interested; it is therefore my wish to be distinctly understood upon the important principles which have connexion with the great question now before us.

At the last session of Congress I presented the memorial of the President, Directors, and Stockholders of the Bank of the United States; at that time I entertained no positive opinion on the subject; the discussions which took place in the committee to whom the memorial was referred, necessarily, as a duty on my part, excited that attention which the importance of the question imperiously demanded. Under circumstances of doubt, I voted in favor of reporting a resolution in support of the bank, for the purpose of giving to the establishment every chance which reason could urge; at the same time reserving to myself the right to pronounce a final decision, according as policy and expediency, but more especially as principle should dictate. I will admit, sir, that this is not the time or place to institute the general inquiry, whether banks are or are not beneficial to a nation? Because, whether the charter of the United States' Bank be renewed or not, the several States, who have the unquestioned authority to incorporate bank establishments, have already created many, which it is not in our power to control. I do not hesitate to declare, though many persons in the United States are decidedly opposed to a banking system under every possible circumstance, I am not of this class. Experience has proved, in a manner very satisfactory to my mind, the advantages which are derived from the banks when they are impartially directed, and when the accommodation afforded by them is prudently employed; the great difficulty seems to be to confine the system within its proper limits. I understand the proposition as applicable to the agricultural, manufacturing, and commercial interests of the United States.

For my proofs of this proposition, I will not rely upon the famous Bank of St. George, at Genoa, whose authority, by a gentleman from New York, (Mr. Fisk,) has been considered of much weight. I will recall to the mind of my friend the remark of an intelligent traveller, who, when he visited this bank of antiquity, exclaimed: Here lies concealed the enigma, whether the bank possesses millions of millions, or whether it is indebted millions of millions! He concludes, Upon this important secret rests the safety of the State. Unhappy State, say I, whose safety depends upon a secret concealed within the vaults of a bank. Perhaps to a development of this secret may we attribute the present servile condition of the people of the once far-famed and powerful Republic of Genoa.

I am one of those who do not entertain fears in consequence of foreigners becoming the stockholders of our banks, provided, on all occasions, you deny them the privilege of voting either directly or by proxy. I would even go so far as to prohibit their being original subscribers to any stock which may be created in our territory. The States do not object to a foreigner holding the stock of their banks. Any political consequences which can arise from such an interest will exist without the General Government having power over them. For the present I am opposed to the exclusion of foreign capital from our country, because it is not established that we possess a surplus of our own, and that the introduction of more from abroad depresses that which is immediately the property of our citizens; the prices which are at present paid as the interest for a borrowed capital convince me that it would be impolitic at this time to adopt the principle of exclusion.

Though I have admitted, that, under certain specific provisions of the law, foreigners should be permitted to hold the stock of the Bank of the United States, it is not thence to be inferred, because they have become the stockholders, they are to be confirmed, from time to time, in the exercise of an exclusive privilege in our country.

Sir, I am decidedly opposed to a prominent, and what to me appears to be a very dangerous feature in the bill now under consideration. I allude to the eighth section, which admits of an increase of the present capital stock of the bank. Adopt this provision, you will thereby create an Herculean power, which will have at its mercy all the minor institutions of the States; thus constituted, it can oppress and destroy them, as whim or interest may dictate. The steps which have been taken preparatory to a dissolution of the present bank, it is said, occasion much embarrassment, and threaten with ruin many of our citizens; if the present capital of ten millions can thus affect society, who will pretend to accumulate present evils, or risk entailing misery on posterity, solely for the purpose of a temporary gain to the Government? In this question Pennsylvania is deeply concerned; she has several millions of dollars invested in her banks; this to her is a valuable source of revenue; upon this may she predicate much of her future prosperity; hence will she derive the funds requisite for future internal improvements; but if you fill up the blanks in this section with a considerable sum, all these prospects will be blasted forever; you will thereby destroy the tree from whose ramifications were to emanate the blessings of peace and the sinews of war. Those of her Representatives who may deem it politic and Constitutional to vote for a continuance of the character of the United States' Bank, ought surely to oppose any increase of the present capital; we have been told that that which now exists has been found sufficient for all purposes, at a time when our commerce was much more extensive than we have reason to suppose will soon again be the case.

If, as some say, the bank by its capital, is to facilitate the fiscal operations of the Government, I am decided this should never be greater than what will be barely sufficient for this purpose. If you go further, you place in the hands of the Government an engine which may destroy the freedom of this nation. We are further told, that in case of war, the Government may derive advantage, in the form of loans, from the bank; admitting this to be the fact, it is very evident, under the uncertainties of a war, the demands of our merchants upon the banks will diminish, so that the bank capital already created throughout the Union may be very readily had for the exigencies of the State. If a greater sum shall be found to be necessary, the patriotic zeal of your citizens will prove itself all-sufficient to supply your wants in a cause which will be deemed just and honorable by the nation.

I am also opposed to the United States having the right in any manner to appoint any of the directors of the bank, not so much on account of any influence which the Government might derive from such appointment, as to prevent ruinous consequences to all who may be concerned. Who will such directors generally be? Certainly persons who need the aid of the banks, for none others would make application for the appointments; when they are appointed, they will be subservient to the views of such of the directors as are chosen by the stockholders in their places; they will lose sight of the public welfare; they will be interested by the accommodations which they may find necessary for their purposes; to obtain these, they will yield to their associates; instead of being the guardians of the public treasure in case of danger, they will remain silent until a spontaneous explosion of the bubble solves for the world the important secret of the insolvency of the institution. Sir, notwithstanding many arguments may be adduced in support of a banking system, no degree of importance whatever, whether derived from the facilities offered to the Government by bank establishments, or from the considerable sums which may be thereby had for the Treasury, in consequence of sales which may be made of the stock belonging to the nation, or of the bonus to be given, shall induce me to vote in favor of a measure which is not grounded upon strict Constitutional principles.

The history of the banks in our country informs us, that the one usually termed the Bank of North America was the first establishment of the kind which received the sanction of the Government. This institution was incorporated by an act of Congress, in the month of May, 1781, under the authority of the "Articles of Confederation." The present Bank of the United States was incorporated by an act of Congress, on the 25th of February, 1791, during the operation of the present Constitution of the United States.

Without an attempt to examine every hypothesis, which has been or which might be proposed, respecting the constitutionality of the principle, I will content myself with the statement of the case, such as it appears to my mind. The first public act which I performed, as a member of the Congress of the United States, was, to swear solemnly that I would support the Constitution of the United States. It therefore is my duty to examine and consider its precepts, according to the best of my ability.

The "Articles of Confederation" and the present Constitution of the United States do not differ as regards any power delegated by the States to Congress, touching charters of incorporation. I can never persuade myself that the Constitution was intended other than to have a definite meaning; or that it was ever contemplated to speak an equivocal language; ambiguity arises solely from the misconceptions of its interpreters; it is very plain and of easy comprehension, especially as it relates to the present question, since it is totally silent on the right to create corporations—its wisdom is further illustrated by the special provision for the only exclusive privilege which is consistent with a free and equal government, and that is in favor of genius.

The powers delegated by the States are special and defined, and, it is expressly declared by the Constitution, that "the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people." This language needs no interpretation. I cannot for a moment permit myself to suppose, that the patriots who were tested during the long continued uncertainty of the most important events of our Revolutionary period, and to whom was ultimately assigned the right and power to construct the instrument which is to guide us in the political labyrinth—that they intended this their great work should alone be explicable by that refined reasoning to which common sense is a stranger. I never can admit. Surely that which they framed for the good and security of every individual in the nation, must be expressed in a manner to be understood by ordinary men, and those whom it was intended to direct. Sir, if simplicity was not originally contemplated by the framers of the Constitution, why the imposition on the people in publishing it to the world? Was it not a prodigal waste of labor and materials, to furnish every citizen of our country with a copy of that which can only be understood by professional men, or such as are eminently skilled in scholastic research? It had better remain a secret, concealed amongst the musty rolls in the archives of State, than be a puzzle for mankind. As long as this instrument is preserved pure and untarnished, it will receive a becoming respect from your fellow-citizens—it will be regarded as “the stupendous fabric of human invention.” Remember, the present argument, in several important points of view, affects posterity in common with ourselves. You had better commit the unintelligible jargon to the flames, than by the agency of construction neutralize wisdom by folly. Sir, if we have a Constitution, which the people cannot understand, I then say, cut the original into slips, and provide the means for a better; or if that is not to be done, and we are to be ruled by the iron hand of power, in that case, as one of the American people, I will pray you to be graciously pleased to grant a plain bill of rights for our better government.

If we look back, and attentively view the occurrences which took place, when the law incorporating the present Bank of the United States was enacted, we shall find our reasoning supported and confirmed by many important circumstances; we shall then perceive, that the act of incorporation was opposed on Constitutional ground, by men who were and continue to be esteemed for their talents, political skill, judicial knowledge, probity and patriotism, and it has been admitted, that the arguments formerly urged are unanswerable. That the power to create corporations was never intended to be ceded on the part of the United States, is proved beyond all manner of contradiction; for we are told by the highest authority, by one who was a member of the General Convention; that it had been proposed to cede to Congress the power to create corporations, and that the proposition was rejected, after a deliberate discussion. In my opinion this decision is in proof of the sagacity and wisdom of those who made it; it was highly justifiable to retain this power to be exercised by the States; because, corporations are generally founded on circumstances, which are entirely local—as such, they can be better understood by the Legislatures of the respective States, than by that of the General Government.

The experience of every session proves that the decisions of Congress vary with the men who at different times compose that body; therefore, the act of February, 1791, can have no force in settling the principle contended for.

I have heard it urged, that the States have recognised the constitutionality of the United States' Bank, by their laws. I know of no law in any of the States, which declares this charter Constitutional. Were it even proved, that several of the States had published this declaration, with me it would signify nothing, unless the sanction of two-thirds of the States was thus had. On a former occasion, several of the States were induced, from peculiar circumstances, to relinquish for a time their right in favor of a particular case—I allude to the first establishment of the Bank of North America. If this had been intended to decide this very important question, without any reservation of their power in other cases, they would have expressed it in the most positive and unequivocal manner.

Sir, it may be asked, how did the Congress, whilst acting under the “Articles of Confederation,” incorporate the Bank of North America, though their powers were no more extensive than those of the present Congress? We shall not lose by this investigation—they declared that “the exigencies of the United States rendered it indispensably necessary that such an act be immediately passed,” and, at that period, the Board of War confessed they had not money sufficient to pay the expense of forwarding an express to the Commander-in-Chief of the Army! Notwithstanding such urgent necessities on the part of the General Government, they were too conscious of the rights of the States to attempt an usurpation of authority, or to pretend to force this act without their sanction; accordingly, we find the resolution by which this bank was established followed by another, which recommended to the Legislature of each of the States the necessity to pass such laws as they judged requisite for giving the ordinance, by which the subscribers to the Bank of North America were incorporated, its full operation; every provision in the charter of this bank, to have full effect, was recommended to the Legislatures of the several States for their approbation. (See Journals of Congress for 1781, vol. 7th, p. 257 and 258.)

It is a well known and an important fact, that the subscribers to the Bank of North America did not rest satisfied of the authority of Congress to incorporate them; subsequently to the original act of incorporation, they accepted from the Legislature of Pennsylvania a charter by which their privileges were very much abridged.

Some maintain, the States having made it penal to pass counterfeits of the notes of the United States' Bank, is in proof of their recognising the constitutionality of the institution. No one will pretend, that these laws were intended other than to guard the people against fraud. These statutes were enacted without any connexion with or reference to the principle, upon which the original act was founded. It is but too well known, notwithstanding these salutary provisions, that counterfeit bank notes of every denomination are in daily circulation. I will ask, what would be the case if such laws had not been passed by the States? Sir, if it requires all our care to prevent an inundation from such bank paper, as is acknowledged to be genuine, for Heaven's sake do not risk the security of the people, by an indirect sanction of such as is known to be spurious!

I have often heard the constitutionality of a National Bank defended, upon the ground of its being absolutely necessary to the fiscal operations of the General Government. A friend from New York, (Mr. Fisk,) said he "would demonstrate that this institution was indispensably necessary to the fiscal concerns of the Government." I confess if he could do this, he would go far to remove an important difficulty. If there be higher authority, whereon to rely for his proofs, than the officer who is at the head of your Treasury Department, he might have succeeded. I pledge myself upon the statements of this officer to demonstrate, that this bank is not even necessary for the fiscal operations of the Government. Upon this plea, it is attempted to be justified by the seventeenth article of the eighth section of the Constitution of the United States, which gives to Congress the power "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution" the several specific powers delegated to Congress by the States. I never did doubt for a moment the convenience of a bank to the moneyed transactions of the Government. I was often induced to believe, that a bank, sanctioned by the General Government, was necessary for these purposes. I am now confirmed in a very different sentiment by the Treasury report, made the third day of January, 1811. In the eleventh page of that report we are told, it is one of the duties which are assigned to a clerk in the Treasurer's office, to keep a "bank cash book, wherein an account is opened with every bank in which the United States have money deposited. In 1798, the number of these were five; they are now augmented to twenty." The establishment, constituting the United States' Bank and its branches, consists in all of nine banks; consequently, by the statement just made, it is proved the Treasury Department has been doing business with eleven banks, other than those sanctioned by Congress. The same report states, that this business is transacted in all the banks upon precisely the same plan. We have never been told of any losses having been sustained in any of them. Why then pretend, that it is impossible to transact this business through the agency of the State banks, when we have the best authority for asserting, that this has been done already in a majority of cases with the greatest success, facility, and certainty? That no advantages, which are peculiar, can be derived to the nation from the United States' Bank, as respects the collection of the revenue, the safe-keeping of its specie, or the transmission of its moneys from place to place, will be made evident by the same excellent authority. It is there stated, that considerable sums, to the credit of the Government, are deposited in the State banks, even in cities where the mother bank and its branches are situated. On the seventh of January, 1811, very considerable sums belonging to the Government remained in the Manhattan Bank of New York; the Bank of Pennsylvania in Philadelphia, and the Bank of Columbia in Georgetown, District of Columbia. As to the transmission of money, we are told, in the same report, that the deposits in the Manhattan Bank arise from collections of the revenue in the States of Rhode Island and Connecticut; and that those in the Bank of Pennsylvania occur from the payments which are made for public lands into the banks of Ohio and Kentucky; from these it is transmitted to the branch bank of Pennsylvania at Pittsburgh, and thence it passes to the Bank of Pennsylvania in the city of Philadelphia, where it remains subject to the drafts of the Treasurer. From this we perceive that collections and transmissions of money for the benefit of the Government are made without the aid of the United States' Bank or its branches, and that through a considerable extent of country, from one extremity of the States to the other. After this will any one pretend to urge the absolute necessity of the United States' Bank?

H. OF R.

Bank of the United States.

It is said, all agree that banks are necessary for the collection of taxes, but that of the United States is not absolutely necessary for this purpose, since these operations can be and have been performed for the General Government by the State banks. Sir, I deny the position, and will maintain that for this purpose no bank whatever is required. I will ask gentlemen who maintain this doctrine, to name to me the banks which are employed to collect the taxes which are levied by the States? I know of none, and I believe it impossible to point out a single instance where the States make use of their agency.

Sir, I will for a moment permit myself to suppose, notwithstanding the well founded objections to the establishment of a bank under the authority of the General Government, Congress shall nevertheless deem it expedient to renew the charter of the present United States' Bank, or establish, what some may fancifully reconcile to themselves by the title of a National Bank; it then becomes a question, how the States will receive the act? whether they cannot render its provisions abortive? That many of the States are hostile to a bank, authorized by the General Government, is evident from numerous facts; for proofs we may refer to the acts of the Georgia Legislature, by which the bank capital at the branch at Savannah was made liable to taxation. North Carolina has taxed the capital of her banks—the Legislature of New Jersey passed but a single act at the last session, that was to levy a tax on bank capital. No one can pretend that the disposition of Virginia or Maryland is very favorable to a pretended National Bank. I can state upon the best authority, that it was a subject of consideration with the Legislature of Pennsylvania, during the last winter, to tax the capital of the mother bank in Philadelphia; they did not proceed, because, they relied on the refusal of Congress to renew the present charter of the United States' Bank. The taxation of the capital stock of this bank is to be looked for on the part of the States in which the mother bank and its branches may be established; because, the States generally requires a bonus, or in other words they raise a tax from the banks which they themselves have sanctioned; in many instances the amount has been very considerable. We cannot suppose the States will hesitate to tax the United States' Bank, because, if they do, they will act unjustly towards such of their immediate citizens as have invested their capitals in the stock of State banks. A partial taxation is contrary to the spirit and letter of our constitutions. The States having the right to tax the institutions which you may sanction within their jurisdiction, they have it in their power to render inoperative the statutes which you may enact on this subject—they may tax to an amount which shall equal the dividends arising upon the capital. Who can pretend that banks will do business without the prospect of an handsome profit? Thus disposed, the States may place the United States in a very unpleasant situation. Let us avoid every possible source of discord. The General Government may be reduced to the dilemma, either to relinquish a pretended right, or to pay tribute to the States, to permit them to exercise an authority which is unquestionably an attribute of sovereign power. This would constitute an epoch in the political annals of our country. I hope such absurdities will not be committed. We may avoid them, by a strict compliance with the principles of the Constitution of the United States.

The Committee rose, about four o'clock, and obtained leave to sit again.

FRIDAY, January 18.

A motion was made by Mr. FISK, that the House do now adjourn; and the question being taken thereon, it was determined in the negative—yeas 6, nays 59.

On motion of Mr. BACON, the House proceeded to consider the resolution submitted by him on the 31st ultimo; and the same having been again read, was concurred in.

Mr. DAWSON presented to the House a report of the Secretary of War, to the Chairman of the Committee on that part of the President's Message which relates to land forces and fortifications, and of moneys required on account of fortifications during the present year.—Ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. MORROW, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill from the Senate "to authorize the surveying and making of certain roads in the State of Ohio, as contemplated in the Treaty of Brownstown, in the Territory of Michigan," made a report; which was read, and, together with the bill, committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

Mr. PITKIN presented a petition of the merchants of New Haven, in the State of Connecticut, to the same effect with the petition of merchants of New York, presented the 13th ultimo; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the bill supplemental to the act concerning the commercial intercourse between the United States and Great Britain and France, and for other purposes.

Mr. SHERFFEY, one of the members from Virginia, stated that it was his intention to make a motion to the following effect: "That the injunction of secrecy imposed on the secret proceedings of this House during the present session be now taken off;" and having first asked the decision of the Chair thereon, Mr. SPEAKER decided that it was not in order to make the said motion with open doors.

From which decision of the Chair, an appeal was made to the House; and, on the question, "Is the decision of the Chair correct?" it was resolved in the affirmative—yeas 76, nays 38.

Mr. SHERFFEY then suggested that he had some communications to make which required secrecy. On which, the galleries were cleared and the doors closed; and having remained so for some time, were again opened.

NAVAL ESTABLISHMENT.

Mr. FISK moved that the House do come to the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expenditure of moneys appropriated for the Navy Department since the 1st of January, 1804; and also into the situation and management of the navy yards belonging to the United States; and that they report thereon to the House.

Mr. SWOOPÉ moved to amend the said resolution by striking out the words appropriated for the Navy Department since the 1st January, 1804, and also into the situation and management of the, and the words belonging to the United States; and to insert the words at the before the words navy yards, and the words in Washington, from the establishment thereof, after the said words.

Mr. HAVEN moved to amend the said amendment, by striking out the words in Washington, and inserting the words in the United States; and the question being taken, it was determined in the negative.

A division of the question on Mr. SWOOPÉ's amendment was then called for by Mr. FISK; and, on the question to strike out, it was determined in the negative.

The resolution was then concurred in as originally proposed; and Mr. FISK, Mr. BASSETT, Mr. MILNOR, Mr. HAVEN, and Mr. KENAN, were appointed the said committee.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. VAN HORN offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee for the District of Columbia be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a government for the said District, and that they have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. TALLMADGE objected to giving leave to report by bill. He had no objection to the inquiry, but he was not willing, on a subject with the merits of which he was so little acquainted, to give leave to report by bill. He therefore moved to strike out that part of the resolution.

Mr. VAN HORN said it had been shown by experience that Congress either could not or would not attend to the District, the concerns of the nation requiring more time than they could devote to them. A bill had been once reported by a committee of the House on the subject some years ago, and the same course might be pursued now. A report by bill would give a more comprehensive view of the subject.

H. OF R.

Bank of the United States.

JANUARY, 1811.

Mr. LEWIS said that, with the gentleman from Connecticut, he should prefer a detailed report. He had heard of no application to the House from any part of the District for a Legislature, nor did he see the necessity of it; but he had no objection to vote for an inquiry, though he had objection to authorizing a committee to report by bill.

Mr. TALLMADGE's motion was carried—43 to 30.

Mr. VAN HORN, considering the agreement of the House to the alteration just made in his motion, as a virtual rejection of his proposition, asked and obtained leave to withdraw his motion.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to renew the charter of the Bank of the United States.

Mr. BURWELL's motion for striking out the first section being still under consideration.

Mr. P. B. PORTER.—Mr. Chairman: As this bank has excited so extraordinary an interest in every part of the United States, and particularly in the State which I have the honor to represent; as I am apprehensive, from what took place yesterday, that I shall be found, on this question, in opposition to a majority of my colleagues; and, (what will always be an imperative motive with me) as I think this bill aims a deadly blow at some of the best principles of the Constitution, I feel it my duty to state to the House the grounds on which I shall be constrained to vote for striking out the section now under consideration.

I acknowledge that I had not, until lately, paid any particular attention to the question of the constitutionality of this institution. I stand, therefore, in this respect, on safer ground than the respectable member from North Carolina, (Mr. MAÇON,) for I have no reason to suspect myself of any long-rooted prejudices on the question. The Bank of the United States was established at a time when I was not in the habit of troubling myself with such questions. I had been accustomed to think of it as an institution, the constitutionality of which was conceded by common consent. But, sir, when the question was again stirred, I felt it my duty to give it a thorough investigation before I should sanction it by my vote. I have given it, if not a thorough, at least a candid and impartial examination; and the result has been, a full conviction that we have no right to incorporate a bank upon the principles of the bill on the table, or rather, upon the principles of the original charter, which this bill proposes to renew. The ground of my objection is, that it assumes the exercise of Legislative powers which belong exclusively to the State Governments.

I shall not touch the question of the expediency of this bank, much less the expediency of banking generally. If I were competent, which I confess I am not, to the task, I should think it a very unprofitable one, to follow the gentleman through all the mazes of the banking system—a system, sir, about the various and important operations and effects of which on civil society, aside from a few obvious truths which it furnishes, I have found that those gentlemen who have professed to understand them best, have differed most. As I propose to confine myself to the Constitutional question solely, I hope I shall be allowed to take a little broader range on this point, than has been taken by the gentlemen who have preceded me.

I am aware how ungracious Constitutional objections to the powers of this House are with those, and there are many such, who believe that the powers of the Federal Government are, at best, too contracted; and who would be glad to see all the State rights merged and sunk into a consolidated government. Whatever may be my speculative opinions on this subject, I can never be influenced, by motives of expediency, to swerve from my allegiance to the Constitution. This sentiment is indelibly fixed on my mind, and I trust it is a common one to the members of this Committee. That, in adhering strictly to the obligation we have taken, to support the Constitution of the United States, we not only perform a sacred duty to ourselves, but we render a better service to the real and permanent interests of our country than we could possibly render by a departure from that obligation; even though that departure were to avert so serious a calamity as a general bankruptcy—a calamity which, in order to alarm the timid, has been held out as the inevitable consequence of a refusal to renew this charter.

I should be surprised at the general acquiescence which seems to have been yielded to the constitutionality of this institution, did I not believe that others had been as superficial in their examination of the subject as I had myself. When objections are made to the constitutionality of a law, the people, in the cursory views which they are accustomed to take of such objects, are apt to adopt, as the tests of its constitutionality, the powers of the State and Federal Governments collectively; and if they find nothing in the law offensive to the principles of civil liberty, nothing ungenial with the spirit of a Republican Government, they rest satisfied, and do not trouble themselves with nice distinctions between the powers peculiar to the one or the other of these Governments. Such reasoning would, however, ill become the sagacity of this House.

One of the most serious dangers with which our Government is threatened, and it is a danger growing out of the very nature and structure of the Government itself, consists in its tendency to produce collisions between State and Federal authorities. The Federal Government, as was observed by my learned colleague (Mr. MITCHELL) is, imperium in imperio, a government within a government; and the misfortune is, that there exists no friendly third power to decide the controversies which may arise between these two great, independent, and, in many respects, rival authorities. The public peace must be kept, if kept at all, by the conciliatory dispositions of the parties themselves. As then we have a common interest in the preservation of both these Governments—as we are as well the subjects of the imperio as of the imperium, we ought to act with great circumspection and delicacy in the assumption of powers which do not clearly belong to us. It is better to forego the exercise of powers to which we are entitled, if the exercise of them is not very important, rather than hazard the assumption of doubtful ones, the fatal consequences of which my honorable friend from Virginia (Mr. BURWELL) has so justly deprecated.

The great line of demarcation between the powers of the State and Federal Governments is well understood. The powers of the State Governments extend to the regulation of all their internal concerns: those of the Federal Government to the management of all our external relations—external as regards the individual States, as well as the States in their collective capacity. The general ideas upon which our Republic is founded, are these: That small territories are better adapted to the successful administration of justice than large ones. In a Republic, where the people are the sovereigns and source of power, it is important that, in order to enable them to execute this power discreetly, they should possess correct information in relation to the character and conduct of their rulers, and in relation also to the character of the measures which they pursue, or ought to pursue; and this information is better attained in a small than in a large territory. The individual States have therefore reserved to themselves the exclusive right of regulating all their internal, and, as I may say, municipal concerns, in relation both to person and property. But a single State may be inadequate to its own protection against foreign violence; it may also be unable to enforce the observance of proper rules and regulations for carrying on its foreign trade and intercourse. The Confederacy of the States is therefore formed for the purpose of attaining these two objects, namely, the regulation and protection of the trade and intercourse of the States with each other and foreign nations, and their security against foreign invasion. It has some other objects in view of minor consequence, and immediately connected with these principal ones. The Constitution of the United States is the basis of this confederacy; and it is only necessary to read the Constitution to perceive that it is nothing more than a delegation of specific powers for these specific purposes, and that the general sovereignty of the States over their respective territories is expressly retained by the States.

But, sir, independent of these specific powers and duties of the Federal Government, it has another and distinct set of powers and duties to perform and execute. The national domain, as it has been called, embracing the lands acquired by the Revolutionary conflict; the lands since purchased of foreign nations; and the lands ceded by the several States to the General Government, belong to the United States in their federate capacity; and no individual State, as such, has any claim to or jurisdiction over them. As to these lands the powers of the United States are sovereign, independent, and complete: and the Congress of the United States is the only legitimate authority for the exercise of this sovereignty. The powers of Congress, then, in relation to these territories, include the powers of both the Federal and State governments, in relation to the States. I have adverted to this branch of the powers of the Federal Government as a means of dispelling the obscurity which has been thrown over the Constitutional question, to which I shall soon come, by confounding the powers of Congress over the States, with their powers over the Territories. Arguments, to which I shall have occasion to advert in the course of my observations, have been used to justify the exercise of particular powers within the limits of the States, from our acknowledged right to and practical exercise of similar powers within the Territories.

In discussing Constitutional questions, then, we lay down these axioms:—That in relation to the territories, the powers of Congress are supreme and exclusive; that in relation to the States, they are specifically defined and limited by the Constitution—and that we have no right to exercise, within the limits of a State, any power as resulting from the general rights of sovereignty; because that sovereignty belongs to the States and to the people, and not to the Federal Government. To show that these two last positions are correct, I will read the tenth article in the amendment of the Constitution: "The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or the people."

As then, the incorporation of this bank involves the exercise of Legislative powers within the jurisdiction of the States, in relation to the rights of property between the citizens of those States; and as no power to incorporate a bank, eo nomine, is to be found in the Constitution, it would seem sufficient for us to rest the argument here, by a mere denial of the power, and to call on the advocates of the bank to show its constitutionality. An attempt to prove this constitutionality has been made—not, however, sir, by arguments advanced by gentlemen on the other side of the House in their places, (for they have, so far, observed, and I understand that they will continue to observe, a profound silence on this question,) but by arguments which have been gratuitously introduced, by the agent of the bank. I allude to the pamphlet which has within a few days past been printed and distributed among the members, containing the celebrated argument of General Hamilton, "on the constitutionality of a National Bank." As that pamphlet is de facto, if not de jure, before the Committee, I will, if the Committee will indulge me, attempt to examine some of the principal arguments contained in it, and I will also notice some additional ones, advanced yesterday by my honorable friend and colleague on my left (Mr. FISK.) In the course of the observations which I have to submit, I shall, without doubt, repeat arguments and remarks made by the gentlemen who have preceded me, and others which are familiar to the members of the Committee. My excuse must rest in the difficulty of taking a connected view of the subject, without such repetitions. If I shall be so fortunate as to throw a single new ray of light on this important question, I shall feel amply remunerated for my trouble, and I shall think the time of the Committee not altogether misspent.

The first argument in this pamphlet is founded on the sovereignty of the powers of Congress. The Federal Government is said to be sovereign as to all the objects for which that Government was instituted. A sovereign power includes, by force of the term, a right to all the means applicable to the attainment of the ends for which that power is given; and therefore Congress may, in virtue of their sovereign power, create incorporations for attaining the ends or objects of those powers.

This argument is founded on what the logicians call petitio principii, or begging the question. The proposition, that the Government is sovereign, is assumed, to prove that it possesses the attributes of sovereignty: or, in other words, the fact of sovereignty is assumed, to prove that sovereignty. If the position that the powers of this Government are sovereign as to all the objects of them, be proved, I will concede the consequence, to wit: that we have a right to establish corporations to attain these objects—but I deny the fact of sovereignty. The acts of Congress, it is said, are declared by the Constitution to be the supreme law of the land: and the power which can make the supreme law of the land, is necessarily a sovereign power. But I deny that this is a correct definition, or exposition of sovereignty. It is not the high nature of an act, nor the authority of the act, that stamps the character of sovereignty on him who performs it. The sheriff of a county who puts a man to death, under the sentence of the law, executes an act of as high import and authority as human power can execute; and yet the sheriff of a county is not therefore a sovereign. His authority is a mere delegated authority—his act is a mere ministerial, mechanical act. The idea of sovereignty imports the exercise of discretion—of judgment—of will. It is of the very essence of sovereign power, that you may execute that power, or not execute it—that you may execute it when you will, and how you will. A sovereign power, as to any object, includes a right to any means, and all the means applicable to the attainment of the object. But, sir, do Congress possess sovereign powers, or, what is the same thing, discretionary means, as to the attainment of the objects of this Government? No, sir. The Constitution is not a general authority to Congress, to attain the objects for which the Government was established; but it is an enumeration of the particular powers, or means, by which, and by which only, certain objects are to be accomplished. If the powers of Congress were sovereign, they would of necessity comprehend all the means applicable to the attainment of their objects; but inasmuch as they are specific and circumscribed, that very circumstance proves that they are not sovereign. The people of the United States are the true sovereigns of this country. From them all power emanates, and on their will all the authority of this Government depends. The powers of the Federal Government are mere delegated chartered authorities; and in the exercise of them we are tied down to the letter of the Constitution. We have, to be sure, a certain latitude of discretion allowed us, within the letter and pale of the Constitution; and so far we may be said to possess a sort of limited qualified sovereignty. But the Constitution is the standard by which to measure the quantum and extent of our sovereignty. And our sovereignty, which is the result of the powers given in the Constitution, is not the standard by which to measure the Constitution. The Constitution is the true bed of Procrustes—and our sovereignty, however unwillingly we may yield it, must be the victim.

Another argument, which is rather an argument to the favor than to the right of this bank, is, that it is an innocent institution; that, although its erection involves the exercise of legislative powers within the States, it does not abridge or affect the rights of the citizens, as secured to them by the laws of those States. A corporation, it is said, is a fiction of the law, a mere political transformation of a number of individuals from their natural into an artificial character, for the purpose of enabling them to do business to better advantage, and on a more extended scale; but, that when this political association, this legal entity, is once formed, it becomes subject to the laws of the State in which it happens to be placed.

I know, sir, that there is nothing formidable in the abstract idea of a corporation. It is a mere phantom of the imagination, invisible, intangible, and, of course, innocent. But, sir, when the legal effects of this incorporation are to invest the individuals whom it associates with privileges and immunities to which they were not before entitled; when this legal fiction is interposed to shield certain individuals from the liabilities to which they would be subject as ordinary citizens, it then becomes a matter of important and serious consequence. What are some of the legal effects of this incorporation?

One of its most obvious and distinguished characteristics is, that it exempts the private property and persons of the stockholders from all liability for the payment of the debts of the company. By the laws of every State in the Union, every man is, I believe, liable for the payment of his debts, to the full amount of his private fortune; and, in case that fortune prove insufficient, his personal liberty is at the disposal of his creditor; at least to a certain extent. Is not, then, the exemption from these liabilities an important immunity? Is it not an exclusive privilege secured to the stockholders of this bank? Assuredly it is. I know it has been said that a number of individuals may, by a private association, secure to themselves all the advantages of an incorporated company; that, by forming a common fund or stock upon which to do business, and issuing notes chargeable upon that fund, they may exonerate their persons and private property from all liability for the payment of the debts contracted in that business. I am no lawyer, sir; but if the law be what it is said to be, and what I believe it to be, summa ratio, then, I pronounce this doctrine not to be law; for nothing can be more preposterous in principle than to say, that a man may, by his own act, avoid the force of an obligation which the law has made universal and unqualified. If a man owes a debt, acknowledges he owes it, and has received a consideration for it, the law has prescribed the nature and extent of his liability to pay it; and it is not for him to say that it shall only be paid out of a certain fund, or particular part of his property, and no other. When men contract a debt jointly, the legal obligation to pay it extends as well to the persons and separate property of the individual partners, as to their joint property.

Another feature of this incorporation is, that it authorizes the stockholders to take usurious interest for their money. By the provisions of the law, the bank may issue notes and make discounts to double the amount of their capital stock; and, in addition to that, to the amount of any moneys which may happen to be deposited in their vaults for safe-keeping; and this, too, independent of the debts created by these deposits. The bank, then, may, and in fact, in many instances, does draw an interest on three or four times its capital. Every State in the Union has laws regulating the rate of interest, and in most of the States this rate is fixed at six per cent. a year. By these laws it is made penal for a man to receive more than six per cent interest for the use of any sum of money which, by a loan, he puts at hazard, and the use of which he deprives himself of. Now, sir, this bank is permitted, contrary to those laws, to draw an interest on twenty or thirty millions of dollars, when, in truth, the whole extent of its responsibility, the whole sum which it puts at hazard, and the use of which it foregoes, is only its original stock of ten millions. In answer to this, it will be said that an individual may, by issuing notes to an amount greater than his property, legally receive an interest on a capital which he does not possess. But it must be recollected, in case of the individual, that, although he may not at the particular time possess a property adequate to the payment of his debts, yet that all the property which he may subsequently acquire, will be liable for the payment of those debts; and what is more, sir, his personal liberty is always put in jeopardy. In this point of view the liability and the hazard of the individual may fairly be said to be coextensive with the whole amount of the capital on which he draws an interest; and which is often the case with the bank.

This bank incorporation possesses other qualities at war with the laws of the several States; one of which is, that it authorizes stockholders, who may be foreigners, to hold real estate. But, sir, I will not detain the Committee any longer on this part of the argument, for this institution cannot be said to be innocent, as regards the rights of the States, when its effects on the rights of property are to exonerate the stockholders from some of the most important responsibilities which the laws of the several States have provided for the payment of debts; and when it authorizes the taking of usurious interest. I lay it down, then, as a position which cannot be controverted, that the granting of this charter is not only an interference with the municipal regulations of the several States in relation to the rights of property; but that it is an infraction of the rights of individuals as secured by those regulations.

But it is contended, that a right to incorporate a Bank of the United States is delegated to Congress by the Constitution; and five or six different provisions of the Constitution are referred to as giving this right. It is said that it is implied in the power to lay and collect taxes, in the power to borrow money, in the power to regulate trade and intercourse between the several States, in the power to provide for the general welfare, and in the power to make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territorial and other property of the United States. The very circumstance of referring this right to many different heads of authority is, in itself, conclusive evidence, that it has no very direct relation to any of them. For it can scarcely be imagined, that the single act of incorporating a bank can be at the same time anything like a direct execution of so many and such distinct and independent powers. But I will examine these provisions separately.

Before I proceed, however, I will premise that all the arguments in support of the right to incorporate a bank, as deducible from the provisions of the Constitution itself, are built up by the aid of the clause of the Constitution, which has been sometimes called "the sweeping clause." I allude to the clause which declares that Congress shall have the right to pass all laws necessary and proper for the carrying into execution the delegated powers. All the powers in the Constitution are given for certain ends or objects. But each power is not a general authority to attain a particular object, and comprehending, of course, all the means or powers applicable to its accomplishment; but, in most cases, it is a specific means for effecting some particular end, and all other means or powers, (for means and powers are the same thing,) conducive to the same end, are expressly excluded, by the restrictive clauses of the Constitution.

The mode of reasoning adopted by General Hamilton, and the other advocates of implied powers, is this: They first search for the end or object for which a particular power is given; and this object will be an immediate or ultimate one, as may best suit the purpose of the argument. Having ascertained the end or object, they abandon the power; or, rather, they confound the power and the object of it together, and make the attainment of the object, and the execution of the power given to accomplish it, convertible terms. Whatever, they say, attains the object for which any power is given, is an execution of that power. But the Constitution gives to Congress a right to make all laws necessary and proper for carrying into execution the delegated powers; and, therefore, as the execution of a power and the attainment of its object, are synonymous terms; the Constitution gives to Congress a right to make all laws necessary and proper for attaining the ends or objects for which the various powers in the Constitution are given.

I beg leave to read a passage from this pamphlet: "The relation between the measure and the end; between the nature of the means employed towards the execution of a power, and the object; must be the criterion of constitutionality." Here then is the axiom—now for the application of it. The Constitution gives to Congress the power to levy taxes, and also the power to borrow money. But the establishment of a bank is neither levying taxes nor borrowing money; nor is the law incorporating the bank, a law to levy taxes, or a law to borrow money. But the immediate end or object, for which these two powers were given, was, to enable the Government to raise a revenue; and a bank may promote this object. Then, sir, by a dexterous application of the argument which I have stated, the fallacy of which consists in the sudden and unobserved transitions which are made from the power to the object, and from the object back again to the power, they prove that the establishment of a bank is in execution of the powers to lay taxes and to borrow money. I will now, sir, proceed to examine the particular provisions of the Constitution which have been relied on, and to place the subject in some different aspects.

In the first place, then, it is contended that the right to incorporate a Bank of the United States is included in the power to lay and collect taxes. And what is the argument by which this position is maintained? Why, sir, it is said that the law, by creating bank paper, and making that paper receivable in payment for taxes, increases the circulating medium in which taxes are paid, and of course must facilitate the payment of them. That whatever facilitates the payment of taxes, facilitates also the collection of them; and whatever aids or facilitates the collection of taxes, is a means for their collection. And therefore, the incorporation of a bank is in execution of the power to lay and collect taxes.

No man, sir, ought to complain of the weakness of a Government, whose powers may be reasoned up by logic like this. Amidst the infinite variety of relations, and connexions, and dependencies and analogies by which all human transactions are allied to each other, he must be a weak politician who cannot, by hooking together a chain of implication like this, justify any and every measure of political policy or economy, as a means of executing some of the powers with which this Government is intrusted. Take this latitude of implication or construction, and you want no other power but the power to lay and collect taxes. It may be tortured into a justification of every measure which ambition itself could desire. No tyrant ever made a law without assigning the public good as the motive of it. No man on this floor, however wicked his designs, would venture to propose a measure (indeed few could be proposed) in favor of which he could not adduce some plausible argument, to show that it would tend to promote the general prosperity of the country. And in showing this he would show its constitutionality; for it is demonstrable that whatever would promote the general prosperity of the country, would, and for that very reason, facilitate, in some greater or less degree, the payment of taxes; and might therefore be justified as a means for the collection of taxes.

But, sir, the Constitution, as I have said before, and I must repeat it again, for this is the radical source of all the error on this subject—the Constitution of the United States is not, as such reasoning supposes it to be, a mere general designation of the ends or objects for which the Federal Government was established, and leaving to Congress a discretion as to the means or powers by which those ends shall be brought about. But the Constitution is a specification of the powers or means themselves by which certain objects are to be accomplished. The powers of the Constitution, carried into execution according to the strict terms and import of them, are the appropriate means, and the only means within the reach of this Government, for the attainment of its ends. It is true, as the Constitution declares, and it would be equally true, if the Constitution did not declare it, that Congress have a right to pass all laws necessary and proper for executing the delegated powers; but this gives no latitude of discretion in the selection of means or powers. A power given to Congress in its Legislative capacity, without the right to pass laws to execute it, would be nugatory; would be no power at all. It would be a solecism in language to call it a power. A power to lay and collect taxes, carries with it a right to make laws for that purpose; but they must be laws to lay and collect taxes, and not laws to incorporate banks. If you undertake to justify a law under a particular power, you must show the incidentality and applicability of the law to the power itself, and not merely its relation to any supposed end which is to be accomplished by its exercise. You must show that the plain, direct, ostensible, primary object and tendency of your law is to execute the power, and not that it will tend to facilitate the execution of it. It is not less absurd than it is dangerous, first to assume some great, distinct and independent power, unknown to the Constitution, and violating the rights of the States; and, then, to attempt to justify it, by a reference to some remote, indirect, collateral tendency, which the exercise of it may have towards facilitating the execution of some known and acknowledged power. This word facilitate has become a very fashionable word in the construction of powers; but, sir, it is a dangerous one; it means more than we are aware of. To do a thing and to facilitate the doing of it, are distinct operations; they are distinct means; they are distinct powers. The Constitution has expressly given to Congress the power to do certain things; and it has, as explicitly, withheld from them the power to do every other thing. The power to lay and collect taxes is one thing; and the power to establish banks, involving in its exercise the regulation of the internal domestic economy of the States, is another and totally distinct thing; and the one is therefore not included in the other.

Again, sir, it is contended that the right to incorporate a bank is implied in the power to regulate trade and intercourse between the several States. It is said to be so, inasmuch as it creates a paper currency, which furnishes a convenient and common circulating medium of trade between the several States. Money, sir, has nothing more to do with trade, than that it furnishes a medium or representative of the value of the articles employed in trade. The only office of bank bills is to represent money. Now, if it be a regulation of trade, to create the representative articles or subjects of trade, a fortiori, will it be a regulation of trade to create the articles or subjects themselves. By this reasoning then you may justify the right of Congress to establish manufacturing and agricultural companies within the several States; because the direct object and effect of these would be, to increase manufactures and agricultural products, which are the known and common subjects of trade. You might, with more propriety say, that under the power to regulate trade between the States, we have a right to incorporate canal companies; because canals would tend directly to open facilitate and encourage trade and intercourse between the several States; and, in my humble opinion, sir, canals would furnish a much more salutary, direct and efficacious means, for enabling the great body of the people to pay their taxes, than is furnished by banks. But, sir, these various powers have never been claimed by the Federal Government; and, much as I am known to favor that particular species of internal improvement, I would never vote to incorporate a company for the purpose of opening a canal through any State, without first obtaining the consent of that State, whose territorial rights would be affected by it. There can be no question, but canal companies, and agricultural companies, and manufacturing companies, and banking companies, may all tend, more or less, to facilitate the operations of trade; but they have nothing to do with the political regulations of trade; and such only come within the scope of the powers of Congress.

But, it is again said, that the right to grant this charter is included in the power to borrow money. The right is attempted to be deduced by a train of reasoning similar to that employed in relation to the provisions which I have already noticed—by forming a string of implications, by which you prove that a power to act in certain cases, and in relation to certain subjects, implies the power to create those cases and subjects to act upon. The Government, it is said, may want and must have money, in any great national crisis. A National Bank with an extensive capital will furnish ample means for loans, will facilitate the exercise of the power to borrow; and, therefore, the right to establish such a bank is implied in the power to borrow. No one, but a logician, sir, would imagine that a power to lend and a power to borrow had any relation to each other—much less could he conjecture, that a power to borrow, and a power to create the ability to lend, mean the same thing. A plain unsophisticated man, on reading the Constitution, would say, that the power to borrow, necessarily, and by force of the term, pre-supposed the existence of the ability and disposition to lend; and that it could not be exercised unless such ability and disposition should actually exist. But the favorite doctrine is, that all powers are given for particular ends, and include all the means applicable to their attainment. Here the end is to borrow money; to borrow honestly if we can, but—to borrow. The ability to lend is a necessary means or ingredient toward perfecting the execution of the power to borrow. But, sir, let me ask, whether the disposition to lend be not as necessary a means towards accomplishing a loan as the ability? It unquestionably is. And, of course, by the doctrine that the end justifies the means, you may coerce the will to lend—and this too equally, in cases where the ability is created by Congress, and where it is derived from any other quarter. A loan obtained by bringing into fair operation all the implications of this power would be borrowing in an off-handed style. Such a loan, if effected by Bonaparte, we should call robbery. But in this mild Republic, it would be nothing more than the fair exercise of an implied Constitutional power.

I have pursued this argument thus far, merely for the purpose of showing the absurdities into which this doctrine of implication will lead us. But suppose, sir, that the argument of the gentleman on the other side of the question be correct, to wit: that the power to borrow implies a right to furnish the ability to lend. What, I would ask, is the probable fact, as to the facilities which this bank will afford the Government in borrowing?

It will be conceded that we shall have no occasion for borrowing, except in case of war; and if we have a war, the probability is, that that war will be with Great Britain—I say this, not as a party man, sir, but because the interests of that nation, from her situation, and her rival pursuits, will be much more likely to come in collision with ours, than those of any other Power. Now it is a fact, in evidence before the Committee, that more than one-half of the stock of this bank belongs to British subjects: and although, as foreigners, they can have no direct agency in the affairs of the bank, yet we well know that through the instrumentality of their friends and agents, of whom there are, unfortunately, too many in this country, they may completely control its operations. Now, I would ask, whether it is probable, that the British subjects would be willing to lend us money to carry on war against their sovereign? Would they not, on the contrary, exert the influence which they are said to possess over the moneyed interest of this country, for the purpose of depressing the credit of the country; for the purpose of crippling the operations of the State banks; and for the purpose of drying up the sources from which the Government might otherwise calculate to derive supplies? But, sir, this has little to do with the question of constitutionality, to which I will again return.

Another ground upon which the constitutionality of this institution has been attempted to be supported, is, that it is necessary to the regular and successful administration of the finances. There is no question, but the bank and its branches afford convenient places for the deposit and safe keeping of the public revenue. It is not to be controverted that they also furnish a safe, convenient, expeditious and cheap means for the transmission of moneys from one part of the United States to another, as they may be wanted by the Government; and, if these facilities were not to be attained in any other way, I should say it would afford an argument in favor of a bank. Not a bank infringing and violating the rights of the States; but, a bank upon principles consistent with those rights.

But, sir, is there not, in every State in which there is a branch of the United States' Bank, also one or more State banks, of equal respectability, and of equal security—at least to the extent of any sum for which they are willing to undertake? These State banks may be used as depositories for the public moneys and they will be equally safe and convenient. And, if you will give to these State banks the advantages of these depositories, as you have hitherto given them to the United States' Bank, they will furnish means for the transmission of moneys from place to place, equally safe, convenient, cheap, and expeditious. This object will be attained by connexions which will be formed between the banks of the different States. Such connexions have already in many instances been formed. But they have not been carried to the extent they otherwise would have been, on account of the United States' Bank and its branches; between which there is so intimate and so necessary a connexion.

But, in answer to this, it is said that if the Bank of the United States would be Constitutional without the existence of the State banks, it is equally so with. That a power which is once Constitutional is equally so at all times, and under all circumstances. That a right which must depend for its existence on the will of the State Legislatures, over whom we have no control, is incomplete, and indeed, as to us, is no right at all. This argument is founded on the supposition that the Federal Government is a complete Government, containing in itself all the principles and powers necessary for its own operations, which supposition is wholly false. The Federal Government does not profess to be complete in itself. It is expressly predicated on the existence of the State governments; and most of the facilities for its exercise are derived from the State governments. It cannot perform even its own peculiar powers and functions, without the aid and co-operation of the State authorities. How, let me ask you, sir, is your Government constituted? Your Senate is appointed directly by the State Legislatures. Your President and

House of Representatives, indirectly, by the same authority. Suppose they should neglect or refuse to make these appointments, can you compel them to do it. No, sir. Can you punish them for not doing it? Not in the least. They may appoint or not, as they think proper; and if they should neglect or refuse to do it, your boasted complete Government would die a natural death, by its own imbecility. It is not fair, then, to say that a power is Constitutional because the Government would be incomplete without it. It is not fair to say, that what would be Constitutional, without the existence of the State governments and their appendages, is equally so with. This would prove that you have a right to appoint your own President, Senate, and House of Representatives. It would go to usurp all the powers of the State governments; for the Government could not be said to be complete without possessing the powers of both Governments combined. Indeed, this Federal Government cannot be said to be complete as to a single power, without all the auxiliary powers of the State governments; for there is not a single act which it can perform without their assistance, directly or indirectly. The very bank law now under consideration is an illustration of this—for how are the provisions of this law to be enforced; how are the debts which it authorizes to be contracted to be collected, but through the medium of the State courts? The doctrine of perfect rights, then, if it prove anything, proves too much. If it proves that, in order to manage your revenues, you may establish banks within the States; it equally proves, that, in order to carry the provisions of your bank laws into execution, you may establish courts and offices within the States for that purpose. I think then, sir, I may fairly conclude, that so long as the State governments furnish you with all the facilities, which you can reasonably require, for conducting your revenues by means of their State banks; so long it will be unnecessary—so long it will be improper—and, therefore, so long it will be unconstitutional to invade the jurisdiction of the States, to establish national banks.

Again. The constitutionality of the bank has been attempted to be maintained by a reference to the phrase in the Constitution, in relation to the power of Congress to provide for the general welfare. I will read the clause in which the phrase is contained: "The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States." This clause has been erroneously construed by some to contain a successive delegation of three or four distinct powers, to wit: a power to lay taxes—a power to pay the debts—a power to provide for the common defence and general welfare. If, then it is said, Congress have power to provide for the general welfare, they may choose the means, which are here not made specific, but left discretionary, for the attainment of that object; and, as in their opinion a National Bank will conduce to that object, they have a right to establish a National Bank. But, sir, this is a total misconception of the meaning of this clause of the Constitution. Instead of three or four distinct grants of power, this clause contains but one grant of power, namely, the power to raise money by taxes, &c.—and all the subsequent parts of the clause are a mere limitation of this power to raise money; or a specification of the purposes for which money may be collected. That this is not a general authority to Congress to provide for the common defence and general welfare, is instantly discovered by a comparison of this clause with the subsequent part of this section; which consists of a list or enumeration of the specific means or powers, by which Congress may provide for the common defence and general welfare. And it would be unnecessary and absurd in itself, as well as repugnant to the whole spirit and character of this Constitution, to give, first, a general power, and then to delegate specific powers, all comprehended in the general one. Although I do not think there is any ambiguity in this clause, as it now stands, yet, its meaning might, perhaps, be rendered more perspicuous and definite by altering the phraseology so as to read in this way: "Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excise, for the purpose of paying the debts and providing for the common defence and general welfare of the United States; but (going on again, sir, with a further qualification of the same power to raise money) all duties, imposts, and excise, shall be uniform throughout the United States." This, then, is merely a right to raise revenue; and, so far as regards the objects for which revenue may be raised, the powers of Congress are discretionary; provided those objects come within the description of providing for the common defence and general welfare: But so far as regards the means by which these revenues, when collected, shall be applied to their destined objects we must look to the powers of Congress as defined and limited in the subsequent parts of this section. In other words, this clause gives plenary powers to raise money; but it gives no powers—I should say, political powers—in relation to its application and expenditure. The powers of Congress over the money, when collected, in reference to its expenditure, would be the same which an individual possesses over his private property—powers resulting from the nature of property, and as regulated by the laws of the State in which it might happen to be situated. I will illustrate my idea by a case. Suppose the Constitution had given to Congress the power to raise a million of dollars, to provide for a National University. Would it then follow that we might go into the State of North Carolina and take your property—property secured to you by the laws of that State—to make this establishment upon? Could we take the public property of that State for this purpose? To both of these questions, every man who understands anything of the Constitution will promptly answer, no. This power then to raise money, for the purpose of establishing a National University, is only a power to raise money: and, for the means of applying it, we must search for our power in another part of the Constitution. On doing this we should find that we must erect the university either in the District of Columbia, or in one of the Territories over which we have exclusive jurisdiction; or, in case we should choose to erect it within the limits of a particular State, we must first not only purchase the land, but obtain a cession of the jurisdiction from the State government. The phrase of providing for the general welfare, then, is a mere qualification of the power to levy taxes, and can give no authority in relation to banks.

JANUARY, 1811.

Bank of the United States.

H. OF R.

There is one more, and I believe but one more, provision in the Constitution, which is relied on as authorizing the establishment of this bank. It is this: "Congress shall have a right to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property of the 'United States.'" It is said that, in virtue of this provision, Congress have established the Territorial governments, which are corporations of the highest and most extensive nature, exercising political powers over the person as well as the property of citizens of the United States; and that no complaint has been made, that Congress has exceeded its authority, in this particular. Why may we not, then, it is asked, establish corporations to regulate and manage the personal property of the United States, which is coupled in the Constitution with the territorial property? The fallacy of this argument consists in not marking the distinction, which exists in these two species of property, and the consequent powers of the Government over them. The property which the United States possess in the territorial lands is not a mere right of soil, a mere usufruct—but it also includes the right of jurisdiction and sovereignty. It is in virtue of this right of jurisdiction, of those sovereign plenary and exclusive powers over the Territories, which I noticed in a former part of my observations, that these corporations or Territorial governments have been established. On the other hand, our revenues are not only personal property, but a qualified property—they are collected for certain objects, and are subject in transitu to the local jurisdictions. This argument, then, which is founded on an analogy that does not exist, must fall with the analogy that supports it.

But, Mr. Chairman, my honorable friend (Mr. FISK) has advanced a new argument in support of the constitutionality of this bank—an argument, not deduced from the provisions of the Constitution itself, but founded on prescription. He tells us that this bank was originally incorporated by a Congress fully competent and qualified to decide on its constitutionality; that its existence is almost coeval with the Government; that it has been countenanced by all succeeding Administrations; that laws have been passed to enforce the provisions of the original charter; and therefore the Constitutional question must be considered as settled, adjudicated, and at rest.

Whatever may be the opinion of the gentlemen of the long robe, I cannot for myself, yield to this doctrine of prescriptive Constitutional rights. It may answer in England, where they have no constitution; or where, rather, as they choose to explain it, immemorial usage, or prescription, are evidence of what their Constitution is. It may do in Connecticut—(it is not my design to derogate from the respectability of that State, nor of its institutions)—it may be good doctrine in Connecticut, where ancient customs and steady habits are their constitution. But, sir, doctrine should never be tolerated in this House, where every member has a printed Constitution on his table before him—a Constitution drawn up with the greatest care and deliberation; with the utmost attention to perspicuity and precision. A Constitution, the injunctions of which, as we, in our best judgments shall understand them, and not as they shall be interpreted to us by others, we are solemnly bound, by our oaths, to obey.

It is true that this bank was originally established by a Congress competent to judge of its constitutionality. It is equally true that a respectable minority of that Congress opposed the passage of the law, on the ground of its unconstitutionality; and if I have been rightly informed, it is also true that the then President, General WASHINGTON, in giving his sanction to that law, did it with more doubt and hesitation, than almost any other act of his Administration.

It is true that subsequent Congresses, of different political complexions, have passed laws enforcing the provisions of the original charter; and that no attempts have been made to repeal it. But it is equally true, that all this might be done away with the most perfect propriety and consistency, although they totally 'disbelieved in its constitutionality. I need not state to this House, that this is not a law in the ordinary course of legislation—a law prescribing a common rule of conduct for the government of the citizens of the United States at large—liable to be repealed at any time; and the obligations of which would cease with its repeal. This, sir, is not the nature of the law, but it is a law in the nature of a contract between the Government and certain individuals, and the existence of it was extended to twenty years. The moment this contract was made, and its operations commenced, private rights were vested; and it would have been a breach of national faith to have repealed it. The original Congress had the same right that we have to judge of the constitutionality of a law; and having, under that right, passed this law or made this contract, we are bound to carry it, as a contract, into execution. As a contract, every successive Congress, of whatever materials composed, is one party to it; and it is well known that a party cannot violate the obligations of his own contract; but, on the contrary, is bound to carry them into effect. It was competent in the State governments to have opposed the execution on the ground of its unconstitutionality; but, perhaps, under all circumstances, they acted a wise and discreet part, in not attempting it. The national faith was pledged in the passage of this law. The national credit, which it was at that time, and which indeed it is at all times, of the first importance to support, was at stake on the faithful execution of this contract; and it was better to suffer for twenty years, under an unconstitutional law, rather than to attempt so violent a remedy—a remedy which would have crippled the credit of the nation in its infancy.

But, sir, because these were proper considerations with our predecessors and the States, to suffer the continuance of this law, does it follow, that now, when that law has expired by its own limitation, when the obligations of that contract are complied with and discharged, when the national faith is emancipated, that they are motives for us to make a new unconstitutional contract? No, sir. The question now is a question de novo. It is a question of conscience in the interpretation of the letter and spirit of the Constitution; unembarrassed by any collateral considerations; and as such, I shall feel bound to vote upon it. It is the province of the Executive and Judicial departments to explain and direct the practical operation of each particular law; and I must submit to the decisions. But the commentaries of courts are not to furnish the principles upon which I am afterwards to legislate. It is to this book, (the Constitution) so justly dear to us all, and not to the books of reports, that we must look, as a guide, to direct us in the path of our oath and our duty.

I believe, sir, that I have gone through, lamely, I know, but I hope intelligibly, with the examination of all the principal arguments, that have been advanced in support of the constitutionality of this law. Having already occupied so much time, I will detain the Committee but a few moments longer.

If the views which I have taken of the subject are correct, these positions may be considered: First, that we have no right to incorporate a bank, unless that right be delegated by the Constitution; for such is the declaration of the Constitution itself. Secondly, that if this right be given by the Constitution, it is included in some of the provisions upon which I have been commenting.

The only question, then, as relates to the Constitution, is, whether we shall, by the passage of this bill, recognise the doctrine of implied or constructive powers. Before we do this, I must entreat every member of the Committee to examine well the consequences of such a recognition. This is not a question about the utility or inutility of a bank; but it is a great question of Constitutional principle. It is, whether we shall consider this Government as the servant and instrument of the people for managing and protecting their rights, and subject at all times to their control; or whether we shall make it a giant, capable of crushing its masters. A moment's careful attention to this subject will show that the doctrine of implied or constructive powers, as contended for in this case, is nothing more or less than the doctrine of general expediency; and that once established, it will warrant Congress in the adoption of any measure not expressly prohibited by the Constitution.

Bank of the United States.

H. OF R.

The great ends or purposes of our Government are the liberty, the security, and the happiness of the people. The raising and management of revenue, the establishment and support of armies, the institution of courts of justice, and the regulation of trade and intercourse between the States and foreign nations, are some of the great means or instruments by which these results are finally produced. There is a natural and ultimate connexion and coincidence between all these great measures or powers of government—they are expressly calculated to aid and assist each other in their operations, and, in fact, form different parts only of one great political machine. Every possible measure of civil policy is expedient, exactly in proportion to its fitness or tendency to promote the combined operation of these great causes or instruments of human happiness and security. But, sir, by the doctrine of implied powers, the constitutionality of every measure is also made to depend on its tendency or fitness to promote the final objects for which these various powers are given; and thus resolves itself into a question of expediency.

From the view we have taken of the arguments in support of the right to incorporate this bank, said Mr. P., we perceive that its constitutionality is not made to depend on the peculiar applicability of the measure to any particular power in the Constitution; for it is equally applicable to half a dozen different powers—but its constitutionality is made to depend on its general tendency to promote the ultimate objects for which these different powers were given. In other words, it is made to depend on its expediency. We speak of implied powers as innocent things—as matters of course. But the idea of express Constitutional powers and implied Constitutional powers, gives us the exact definitions of limited and arbitrary Governments. The final object of both these Governments is the same—the happiness of the people. The only difference between them is, that in the one case the powers or means by which this end is attained, or intended to be attained, are limited and defined; in the other they rest on the discretion or will of the despot—they are all, with him, questions of expediency.

There is another point of view in which this subject may be placed; and in which, it seems to me impossible for the strongest advocates of implied powers to reconcile the passage of this bill. It will not be denied, that the Constitution contemplates the existence of two distinct sets of powers—the one in the State governments, and the other in the Federal Government. That there are certain powers which may be said to belong peculiarly and exclusively to the State governments; and certain other powers which may be said to belong peculiarly and exclusively to the Federal Government. Now, sir, if there be any power which can be said to belong peculiarly and exclusively to the State governments, it is, in my humble apprehension, the very power of erecting corporations for the purpose of carrying on moneyed or other operations; connected immediately, necessarily, and inseparably with the internal political economy of the State; it is the power of regulating the rights and relations of property between citizen and citizen of the same State; it is the power of erecting a banking company, in order to facilitate and direct the daily and ordinary operations of trade and industry among the citizens of the same State. Although, then, I say, the power of incorporating a bank might, at first, seem to be implied in some of the powers of the Federal Constitution; yet, when we see that, in its exercise, it goes to obliterate and destroy the great characteristic feature of distributive power in this Republic—when we see that, in its execution, it obtrudes and ramifies itself into all the transactions of domestic economy, which are the peculiar subjects of local or State regulation—we ought, on that account, to reject it.

But, sir, I will conclude by again cautioning my Republican friends, and my worthy colleague in particular, to beware how they familiarize themselves with this doctrine of constructive power. It is a creed, at war with the vital principles of political liberty. The pride and the boast of the American Governments is, that they are the governments of the laws and not of men—that they are the regular and necessary operations and results of principles and powers, established in the moments of cool and deliberate reflection, by thy combined wisdom of the nation; and that they are not the effects of the momentary passion, pride, interest, whim, or caprice of a few individuals collected on this floor.

Little did the framers of this Constitution, when they were so nicely adjusting and balancing its various provisions—when they were so carefully erecting guards and barriers against the encroachments of power and ambition—little, I say, sir, did they imagine, that there lay concealed under the provisions of this Constitution, a secret and sleeping power, which could, in a moment, prostrate all their labors with the dust. Still less, sir, did the people when they adopted this Constitution, with even more caution and scruple than that with which it was formed, conjecture that they were signing the death-warrant of all their State rights. But, once adopt the doctrine that you may travel out of the letter of this Constitution, and assume powers, merely on the ground that they will tend to facilitate the execution of powers which are here given; and you compass, at a single sweep, all the rights of the States; and form the basis of a consolidated Government.

Let the principle of constructive or implied powers be once established, in the extent to which it must be carried, in order to pass this bill, and you will have planted in the bosom of this Constitution a viper, which, one day or another, will sting the liberties of this country to the heart.

When Mr. PORTER had concluded his speech, the question was taken on striking out the first section, and carried—59 to 46.

The Committee rose, and reported to the House, who adjourned without taking a question on the report.

Edmund Brooke.

JANUARY, 1811.

SATURDAY, January 19.

Another member, to wit: from New York, BARENT GARDENIER, appeared, and took his seat.

The SPEAKER having informed the House that he had some confidential communications to make, the galleries were cleared and the doors closed, and, having remained so for some time, were again opened.

Mr. McKIM presented a petition from the mechanics, manufactures, traders, and other inhabitants of Baltimore, and a memorial of the President and Directors of the Baltimore Insurance Company, respectively praying a renewal of the charter of the Bank of the United States.—Ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. GARDENIER presented a memorial of the United Insurance Company of the city of New York, and of the New York Insurance Company, praying a renewal of the charter of the United States Bank.—Ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. MITCHILL presented a petition of John Bioren, W. John Duane, and Roger C. Weightman, praying the patronage and aid of Congress in printing an edition of the laws of the United States.—Ordered to be referred to a select committee.

Mr. MITCHILL, Mr. RINGGOLD, and Mr. SEYBERT, were appointed the committee.

Mr. POTTER presented a petition of the Officers of the Rhode Island Line of the Revolutionary Army, praying that Congress will take their case into consideration, and grant them, and others similarly situated, half pay for life.—Referred to the committee appointed, on the twenty-fourth ultimo, on petitions from other Officers of the Revolutionary Army.

Mr. MITCHILL also reported at large on the petition of John Brumbach and others.

[The petitioners are owners of merchant mills, and complain that they are obliged to pay Oliver Evans for licenses to use his elevators and other machinery, although this apparatus was erected after the expiration of Evans's first patent, and before the granting of his second patent, under the act of Congress of January 7, 1808.]

The report was twice read, and referred to a Committee of the Whole.

EDMUND BROOKE.

Mr. Root, from the Committee of Claims, made a report on the petition of Edmund Brooke; which was read, and referred to a Committee of the whole House on Friday next.

The report is as follows:

That the petitioner claims pay, commutation, and bounty lands, for his services in the Revolution, as first lieutenant in the first regiment of Virginia artillery, on the Continental establishment. He states that he was appointed to that office in February, 1781, and continued in service till the siege of York, "when, being extremely ill, he was compelled to ask a furlough for a few weeks." The petitioner does not even state that he ever afterwards joined the Army, but that he held himself in readiness to obey any call that might be made on him.

The committee are of opinion, from this statement of facts, that the acts of limitation would be amply sufficient to oppose this claim; but, as one of the members of your committee has expressed a desire that a detailed report be made, and as the vote of the House a few days since, on the claim of Edwin C. Brown, seems to have expressed a decided opposition to the efficacy of those acts, they proceed to perform the task assigned them. They are not sure that they can present this case as its original merits would have required. This claim has often been before Congress, and was reported against at the last session; and the committee, before they proceed, cannot but express their regret that the pertinacity of claimants has, in some measure, been encouraged by the apparent success of some supposed fortunate claimants. The committee proceed to investigate the several items of claims in the order in which they are claimed.

1. Pay.—By a certificate, dated the 17th of March, 1798, signed "Andrew Dunscomb, late assistant commissioner of army accounts, Virginia," produced as is supposed by the petitioner, and referred to in his petition, are these words: "From an examination of the books in the office of the Auditor of the State of Virginia, it appears that Colonel Duval settled the account of Edmund Brooke, as a lieutenant of artillery, on the 5th day of March, 1784."

2. Depreciation of pay.—By the resolve of Congress, of the 10th April, 1780, "the line of the army, and the independent corps thereof," were promised, when the public finances would admit, that the deficiency of their pay, occasioned by depreciation, should be made good; but this provision is not applicable to any but such as were engaged during the war, or for three years, and were then in service. The petitioner does not come within the provisions of this resolution.

3. Commutation.—By a resolution of Congress, of the 22d March, 1783, all officers then in service, and who should continue therein to the end of the war, were entitled to receive the amount of five years' full pay, instead of the half-pay for life promised by the resolution of the 21st October, 1780. The latter resolution, from its obvious import, did not make provision for any officers except those then in service or reduced. As the petitioner was not then in service, nor reduced in October, 1780, he could never have been entitled to commutation had he continued in service to the end of the war. It has long since been settled, that the war ended when the troops were disbanded, on the 3d of November, 1783; and there is not sufficient proof that he continued in service until that time.

4. Bounty lands.—This subject belongs to the Treasury Department. Had it been the sole prayer of the petition, it is believed it would not have been referred to your committee.

The committee recommend to the House the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the prayer of the petitioner is entirely unfounded, and ought not to be granted.

PATENT LAWS.

Mr. MITCHILL made a report from the select committee appointed on the 12th December, 1810, for the purpose of revising and amending the patent laws.

[The report is by bill. It consists of about twenty sections, and is a revision of all the acts now in force relative to intellectual property, with such amendments as experience has suggested.]

The bill was read a first and second time, and referred to a Committee of the Whole.

PUBLIC DEPOSITES IN BANKS.

Mr. LOVE said he considered the vote in Committee of the Whole as decisive of the sense of the House against the renewal of the charter of the United States' Bank Company. It was therefore necessary to provide immediately for some other place of deposit for the immense property of the United States in the hands of that company, and that which would be in its hands by the time of its dissolution, if the law was not repealed which made it the duty of the collectors to deposit the custom-house bonds in the hands of that bank and its branches. It was certainly a stake of too great magnitude to suffer it to fall to the hands of the executors of the institution, about to become defunct, over whom no department of Government would have even the semblance of check or control, now said to exist over the corporation itself. It was stated in a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, of the 9th of this month, in consequence of a resolution of this House, that on the 1st of March, there would probably be upwards of $2,500,000 of specie in the Treasury; nearly the whole of which, it appears, would be deposited in this bank. In the annual report, made on the 12th of December, it is stated that there would be deposited for collection bonds which are deemed good, to the amount of about $11,000,000, and that the importations after that time would be sufficient to meet the debentures; making, according to this statement, a deposit in all equal to $13,500,000 on the 1st March next.

But it was obvious, the specie deposit at that time would probably not only exceed, (as stated in the report of the 9th,) but very greatly exceed $2,500,000; and a small attention to those two reports will show that the estimate of the Secretary was made under the influence of very great caution, in rating the resources of the Government.

In the annual report it was stated, that, on the 31st December, in the year 1810, there would be a probable specie balance of $2,000,000. This balance was predicated on the statement under the head of "No. 2, last quarter of the year 1810," in which the receipts of that quarter are carried out at $2,500,000, although in the first part of that report it is stated that it was believed that the net revenue arising from duties would not fall short of $12,000,000—making, for the last quarter of 1810, the sum of $4,500,000, instead of $2,500,000. And, indeed, when the time when importations recommenced is recollected, and that they have from thence to the present been as great of foreign merchandise, if not greater, than at any former period for the same length of time; when it is considered that a large portion of the duties did become payable during the last quarter of 1810, it cannot be asserted that the expectation of receiving a net sum of $4,500,000 was unfounded. The same causes will certainly warrant the expectation of a still larger receipt of revenue in the first quarter of 1811; but, taking it at the same sum, and taking from it the receipts after the 1st of March, would leave for the receipts to the 1st of March $3,000,000—making a total of receipts to the 1st of March, of $7,000,000; from which, deducting two months of expenditure, amounting, for current expenses and interest of public debt, to about $1,330,000, will leave the sum in specie in the Treasury of $5,670,000. This sum, with the deposit of bonds, will not be much short of $17,000,000.

In another point of view, Mr. L. said, it might be important to take immediate steps for the removal of the specie deposited from the United States' Bank. It might aid the banks into which it would be deposited in affording the accommodations which the present state of mercantile resources had made so necessary. This deposit could not be less for some months; and, even after paying the money borrowed from the United States' Bank, (which might as well be done to-morrow as any other time,) would leave a surplus of nearly $3,000,000 on the 1st of March. Mr. L. therefore submitted the following resolution, which he read, and asked should lie on the table:

Resolved, That it is expedient to repeal so much of an act passed the 10th May, 1800, as makes it the duty of certain collectors to deposit for collection in the Bank of the United States, or any of its branches, the bonds taken by them for the payment of duties. And that it is expedient to provide that the bonds or moneys now deposited in the said bank and its branches may be withdrawn.

REMISSION OF FINES, &amp;c.

Mr. NEWTON reported the following bill:

A Bill to remit certain fines, penalties, and forfeitures.

Be it enacted, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That all fines, penalties, and forfeitures, incurred in the following description of cases—to wit: first, of vessels which have entered a British port since the tenth June last, or which may hereafter enter such port, having sailed for the same before information of the Proclamation of the ninth of August, one thousand eight hundred and nine, had been received at the port of departure; so far as relates to any forfeiture or penalty which may accrue or have accrued by reason of their having thus entered a British port. Secondly, of vessels which have arrived, either from British ports, or with British merchandise, in the United States, subsequent to the tenth of June last; and also of vessels which may hereafter thus arrive, having sailed for the United States before information of the Proclamation of the ninth August, one thousand eight hundred and nine, shall have been received at the port of departure; so far as relates to any forfeiture or penalty accruing from having arrived or arriving in the United States, from British ports or with British merchandise. And, thirdly, of vessels now owned by citizens of the United States, and sailing under the American flag, which, being in a foreign port at the time when the Proclamation of the ninth August, one thousand eight hundred and nine, shall have been known at such port, shall, in forty days after knowledge of the said Proclamation, depart or have departed therefrom, and returned without delay to the United States; so far as relates to any forfeiture or penalty accruing from their arriving in the United States from British ports, or with British merchandise—be and the same are hereby remitted, any law to the contrary notwithstanding.

The bill was twice read and referred to a Committee of the Whole.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. SAWYER called for the order of the day on the unfinished business of yesterday—the bill continuing the charter of the Bank of the United States.

Mr. FISK moved that it should lie on the table. This was disagreed to—57 to 46.

The House then proceeded to consider the said unfinished business, and the question to concur with the Committee of the whole House on striking out the first section of the bill to continue, for a further time, the charter of the Bank of the United States, being stated—

Mr. DESHA said: Mr. Speaker, the question is on a concurrence with the Committee of the Whole, in striking out the first section of the bill that contemplates a renewal of the charter of the Bank of the United States; or, in other words, whether we will foster a viper in the bosom of our country, that will spread its deadly venom over the land, and finally affect the vitals of your republican institutions; or, whether we will, as it is our duty, apply the proper antidote, by a refusal to renew the charter, thereby checking the cankering poison, the importation and dissemination of foreign influence, that has already brought our Government almost to the brink of ruin. Sir, I am opposed to the renewal of the charter, on Constitutional ground, as well as on the score of expediency. I view it as being directly at war with not only the letter but the spirit of the Constitution, and replete with principles incompatible with republicanism. As to the constitutionality, the ground that I intended to have occupied was taken from me by the gentleman from New York, who spoke yesterday, (Mr. PORTER,) and I will say ably managed. The points he made I consider incontrovertible, and the arguments deduced from them unanswerable; consequently, as I deem the Constitutional question nearly exhausted, I shall but barely touch upon it. The States, sir, from the time they determined to be free, were particularly guarded against the adoption of any measure that could in the most remote degree lead to aristocracy or consolidation. Let gentlemen examine that instrument, the pledge of union—I mean the Articles of Confederation, they will find it couched in cautious language; they will find that the framers of that instrument were particularly guarded against vesting powers in the General Government that could in the most distant manner place their rights and liberties in jeopardy; they no doubt viewed large moneyed institutions, like the one under consideration, as moneyed aristocracies, which might with their different ramifications jeopardize liberty by imperceptibly gliding into consolidation. A power expressly given to the General Government to grant charters of incorporation will not be found in the Articles of Confederation; and if gentlemen will cast their eyes over the second article of that instrument, they will find it expressly provides, that each State retains its sovereignty, freedom, and independence, and every power, jurisdiction, and right, which is not by the Articles of Confederation expressly delegated to the United States in Congress assembled. This, sir, I show to prove, that from the time the States determined to shake off the shackles of despotism, the power of granting charters of incorporation was never intended to be given to the General Government.

Sir, those gentleman who are the advocates of this measure will not pretend, that the power to grant charters is expressly given by the Constitution; and, sir, they must be well apprized that such a power was intended to be given. This fact ought not to be lost sight of. Did not Mr. Madison urge in energetic language, in 1791, on the floor of Congress, that the power to grant charters of incorporation was in the original plan, reported by the committee to the Convention among the enumerated powers delegated in the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution, but that after three days deliberation, and ardent debate, it was expunged, as a power dangerous and improper to be vested in the General Government? It is on remote constructive powers that gentlemen must bottom this measure; and in my mind, there they are cut short by the 10th article of the amendment to the Constitution of the United States, where it expressly provides, that, "the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people." Are not these prohibitory words strongly and clearly expressed? Sir, I defy gentlemen to lay their finger on any clause of the Constitution that would justify the granting monopolies, or exclusive privileges; no, sir, it cannot be done, unless they lay hold of the horrid doctrine of implication, a doctrine as absurd as it is dangerous, particularly when you have a specific instrument for your guide, and one which you have taken a solemn obligation to support inviolate. I had hoped that the doctrine of implied powers had long since been exploded. Ever since the reign of terror, ever since the Federal gentlemen, under the head of constructive powers, adopted the alien and sedition laws, the people of the United States, in whom the powers of Government rightfully rest, signified their disapprobation of the doctrine of implication, in forcible language, by hurling the then majority out of power. Sir, if you subscribe to this doctrine, the barriers of your Constitution are broken down; it will ultimately become a dead letter, you will have nothing to restrain you. But, say gentlemen, our predecessors have said it was Constitutional; they were men of wisdom, and solemnly passed upon it, as being within the pale of the Constitution. Sir, I acknowledge they were men of wisdom, and perhaps actuated by the purest of motives; but they were men, consequently fallible and liable to err, and in my mind they did err most egregiously; and am I to take for granted what they have done, without examining and judging for myself, particularly when I am acting under the solemnity of an oath? No, sir, while I have the honor of a seat on this floor, and any measure is about to be adopted, which in my opinion conflicts with that instrument that I am sworn to support, I will raise my voice against it, and if possible check its progress.

JANUARY, 1811.

H. OF R.

But, sir, we are gravely told, that it is expedient to renew the charter of the Bank of the United States, inasmuch as the evils arising to Government and individuals would be desperate on its being suffered to expire; therefore it was Constitutional. Then, sir, we are to understand expediency and constitutionality to be synonymous terms; then, if that is the fact, the Constitution is a nullity in itself; Congress has nothing to restrain them but their judgment. They are fully at liberty to adopt any measure they may think proper, under the sweeping clause of providing for the common defence and general welfare.

Sir, much confidence as I have in Congress, after witnessing the fluctuations and vibrations that have passed in review for several sessions past, I am afraid your Republican Government would be prostrated, your liberties would be shortly at an end. Gentlemen talk of republicanism—they say they are real Americans in principle, and would go any lengths that was necessary, in defending our rights against oppression—and, sir, at the same time are doing the very thing our lasting and inveterate enemy, Britain, would wish them to do; and the very thing, if adopted, that will strengthen her power, and inevitably accelerate the dissolution of Government. What did that able statesman say, who, with some gentlemen, has been considered almost oracular? I mean sir, William Pitt. Speaking of the American policy: "Let them adopt their funding system, and go into their banking institutions, and their independence is a mere phantom." Sir, keep close to your chartered authorities, or the most direful evils await you. If you are at liberty to twist that instrument, on which the perpetuity of your civil liberty depends, into any shape the caprice of party may think proper, you may calculate on your boasted institutions being of but short duration. If your Constitution is defective, amend it. The manner is pointed out, and which is certainly much safer, than to slide into the dangerous doctrine of implication. If you can multiply and link together remote implications, you may from the same parity of reasoning take in every object of legislation that comes within the whole scope of the political sphere.

Sir, it is not only astonishing, but painful, to behold gentlemen, who on former occasions were loud against the doctrine of constructive powers, now its warmest advocates. They come forward with the greatest ardor imaginable, in support of a measure that has nothing in the Constitution on which they can bottom it, without laying hold of the dangerous doctrine of implication. The Federal gentlemen have the same justification for the adoption of this measure that they had for the adoption of the alien and sedition laws. The doctrine of implied powers will hold them out.

But, sir, their object is to pull down the Administration and Republicanism—ours to support it. The minority is not responsible; the majority has the whole responsibility on their shoulders; consequently ought to act with great circumspection. Sir, what were the causes that produced a change of administration? Was it not Constitutional enroachments and abuses? Most unquestionably it was. And will gentlemen wantonly steer their bark against the same rock, on which the former Administration split? Rest assured, sir, that the people of the United States will not tamely look on and see their sacred bill of rights trampled under foot. No, sir; when they discover a disposition in the public agents to fritter away their Constitution into a mere cypher, they will rise in their majesty, and in a Constitutional way apply the proper corrective. They will tell you, gentlemen, that you have betrayed the trust reposed in you, by abusing the powers delegated to you; that you must give place to more able and safer hands to steer the national bark.

Well, sir, as to expediency, we are told that inevitable ruin would follow a refusal to renew the charter of the Bank of the United States, as it is improperly called. Pray, sir, in what way have the United States a single cent of money or interest in this bank? Certainly none. Does she not merely lend her name, and by that foster speculation? Most unquestionably she does. For, sir, I can view it in no other light, than a complete system of speculation. A system, sir, that has drained a considerable portion of your precious metals from your country. Has there not, within less than twenty years, nearly nineteen millions of dollars, dividends arising from this colossal bank, been principally sent out of the country to fatten the European shareholders, who are the principal stockholders? For, sir, I believe it will not be denied, that about three-fourths of this ten million capital belongs to foreigners, and principally to the citizens of the island of Britain; the balance, in all probability, principally to her agents and partisans in this country. For I recollect that on a former occasion, a gentleman from Virginia laid a resolution on the table for consideration, that contemplated making the shareholders known, and that extraordinary opposition was manifested by the other side of the House; I presume, lest the measure should become more unpopular, when it was ascertained that nearly the whole of the capital stock belonged to Britain and her partisans.

Mr. Speaker, money is naturally calculated to command influence. Then what must be the influence wielded by this ten millions of capital in the bosom of our country, and held principally by our lasting and inveterate enemy? This is one of the engines, and no inconsiderable one, that is set to work, in order to overturn civil liberty, and which will, in all probability, unless checked by timely resistance, go lengths in producing the effect: and, sir, from the influence it has already obtained in different sections of the Union, and the ardent manner it is advocated, I should not be surprised, if the renewal of the charter should take place—if it should ultimately make its way into the National Councils. Let gentlemen reflect on the hardihood of the agents of this bank. They come forward in the face of the nation and openly offer to bribe its councils with upwards of a million of dollars for the renewal of the charter; for, sir, I may be wrong, but I can view it in no other light than as a bribe in order to obtain the name and sanction of Government to carry on their destructive speculations. I have no doubt but that George the Third is a principal stockholder in this bank, and I believe, rather than not succeed in obtaining a renewal of the charter, that he would authorize his agent in this country to bid up several millions: because, sir, he has never pardoned us since our independence, and by this means he would necessarily calculate on effectuating his nefarious purposes of overturning your Government and bringing you under his power again, and which would be a much safer method than encountering the Americans in arms, for of that he became extremely tired when we were in a state of infancy.

But it is said, that this bank can be of infinite service to Government, in making her deposits in, and in case of necessity to borrow money from, to answer governmental purposes. Indeed, sir, if we continue temporizing and playing the losing game much longer, we will have but little to deposit. And would it not be as safe to make the deposits in some of the State banks as in this foreign bank? For we must be in a desperate situation indeed, if it would not be equally as safe to trust ourselves as to trust foreigners, and the very ones who are oppressing us, and whose interest as well as inclination is to oppress us in every imaginable way. And, sir, as to the obtaining of loans in case of emergency, I would much rather be dependent on my own Government—on the citizens of my own Government, than a foreign Government or its agents, and especially one that is at war with us; for I deem it tantamount to war, when they are perpetually plundering our property, impressing and ill-treating our countrymen, as well as depriving us of important inherent rights, the liberty of the seas. This measure perhaps may be a convenience in our fiscal concerns, in the collection and transmission of revenue; but, sir, there is no danger of the wheels of Government being stopped for it. And, sir, I should regret extremely, if it was as has been insinuated, that the existence of our Government depended on foreign capital; I should regret extremely indeed, if we held our rights, privileges, and independence, on so uncertain a tenure. No, sir; in my mind Government can be carried on equally as well without this darling bank as with it; therefore it is time to abandon this destructive system. I confess, sir, that I am not very favorably disposed to banking institutions; I view them as in direct hostility with the principles of our Government. But if we must have banks, in the name of common sense, let us have a bank of our own, with home capital and not foreign, and one that will not import foreign influence—for God knows we have enough of it among us already—and one that will not extract the wealth from your country and export it, not undermine the foundation of your liberty. Well, sir, on whom is this ruin, that is spoken of in such lively colors, to fall? Why, sir, it is to fall on a few speculating merchants, who have been so incautious as to become involved in debt, in consequence of wishing to carry on extensive speculations, therefore borrowed freely of this foreign bank, the calling for which sums would in all probability bring on bankruptcies. These are not the people that I would make any considerable sacrifice for. They are not deserving it. Government has already made very considerable sacrifices in attempting to comply with their memorials and petitions respecting the protection of commerce: and how have they been rewarded? Why, sir, by flying in the face of authority and trying to bring the laws of Government into ridicule. Yet they are the few that are to be favored at the expense of the many. But notwithstanding their reprehensible conduct, there are respectable exceptions. I speak of the speculator, not of the honest and fair trader.

I wish not to be considered an enemy to commerce. The reverse is the fact. I am a friend to it to a certain extent; as an auxiliary to agriculture; but I never wish to see it have the ascendancy in Government, to sway the National Councils, and give law.

But, sir, if the evils will be so great at this time on a failure to renew the charter, what will they be at the end of twenty years, the time contemplated to extend it? For it is reasonable to suppose, that the evil will increase in equal ratio for twenty years to come, as it has for twenty years past. Agreeable to this a renewal will be tantamount to a perpetuation; for, agreeable to the doctrine held forth by gentlemen, a failure then to renew the charter would engulf the Government in ruin, and overturn the fabric of liberty. Who are to be favored particularly by the continuance of this destructive system? The speculating mercantile class, I may say exclusively. And, sir, if they increase in extravagance and arrogance for twenty years to come in equal ratio with what they have for a few years past, nothing will satisfy them short of swaying the National Councils, and giving law to Government, and making everything subservient to their cupidity. Sir, I hold commerce essentially necessary, and would go as far as reason would justify in the protection of it, but I am for keeping it directly within the pale of reason, and not suffering it to drown everything in the whirlpool of its power.

Are not Government well aware that this large foreign capital, in the bosom of our country, has an extraordinary influence in certain sections of the Union in our elections, the keeping which pure ought to be an object of the first magnitude? How was it, sir, formerly in New York? Did they not, in consequence of this moneyed aristocracy, give complete tone to the elections? and, sir, was it checked until Burr surreptitiously obtained the Manhattan Bank, under the mask of watering the city, which formed a counterbalance? And when it obtains an influence in your elections, you may necessarily calculate on its making its way into your National Councils; then everything must bend to this monstrous speculating institution, your Constitution not excepted.

It will be said, no doubt, as I am from the West, where banks are not common, that I am unacquainted with the nature and operations of banking institutions. Sir, I do not pretend to go into detail; practically I acknowledge I am unacquainted with them; my information on subjects of this kind is principally theoretical. But, sir, I am sufficiently acquainted with the nature and operation of them to convince me that they are systems of speculation, calculated to suit the speculating and mercantile class at the expense of the agriculturists—at the expense of those who are the support and sheet anchor of your Government. How is it, sir, when your banks break, which has been the case in several instances, in some of the Eastern States? The Farmers' Exchange Bank of Rhode Island, when it was ripped up, had but some odds of forty dollars in its vaults. The Berkshire and Northampton bank, both of Massachusetts, when their vaults were examined, one had perhaps thirty or forty dollars in it, the other, I believe, was entirely empty; and the Coos Bank, (I believe it was called,) of New Hampshire, was nearly in the same situation, and thousands of their bills in circulation at the time. Well, sir, who were the sufferers? The note holders, the people at large. And, sir, as it is a system of speculation, when they have emitted bills to the amount of their limitation, where they are limited, they may break (as the saying is) full handed, and the weight of the shock falls on the note holders, who are principally agriculturists, as they compose eight-tenths of the people.

But, sir, the accounts of the speculations, impositions, and I must add, swindling and corruptions, that have been practised in the East, under the head of banks, have reached the West, and the people, notwithstanding they have, by some of the Eastern gentry, been deemed scarcely in a state of civilization, have sympathized with their Eastern friends, and have regretted that turpitude had become so deeply rooted in the East, in the line of banking, where all but exclusive civilization was claimed, and which has made them cautiously guard against the possibility of being engulfed in a similar vortex. But, sir, if gentlemen would cast their eyes emphatically over the history of the West, I suspect they would not only find civilization, but pure patriotism; patriotism, sir, that would not fade before the sun; they would find the people uncontaminated with foreign partialities, prejudice, or influence, and where the last torch of liberty would be held up on the continent as a terror to tyrants.

Mr. Speaker, perhaps I am mistaken, but I view this measure as the greatest test of political principle that has been on the carpet for many years back, and if adopted, federalism, or if gentlemen please, aristocracy, will regularly progress, and finally obtain the ascendancy; republicanism will have to take the back ground, and ultimately be prostrated; your boasted institutions will only figure in the pages of history, like ancient republics, as a mournful monument of the fall of man, and a sorrowful memento of his degraded condition: therefore, in my mind the adoption of this measure would seem like committing a most horrid treason against the principles of the Constitution and civil liberty, consequently I consider it not only the true interest, but the bounden duty of every man who has any pretensions to friendship for the American Government, or civil liberty, to assist in strangling this infant Hercules in the cradle, or at least preventing it from coming to maturity. If this measure was only calculated to perpetuate the memory of its founder, I should not so much object to it, but then I should think it unnecessary and improper; but, sir, it will do more, it will further the views of Federalism by increasing their power, and assist them in overturning the present system of government, on the ruins of which they will calculate on raising one more congenial to their purposes.

Mr. Speaker, from my present impressions, I think it would be more advisable, if the British Government should not rescind their destructive measures affecting our rights, and do us justice, rather than renew the charter of the Bank of the United States, as it is called, thereby furthering their views on this country, to lay our hand on the capital stock, or at least so much as belongs to the citizens of the Island of Britain, in order to indemnify us in part for the damages we have sustained by British outrages; and, if it becomes necessary, (as I presume it will,) to make use of it in defraying the expenses necessary in the subjugation of the North American provinces, which will have to be resorted to, if you wish to give peace to the land. For I have no hesitation in saying, that while this large foreign capital is in existence in your country, and the British hold their North American possessions, that British principles will be disseminated, that Federalism, if gentlemen like the term better, Aristocracy, will regularly progress and finally convulse your Government to its centre. You may rest assured, sir, that if the charter of the Bank of the United States is renewed, it will prove a powerful weapon in the hands of our enemies, and will be calculated to rule the Government, instead of the Government ruling itself. Then, sir, is it not high time that the accounts of this colossal speculating institution should be suffered to close, by letting the charter expire on the third of March next, that we may know whether this Diana of the Ephesians be a goddess of solid silver, or only of clay silvered over?

Sir, much has been said about the want of capital. If gentlemen would cast their eyes around and examine our resources, they must be fully apprized that we have capital adequate, and beyond our wants; then is it not time to cut asunder those leading-strings, by which corruption has led credulity? Yes, sir, it is not only time that we should have the name of freemen, but be so in reality.

H. OF R.

Bank of the United States.

JANUARY, 1811.

Sir, in justice to my own feelings, and the future prosperity of my country, I am bound to vote in favor of concurring with the Committee of the Whole in striking out the first section of the bill.

Mr. KEY.—Mr. Speaker, this House, in Committee of the Whole, having struck out the first section of the bill in relation to the charter of the Bank of the United States, and thereby defeated the bill; and this House being called upon to concur with or reject the vote of the Committee, a question of the utmost magnitude and importance is presented to our consideration. Few subjects more deeply affect the welfare and prosperity of our country, and none deserves a more calm and temperate investigation. I shall not attempt to excite the feelings of the House by painting the scenes of distress that will probably flow from a non-renewal of the charter, but address myself entirely to your understandings.

All parties seem to concur in the utility and convenience of the bank to aid the collection and payment of our taxes and revenue, to safe-keep the amount and distribute it when wanted. But many deny that we have, under the Constitution, a right to incorporate a bank even for such circumstances. I have listened with pleasure to the arguments urged by those who deny the right, and have weighed them with attention, and soliciting the same indulgence from them in return, I do not despair of producing conviction.

I shall contend that we have a right to create a National Bank, and that it is our duty to do so to avoid the general calamity that will result to the country if we fail to do it. I beg of gentlemen to take the Constitution in their hands, and follow me step by step, while I demonstrate the existence of the right.

The eighth section of the first article of the Constitution contains the grant of powers given to Congress to enable it to conduct the affairs of the Union. The powers given are enumerated and specified, being eighteen in number. In the first we find these words: "The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States; but all duties, imposts, and excises, shall be uniform throughout the United States." These words give to the United States a definite, explicit power "to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts," &c.; the only qualification of the power is, that the duties and imposts, not the taxes, shall be uniform. The eighteenth enumerated power is, "for Congress to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers," &c.

The powers thus given to Congress are sovereign in their nature, and explicit in their terms of grant; but the jealousy and provident wisdom of the framers of the Constitution, knowing that the power might be abused in its exercise, have, in the ninth section of the first article, enumerated seven specific limitations or restrictions of the powers previously given. The grant of power is in affirmative terms; the restrictions are in negative terms.
